HOW STEAMBOATS RUN REBEL BATTERIES.

We reproduce on this page a picture of the tug "RUMSEY," Captain Joseph Biggs, as she appeared when prepared to run the gauntlet of the rebel batteries at Vicksburg on 26th April. On the Vicksburg side she was protected by a barge filled with hay solidly piled to a height which completely screened the steamboat. On the other side another barge, containing a loose deck-load of cotton-bales, protected the captain and his crew from rebel sharp-shooters. Cotton-bales were likewise piled around the pilot-house for the protection of the pilot. Thus accoutred, the gallant little craft boldly ran past the rebel batteries without suffering any damage or losing a man. Captain Biggs and his vessel are now with Farragut between Vicksburg and Port Hudson.

GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN.

On page 341 we reproduce some of Mr. Davis's sketches representing scenes in the campaign of General Grant and Admiral Farragut.

One of them shows us THE BOMBARDMENT AND DESTRUCTION OF THE REBEL BATTERIES AT GRAND GULF by Admiral Farragut. The place was being strongly fortified, and would have become as formidable as Port Hudson or Vicksburg had the rebels been suffered to complete their works. It is now in our hands.

THE CAPTURE OF FORT GIBSON, by General Grant, followed quickly after. The Herald correspondent wrote:

On Saturday we reached Fort Gibson, and took formal possession of the town. Just as we entered the village we discovered the suspension bridge which crosses the Bayou Pierre on fire. This compelled us to remain a few hours, until a floating bridge could be constructed. The enemy appeared on the opposite side of the bayou, above and below the town, and shots were exchanged, but with no damage to our army.

Port Gibson is a town of two thousand inhabitants, well built and enterprising. A railroad connects the Port with Grand Gulf.

In the afternoon the bridge was repaired, and we crossed over.

Three miles beyond Port Gibson, on the Raymond road, we came across two large piles of bacon belonging to the rebel army, and containing at least 50,000 pounds. Of course this was unceremoniously appropriated. Five miles beyond we came to the upper bridge across Bayou Pierre, a substantial iron suspension bridge, which the enemy in his retreat had attempted to burn. The negroes had put out the fire before the bridge was entirely destroyed.

The other pictures show us GENERAL GRANT WRITING HIS DISPATCHES TO WASHINGTON ON THE BATTLE-FIELD BY THE LIGHT OF A BIVOUAC FIRE, and GOVERNOR YATES SECURING THE FIELD AFTER THE BATTLE IN SEARCH OF THE WOUNDED. Mr. Davis says that the Governor's industry and zeal in this praiseworthy enterprise elicited universal encomium.

THE BERWICK'S BAY EXPEDITION.

We illustrate on page 340 two scenes in the recent naval campaign in Berwick's Bay, Louisiana, viz., THE DESTRUCTION OF THE "QUEEN OF THE WEST," and THE CAPTURE OF BUTTE LA ROSE by our flotilla. The former operation is thus described in the official report of the commanding officer of the flotilla:

EXTRACT OF OFFICIAL REPORT OF LIEUTENANT-COMMANDER COOKE TO COMMODORE MORRIS.

"GUN-BOAT 'ESTRELLA,' GRAND LAKE, "April 15, 1863.

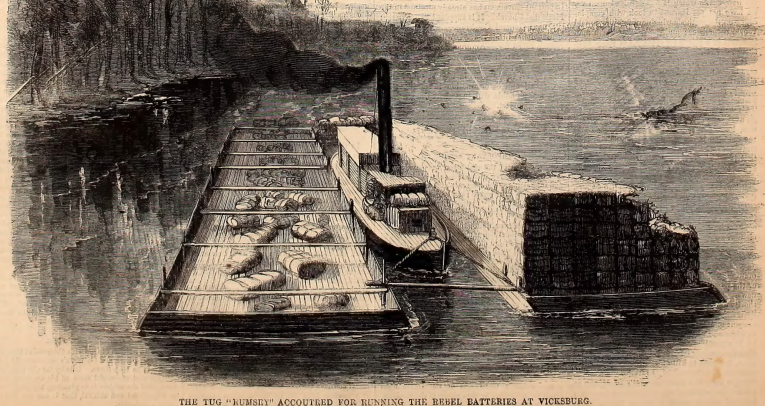
"During the afternoon the smoke of the enemy's steamers was seen in the distance, apparently in Lake Chicot. At dark they were not yet in sight, but we expected them, and made preparations accordingly. After two o'clock A.M. of the 14th inst. we could occasionally distinguish their lights in the distance, and at daylight saw a large black steamer and white river-boat approaching us. We were all under way immediately, and opened the engagement with our bow-guns—30-pounder Parrott—at long range, our three vessels forming a crescent—the Estrella on the left, the Arizona, Captain Upton, on the right, and the Calhoun, Captain Jordan, in the centre—all approaching and gradually surrounding the enemy.

"The large black steamer pointed toward the Arizona, as though she were going to ram her; but our firing was so rapid and accurate that she did not advance. Captain Jordan, of the Calhoun, pointed his vessel to run down the black stranger; but she was seen to be on fire from our shells, and was soon wrapped in flames fore and aft. At this juncture her consort turned and fled. Having superior speed and lighter draft we could not follow her, and she escaped. We now lowered all our boats to pick up the crew of the burning steamer, who were clinging to cotton-bales all around her. From them we learned she was the Queen of the West, commanded by Captain Fuller, of Teche notoriety. We picked up ninety of her crew, besides Captain Fuller, and understand twenty or thirty were lost. The burning wreck drifted two or three miles down the lake, where she grounded, and the flames soon reached her magazine, which blew up, scattering the fragments of this famous vessel in every direction.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,



"A. P. COOKE, Lieutenant-Commander,
Commanding Naval Forces Berwick's Bay.

"Commodore HENRY W. MORRIS,
"Steam Sloop Pensacola, New Orleans."

Of the capture of Butte La Rose a friend of the author of the sketch which we reproduce writes as follows:

"UNITED STATES STEAMER 'ESTRELLA,'
"April 28, 1863.

"I herewith forward to you a sketch of Fort Butte La Rose and vicinity, as it appeared during the action of the 22d inst. After a few days of very intricate navigation of the innumerable bayous in this region, the Berwick's Bay fleet, under command of Lieutenant-Commander A. P. Cooke, approached the fort under a full head of steam at ten o'clock A.M. The fort was silenced in about twelve minutes. The rebel gun-boat Mary T. was crippled, and only escaped by the assistance of one of the rebel transports. The steamer Clifton was slightly injured in her machinery. Our loss was two killed and three wounded. We captured the fort, two heavy guns, sixty prisoners with all their small-arms, and a large quantity of ammunition."

THE TUG "RUMSEY" ACCOUTRED FOR RUNNING THE REBEL BATTERIES AT VICKSBURG.

ONE DAY'S COMMAND.

THE plumed staff officer gallops
Along the swaying line,
That shake as, beaten by hailstones,
Shakes the loaded autumn vine;
And the earth beneath is reddened,
But not with the stain of wine.

The regular shock of a battery
The rattling tumult stuns;
And its steady thrill through the hill-side
Like a pulse beneath it runs;
The many are dead around it,
But the few still work the guns.

"Who commands this battery?"
And Crosby his clear, young eyes
From the sliding gun-sights lifting
As the well-aimed death-bolt flies,
"I command it to-day, Sir!"
With a steady voice replies.

Answers as heroes answer,
With modest words and few,
Whose hearts and hands to duty
Even in death are true,
Though its awful light is breaking
Full on their blenchless view.

The officer passes onward
With a less troubled eye,
The words and the look unshaken
Bid every wild doubt fly;
He knows that young commander
Is there to do or die.

To do and die; for the battle
And all of command are done,
While stands unmoved on the hill-side
Each shattered, blackened gun,
And Crosby in death beside them
A deathless name has won.

THE ARREST OF VALLANDIGHAM.

IT is known that Clement C. Vallandigham, late member of Congress from Dayton, Ohio, was lately arrested at his house by order of General Burnside, tried by court-martial, and convicted of giving assistance to the Government in the prosecution of the war. And it is reported that he has been sentenced to imprisonment in a fortress during the war. The Traitor will enjoy the power of commuting or remitting this sentence altogether; and it is the unanimous hope of the loyal North that he will remit it.

For, whether the arrest of Vallandigham was or was not a wise step, there can be very little question but his imprisonment for months, and perhaps years, in a military fortress would make a martyr of him, and would rally to his side, for the sake of liberty and free speech, an immense number of sympathizers. It would probably make him Governor of Ohio, and would impart great strength to the rapidly-decaying Copperhead sentiment of the Northwest. Notwithstanding the mere lessons taught by the war, and the new duties which it has devolved upon us, we have not yet learned to look with complacency on the methods which are familiar to Old World despotisms; and the spectacle of a man immured in a prison for opinion's or words' sake shocks our feelings and arouses our anger.

It is all very well to say, as General Burnside says in his noble and patriotic reply to the Cincinnati Court, that war involves a sacrifice of liberty, and that this man Vallandigham was a pernicious and malignant enemy of his country. This we all know, and if Vallandigham would go out of the country to the rebels or any where else, loyal people would heartily rejoice. But the question is not whether Vallandigham be a traitor, or whether war involves a suspension of individual rights: it is—shall we better ourselves and help the country by locking this man up in a fortress, instead of letting him prate his seditious words to every one who will listen? To that question the reply must be in the negative.

The mistake which has all along been made in this war by the Government and many of its agents has been not trusting the people sufficiently. Arresting seditious talkers implies a fear that the people have less sense or strength of mind enough to resist the appeals of sedition; just as the suppression or retention for a time of intelligence of a defeated army implies whether the people have courage enough to bear news. Let us assure Mr. Lincoln, and all in authority under him, that the people of the United States have quite courage enough to bear any amount of misfortunes, and quite sense enough to withstand any amount of seditious nonsense, be it uttered ever so glibly. The only effect thus far produced by such talkers as Vallandigham has been to kill off the Copperhead sentiment in the Northwest, to reduce Fernando Wood's party to a mere corporal's guard, and to render the names of the Copperhead leaders a by-word and a reproach among honest men. Vallandigham was fast talking himself into the deepest political grave ever dug when Burnside resurrected him.

The people can be trusted to deal with traitors without any help from Washington, and those who suffer the penalty they inflict—ignominy and disgrace—never find sympathy any where. At the meeting held in New York on the 18th to protest against Vallandigham's arrest not one leading man, not a single man who commands general esteem, or who carries the least weight, ventured to be present, and the performance was, on the whole, the most wretched of all the wretched fizzles that have ever been enacted in this or in the way of political meetings. Not but that every body, including the leaders of all parties, and the editors of all leading journals, regret the arrest. But Copperheadism has become so odious, and the doom of every sympathizer with treason so obvious, that not a single man who has any future to risk will jeopard it by placing himself on the record as even indirectly sympathizing with a Copperhead. So long as the people are thus firm in their loyalty it is surely superfluous for Government to interpose for their protection against traitors.

LAY REPRESENTATION IN THE METHODIST E. CHURCH.

AN important convention of Methodist laymen met in this city on the 13th and 14th to devise means of securing a representation of the laity in the General Conference of their Church. About two hundred and thirty members were present, most of them delegates. Among the number were ex-Governor Wright of Indiana, Governor Tuttson of Delaware, Hon. M. H. Odell of Brooklyn, Hon. James Bishop of New Jersey, President Allen, late of Girard College, Judge Bond of Baltimore, and other distinguished gentlemen. The Rev. Dr. Newton Scott were well represented. Large delegations were also present from Philadelphia and New York.

The last General Conference—a body which meets once in four years—declared its willingness to admit lay delegates, if their introduction should be desired by the people, and referred the sense of the laity to be ascertained by a popular vote. The vote was taken at an unpropitious time, shortly after the breaking out of the rebellion, and was, in consequence, exceedingly small. Out of nearly a million of members less than eighty thousand voted, about thirty thousand of the votes being for lay representation, and upward of forty thousand against.

Resolutions were adopted by the Convention asking for a representation of laymen in the General Conference equal to that of the ministers, declaring their unabated attachment to their Church, and their conviction that lay representation would give greater life and vigor to all the operations of Methodism. Speeches were made upon the resolutions by Messrs. Carron of Indiana, Cooke of Illinois, Hoyt, Nicol, Cuningham, and Forrester of New York, Riddle of Delaware, Allen of Philadelphia, Bond of Baltimore, and others. Several ministers were invited to address the Convention, and among them Bishop Simpson, who made an elaborate speech in favor of the lay movement.

The presence of so many well-known laymen, and of such ministers as Doctors Durbin, Stevens, Nadal, Hagany, Rev. R. M. Hatfield, and Bishop Simpson, is indicative of the deep interest felt in important movement has already attained in the Methodist Church. It is supposed by many that the next General Conference, which meets at Philadelphia in May, 1864, will grant the concession asked for. Another Convention, to assemble concurrently with the General Conference, was appointed to meet in the same city on May 17, 1864. The laymen certainly show great zeal and determination in urging their suit, and no doubt will, in a short time, accomplish their object.

THE LOUNGER.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

THE design of the seal upon the envelope, in which the following article is sent, is novel and interesting. It represents a copperhead snake upside down, or reversed; a wingless warp manacled; with the motto, Union for home; public virtue, and the statute of Limitations."

The State Committee on the distribution of prizes for treason, rebellion, murder, and civil war, will meet upon the third day of June at such time and place as shall be hereafter announced. The Committee deems to offer a most fraternal and cordial welcome to all traitors; all members of lynching and vigilance committees; all superintendents of hanging, burning, quartering, and tarring by wild horses of Union men; all artificers in Union homework; and especially all murderers in cold blood of negroes; and to invite them respectfully to compete for the premiums, which will be adjusted by the following scale:

For a complete case of rebellion without cause, beginning by every kind of public and private dishonor, theft, fraud, and perjury; continued by terror, famine, and wholesale slaughter, involving the people in enormous loss of life and vast expenditure; and ending in the ruin of the Union terms to be dictated by the authors of the rebellion, or separation with a view to reconstruction upon terms to be made entirely agreeable to the same gentlemen.

For any equally great, causeless, and bloody insurrection hereafter, the same premium will be presented.

For any partial effort in resisting the laws by force—a partial modification of the item at the option of the insurrectionists.

For single cases of complete disobedience and forcible abrogation of the law—a public dinner at the expense of Government.

For single cases of successful obstruction by fraud—a handsome bound copy of the statute of Limitations.

The Committee desire, in conclusion, to express the following fine sentiments:

We love anarchy. We will never willingly relinquish it. Its exercise is our essential. To enforce the laws is unnatural. To punish people who steal our property and murder our fellow-citizens is fanatical. The men in power are incompetent. What could be expected of people who turned out Buchanan? They are also fanatics. The Jew of the Countries, and Jeff Davis, and Robert Toombs are not in the least fanatical. They are also corrupt. Let us then hasten to recall Floyd, Cobb, and Pleasonine Stidell, the noblest Roman of them all; not forgetting, indeed, our worthy chairman, who has now for two years been wantonly and wickedly deprived of his rights in the Mayoralty of New York, and whose name, like that of our worthy secretary pro tem., is the synonym of purity, incorruptibility, and political honor.

In view of these great truths, and aside from all loyal and honorable men, we know that the public voice demands that we shall be put in high places. We want no voice to find expression and to be heeded, for we are extremely anxious to go. We want to give a vigorous grinding of our own axes. And while we would submit to nothing that can injure our individual chances of power or patronage, we will gladly go as far as we think will pay in the abandonment of national honor, faith, and glory.

F. W., Perpetual Chairman.

J. R., Secretary pro tem.

SOLDIERS AND SAINTS.

STONEWALL JACKSON was evidently a soldier born. He may have been a saint also. But there is no relation, so far as we can suppose, between the two. A soldier as we understand, when he is in actual service, perceives and acts instinctively. There are certain movements to be made, certain points to carry, certain results to achieve, and those things the soldier, whether a good man or a bad one, knows how to do and proceeds in doing. His skill, his coolness, his daring, his rapidity, do not depend upon his faith in his cause.

But a saint is a conscientious man. Thus, for whatever cause he might be fighting, and however much or little he might believe in it, and however religious or irreligious he might be, General M'Clellan, for instance, would be cautious, slow, and apprehensive. Jackson, in the manner, would have been always dashing, impetuous, enthusiastic.

Religious faith, purity of character, love of home and country, may make a man persistent and patient, but they do not make him a skilful soldier. Marlborough was the falsest of Englishmen, but he had the British love of constant and splendid victory. William III. was one of the noblest and truest and bravest of men, but military success eluded him. Lafayette loved France with all his heart. He was a good man but a poor soldier. Nelson loved many things in France for his own glory, but he loosed the French eagles in every heaven. It would be very hard to show that Marlborough or Napoleon would have been better soldiers if they had been religious men. Cromwell was a great general, not because he was a strict Puritan and a fanatic, but because he had military genius. John Bunyan was doubtless as sincerely pious as Cromwell; but he would hardly have saved England from Spain.

Honesty is always admirable; but it is a two-edged sword. Pitt was as dauntless as honest as William of Orange; Servetus as honest as Calvin who burned him; Torquemada as honest as the Covenants he abjured. Let us respect honesty every where, but denounce and resist evil-doing. The honesty of a man who tries to destroy the foundations of society because its peaceful progress enlarges human liberty, is not so striking as his monstrous crime.

THE NEW SOLDIERS.

IF the Southwest ten colored regiments have been already formed, and General Thomas expects that ten more will be raised. General Butler had four such regiments in his command when he left Louisiana. General Hunter is organizing another army corps. General Foster, in North Carolina, who was bitterly opposed to enrolling colored men, has now a number in process of organization and companies of them, and is now most anxious to have as many regiments as he can get. General Forrester, in Kentucky, who once colored men's lives seem worth as much as the hardy, brave, patient, and obedient. In the District of Columbia a regiment is forming. In Massachusetts there is one regiment ready, another is rapidly filling its ranks, and a third is organizing. In Rhode Island, Wilde has been designated to the command of a colored brigade which will probably rendezvous at Newberne.

These are the signs of the return of common sense to the nation, for there was a time, not very long ago, when, if there were any willingness to use the services of colored men at all, it was a general opinion that they must not be actual fighters. And yet great as is the stake of all of us in this war, it is peculiarly vital to the colored race if it concerns their personal freedom and consequent social condition after the war, as their civil liberty. It was clear from the beginning of the rebellion that there could be but two classes of men in the country, the loyal and disloyal—those who were willing to fight for, and those who meant to fight against, the Government. To undertake the creation of a third class, consisting of those who were individually and collectively quite as much interested in the result as we, was one of the many foolish theories in which we indulged. What could be more absurd than to bail with joy the assistance of foreigners, many of whom could not even speak our language, and who could not be supposed to understand even their own interest in the war, and reject with scorn the strong hands of men whose right to themselves and their children was to be settled by the struggle? The war is not the battle of any particular race, or color, or nativity, for the American people, but the most solemn battle under heaven. It is the fight of all the people loyal to a Government which secures equal rights, against their fellow-citizens who would overthrow both rights and guarantee, and plant a despotism of privilege upon the ruins.

We do not claim for the colored regiments bravery superior to that of other soldiers. All we ask is that they shall have as fair a chance as any. They may not be especially heroic; but since Bull Run, in which Americans, Germans, and Irish fled in promiscuous panic, we have learned that a valor to be tested only by long and various observation. One negro at Milton Head, after he enlisted and the regiment was ordered to Florida, was home and hid himself in the chimney. He was pulled out, went with the rest, and was so cool, brave, and effective in actual battle that he was promoted to a sergeancy on the field. It would be idle to censure General Saxton because the Fifteenth Corps at Chancellorsville were called "Dutchmen," for Frederick the Great fought with German soldiers. And till some battle in which the panic which has at times overcome all our soldiers should seize the colored ranks, we bespeak for them the charity which has protected all the others.

MORE PEACE.

THE gentlemen who have signed the call for a convention to arrange the terms upon which men in armed rebellion against the laws will consent to obey them, have put themselves in a position which for a time, at least, separates them from the sympathy of loyal men. They say: "We think that the effort to sustain the Union by force of arms in the hands of those who now direct the Government has proved a failure." To this statement they append their second call for peace. Their sagacity is committed to the assertion that the war has failed. Their sense militates as forcibly as it can by the justification of that assertion. If that is false they are wrong; and they are not likely to be trusted with the power by their fellow-citizens. Now most of the names signed to the call are totally unknown, but of the few who are known not one can be supposed to wish to be put in the wrong. Our success in the field would show that the war was not a failure, and bring their words to shame. Unquestionably from this time forward they desire the defeat of our arms. Their cry for peace comes to the ears of those that they hate. They will succeed in slaughtering and driving back the Union soldiers; that the nation may be so utterly despised and disgraced that it will ask the rebels what they want, and beg them, for pity's sake, to take it!

The whole test to such a call there is not a single name attached which carries the least weight, or inspires the slightest confidence in any part of the State.

CAVALRY.

A FRIEND returned from rebel captivity speaks of the use made of cavalry from the beginning in the rebel armies. The conscript infantry are commanded by the mounted "gentlemen" of the South, who relentlessly cut down all stragglers from the ranks. The immense cavalry force thrown on our lines, have even ridden round our armies, and left a feeling of uneasiness and dread. For some inexplicable reason we have hardly developed an interest to that most valuable branch of the service.

But at last a series of magnificent and incisive cavalry raids has given the very heart of the rebellion have disclosed its hollowness, and inspired universal terror and despair. They are inestimable as only for the work of cutting communications and destroying supplies, but for the revelation of the fact that behind the rebel armies and in the rebellion there is little substance. The thinly populated section is at the mercy of these bold and broad raiders. Its armies, as a power, are not a fourth safe. The war they have so wantonly and wickedly invoked lays its red hand upon every rebel household. In vain the "gentlemen" whip in the "white trash;" the laborers "whom capital ought to own," the poor, starved, ignorant, and enslaved of the South. The "gentlemen" must bethink them of their own snug estates, of their own cherished families, of their own lines, itself, but no longer safe from the far-reaching hand of justice and of war. Those conscript masses will also learn that the people of the North are not what they have been painted. They are not savages because they are intelligent; they are not brutes because they believe in civil order; they are not cowards because they are free. But they will learn also that in war such men are terrible.

In this week's paper there are two remarkable pictures of cavalry attacks, by Thomas Nast and Charles Reinhart. The dismounted cavalryman's horse and rider sweep devastating across the land. Woe to those and eternal infamy who raised the floodgates and let in desolation and death.

GIGNOUX'S PICTURE.

THE exhibition of Church's Cotopaxi at Goupil's rooms has closed, and Gignoux's Sunrise in the Alps is now to be seen there. It is by far the most important and successful work of his we have ever seen; and the subject is so pleasing, the treatment so thoughtful and skillful, that it can not fail of great popularity.

The picture is a "composition," like the Heart of the Andes. That is to say, it represents Switzerland, and no particular scene in Switzerland; so that whoever has seen the cliffs, the lakes, the mighty mountains, and the cold gleam of glaciers among sunny clouds, will sit and sit before this picture, and look and look, until all the beauty and the grandeur of that land, all its sublimity and terror, all its tenderness and romance, fill his mind once more, as when, long ago, he leaned upon his Alpen-stock, and, listening to some echoing jödel among the heights, gazed down upon Luzerne or the Four Cantons.

The fore-ground of the picture is a projecting point of the cliffs which overhang a lake, by the side of which we see the meadows far below us. The placid water fills the middle distance; and beyond it, on the opposite shore, the castellated precipices rise and catch the earliest sunlight on their tops. But the whole depth and distance are filled with the mountains tossed up to the sky and mingled with the clouds—a mass of infinite shadowy depth and variety, swelling vast and dark and mysterious from the lake up to shining fields of eternal snow. Whoever has looked from the Weissenstein in the Jura across the valley of the Aar to the Bernese Alps has seen this marvelous spectacle. It was Switzerland at a glance. It is the Switzerland that lives in memory forever.

Mr. Gignoux has reproduced the Swiss landscape with a freshness, freedom, and fidelity that justify and enhance his high reputation as one of our chief masters of landscape.

POLICY AND RIGHT.

In his late speech in Parliament Mr. Cobden shows England very clearly what risk she runs in provoking a war:

"How many of the ships which float upon the salt water belong to British capitalists? The lowest estimate I have heard formed of the number of these vessels, as entered through the insurance offices in the city and other quarters, shows that we have upon an average from £100,000,000 to £120,000,000 sterling worth of the property of British capitalists on the seas. Rest assured no other country has £30,000,000 worth, and that you have as much property at stake upon the ocean as all the rest of the world put together. You have, moreover, 10,000,000 people in the year to feed upon food brought from foreign countries. You get three-fourths of the tea and four-fifths of the silk from China; more than one half of the tallow and hemp from Russia; there is more cotton, more wheat, more Indian corn brought to us than to any other country. You are so powerful here in your island home that you can set the world at defiance; but the moment you begin a war of reprisals your commerce is the most vulnerable of any. ["No, no!"] Honorable gentlemen who deny the truth of that statement do not understand the position of the commerce of England."

To these risks observers upon our side of the sea add the probable loss of Canada and troubles in Ireland.

But we must remember that wars are not waged or prevented by considerations of policy alone. The wisest statesman in England, Edmund Burke, was opposed to the American war simply upon the ground of expediency. "I am not here going into the discussion of rights, nor attempting to mark their boundaries." "My consideration is wholly limited to the policy of the question." These were his words. He thought the war inexpedient, but Britain went to war. So now the shrewdest statesman in England may show the impolicy of war as conclusively as Burke, and we may calculate the harm our privateers will inflict upon British commerce; but, for all that, Britain may still be willing to go to war.

If, then, whatever may be the right between us, we think a war is now inexpedient, it is our duty to refrain from provoking it. Such a course can not dishonor us. No man with both hands engaged is dishonored by declining another fight. Of course whoever tempts him to it opens an account for future settlement.

LITERARY.

"Grape Culture, Wine and Wine-making, with notes upon Agriculture and Horticulture," by A. Haraszthy, Commissioner to report on the improvement and culture of the vine in California, is the title of a very interesting and valuable book, a Cyclopedia of Wines and Wine-making, just published by the Harpers. Mr. Haraszthy is a Hungarian by birth, but a naturalized American citizen, and was sent out under admirable auspices, both individual and national, to make a tour of examination in Europe. The results of his travel and study are in this work.

"The American Publishers' Circular" in a new form, Vol. I., No. 1, to be published on the 1st and 15th of each month, is issued by G. W. Childs, Philadelphia. This is a most convenient and attractive literary gazette, and will be invaluable to all who wish to know exactly what new books there are, by whom they are published, what their character is, and what is the current gossip of literary circles.

Dr. Draper's "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe" is a treatise upon the law of progress in civilization, soon to be issued by the Harpers. The scope of the work is necessarily not unlike that of Buckle's History of Civilization; but it was nearly completed when Buckle's book appeared. Such a work is like an egg. It must be excellent or it is worthless. But Dr. Draper has already established his position as a scholar and thinker, and his history will be a remarkable contribution to literature.

At last Englishmen begin to see how humiliating for them Kinglake's "History of the Crimean War" is. That the brilliancy of the book should have blinded them at first to what is conspicuous in it to all the rest of the world is surprising. But the Edinburgh Review opens upon him fiercely. It is pained to think how he has traduced the noble Gallic cock which is so fraternally allied to the British lion. And certainly Kinglake has brought the present wearer of that gorgeous plumage to the bar of the world. But he does not traduce France. He exposes what he thinks the conspiracy which has stolen the name of France, and by murdering, imprisoning, and exiling leading soldiers and statesmen, by absolutely controlling the press, and by a perfect system of espionage succeeds in holding France subject to its will. Louis Napoleon was said to have muttered, "C'est ignoble," when he had read it; and no copy of the work, and no notice of it or extract from it, is permitted in France. If it is true, it is, indeed, a portrait of the celebrated British lion which makes him ignoble indeed.

Mr. Edmund Kirke, a mask of which the secret has been well kept, has written another work upon Southern life, "My Southern Friends," published by Carleton. His previous book, "Among the Pines," is one of the most vivid pictures ever drawn of the melancholy condition of a society founded in the nineteenth century upon principles and systems which even the eighteenth century had long outgrown, and which Christian civilization repudiates. "My Southern Friends" is a supplementary sketch of the same interest of subject and vigor of treatment.

NEW MUSIC.

Mr. Walter Russell Johnston, the young organist at St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church in New York, has composed a very pleasing and richly-harmonized "Ave Maria," published by Pond & Co., which we cordially commend to our readers who are looking for a new and interesting "piece."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A NICE SPRING BONNET.

Cutlets and other forms of meat are sometimes dressed à la Jardinière. So are bonnets, according to the ensuing entry in Le Follet:

"An elegant Leghorn bonnet was edged with green ribbon. On this ribbon, which was quite flat, were placed here and there cherries, fastened together two by two, and falling so as to form a bunch. At the edge of the front a large bouquet of real corn."

The idea of this elegant bonnet suggests various reflections. If the cherries adorning it were real, as well as the corn, the fair wearer would be much run after; chiefly, however, by pursuers whom she might not much care about—the boys. Decorated with real fruits and vegetables, the bonnet à la Jardinière, might suggest the inquiry:

"Mary, Mary,
Quite contrary,
How does your bonnet grow?"

There would be no difficulty in trimming a bonnet with mustard and cress, grown in a strip of moist flannel, or plush; and thus this new thing in bonnets might be nicely fringed all round the front with a border of salad. It would look sweetly pretty, and the trimming would be soon fit to cut; and then some days would have to elapse before another could be grown. In the mean time a new bonnet would be immediately necessary; which would be just the thing for the majority of young ladies.

Boyish Freak.—The other day a carpenter's son, aged six years, who had been left alone in his father's work-shop, was disturbed while engaged in the painful operation of screwing up his eyes. He was immediately taken to a surgeon.

Curious Metamorphosis.—Wonders will never cease! the other day we heard that "a horse was turned into a stable!" and this is the boasted Nineteenth Century.

"Was your son engaged before he went to the war?" asked Mrs. Rugg of a neighbor.
"No, but he has had several engagements since," she replied.

Among the addresses presented upon the accession of James I. was one from the ancient town of Shrewsbury, wishing his Majesty might reign as long as the sun, moon, and stars endured. "Faith, mon," said the King to the person who presented it, "if I do, my son then must reign by candle-light."

Why didn't the last dove return to the ark?—Because she had sufficient ground for remaining.

"Good-morning, Mr. Jenkins! Where have you kept yourself this long time?"
"Kept myself! I don't keep myself—I board on credit!"

"Prevention is better than cure," as the pig said when it ran away with all its might to escape the killing attentions of the butcher.

"Too big for his business," as the lady said to the sweep who stuck in the chimney.

When a fiddler poisons himself with laudanum he may be said to have had too much of the base vial.

Bad English.—Swearing.

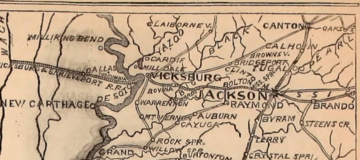
An Irishman recently handed in to the Telegraph Office a dispatch intended to inform another Emeralder, employed upon the public works in a neighboring town, of the decease of a friend. It reads thus: "Barney, come home; I died last night."

A leading maxim with almost every politician is always to keep his countenance, and never to keep his word.

Consoling.—Losing a small fortune in an unlucky speculation, and all your friends wondering how you could have been such a fool.

A gentleman at table remarked that he could not endure fish unless it was well cooked. "This," said the waiter (as he handed him a plate of the desired dish), "is, I hope, suf-fish-ciently cooked to suit, Sir?" "Well, yes," replied the gentleman, as he tasted it, "it is done a good eel better than I anticipated it would be."

"Who is that with Miss Flint?" "Oh, that is a spark which she has struck," said a wag.



"Why don't your father take a newspaper?" said a gentleman to a little urchin, whom he caught in the act of pilfering one from his door-step. "'Cause he sends me to take it."

A philosopher being asked what was the first thing necessary toward winning the love of a woman, answered, "An opportunity."

"Boy, what is your name?" "Robert, Sir." "Yes, that is your Christian name; but what is your other name?" "Bob, Sir."

"Sally," said a swain to his intended, "give me a kiss, will you?" "No, I sha'n't," said Sally, "help yourself."

A consumptive man has a hollow cough, but a bankrupt merchant has a hollow coffer.

MAP OF THE VICINITY OF VICKSBURG AND JACKSON, MISSISSIPPI, SHOWING THE THEATRE OF GENERAL GRANT'S OPERATIONS.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE CAPTURE OF JACKSON.

The capture of Jackson, the capital of Mississippi, by the Union army of General Grant, is fully confirmed by the admission of the Vicksburg and Jackson papers, and by dispatches from Mobile and Chattanooga. General Hurlbut telegraphs from Cairo to General Halleck that this fact is stated by the above authorities. The rebel General Gregg abandoned Raymond on Tuesday, the 12th. On the next day he was reinforced by General Walker, of Georgia, at Mississippi Springs; but their combined forces were driven back to Jackson on Thursday. Our troops then followed and took possession of the city from the east. General Joe Johnston arrived at Jackson the day previous, but pushed on with three brigades toward Vicksburg. General Grant at last accounts had struck the railroad at Edward's Station, about eighteen miles from Vicksburg.

TELEGRAMS FROM GENERAL GRANT.

General Grant, under date of May 11, telegraphed to General Halleck as follows:

"My force will be this evening as far advanced along Fourteen Mile Creek, the left near Black River, and extending in a line nearly east and west, as they can get without bringing on a general engagement.

"I shall communicate with Grand Gulf no more, except it becomes necessary to send a train with a heavy escort.

"You may not hear from me again for several days."

General Grant also telegraphed General Halleck, from Raymond, Mississippi, on the 14th instant, as follows:

"M'Pherson took this place on the 12th inst., after a brisk fight of more than two hours.

"Our loss was fifty-one killed and one hundred and eighty wounded. The enemy's loss was seventy-five killed (buried by us) and one hundred and eighty-six prisoners captured, besides the wounded.

"M'Pherson is now at Clinton. General Sherman is on the direct Jackson road, and General M'Clernand is bringing up the rear.

"I will attack the State capital to-day."

RUMORED EVACUATION OF VICKSBURG.

The following is a telegram from General Hurlbut, dated Memphis, and received at Washington on 19th:

General Grant has taken Jackson. The Capitol is burned.

From five to ten thousand mounted men are concentrated near Okolona, threatening an advance in the direction of the Memphis Railroad.

A citizen just up from Jackson reports that the enemy abandoned Vicksburg on Sunday, marching on the ridge northeast to Livingston, which is twenty miles northwest of Jackson.

COLONEL GRIERSON'S CAVALRY RAID.

The cavalry raid of Colonel Grierson with his gallant Illinois cavalry was a magnificent success. He cut his way through the enemy's country with two regiments of cavalry, destroying on his route four millions of rebel property, capturing over a thousand men and twelve hundred horses, demolishing a camp of instruction with all its equipments, cutting the communication on the Great Northern and New Orleans and Jackson railroads, and destroying a large number of cars, telegraph-wire, water-tanks, and army stores. After passing through many dangers and working terrible damage he arrived at Baton Rouge on the 1st inst., to the great surprise of the inhabitants. From thence he pushed on to New Orleans, where he was received with great éclat. The whole movement only occupied seventeen days.

ANOTHER CAVALRY DASH.

A dispatch received from the commandant of the Tennessee division of the Mississippi squadron—S. L. Phelps—states that Colonel Breckinridge, of the First West Tennessee cavalry, with fifty-five men, dashed across the country from the Tennessee River to Linden, on the 12th inst., and surprised a rebel force more than twice his number, capturing Lieutenant-Colonel Frierson, a captain, one surgeon, four lieutenants, thirty rebel soldiers, ten conscripts, fifty horses, two army wagons, arms, etc. The court-house, which was the rebel depôt, was burned, with a quantity of army supplies. The troops, with their prisoners, returned on board the gun-boats.

CAPTURE OF ALEXANDRIA.

We have accounts of the capture of Alexandria, on the Red River, by Admiral Porter.

REBEL DEMONSTRATION IN KENTUCKY.

The rebels are making a demonstration in Kentucky. Dispatches from Cincinnati, dated 18th, say that the rebel force in Wayne and Clinton counties is increasing. They are said to have seventeen thousand men and fourteen pieces of artillery. Four rebel regiments of infantry have passed through Jamestown, and twenty-four more regiments are reported at Morristown, East Tennessee. General Buckner is said to be at Clinton. There are rebel pickets on the Cumberland River at every available point. A letter from Richmond, Kentucky, says that the rebels have crossed the Cumberland, which is rapidly falling. These movements are regarded as indications of an attempt to outflank General Rosecrans at Murfreesboro.

A REBEL RAID.

The movements of the rebel General Mosby, with his cavalry, in Virginia, continue to create some solicitude. It is said that he has descended the valley of the Shenandoah with a force of 800 men, and is making forays through the country northward, probably with a view to cut the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. At last accounts he was in the mountains in Loudon County, in the vicinity of Lovettsville, and his movements tending toward Leesburg.

HOW OUR PRISONERS FARE IN DIXIE.

That brute, Captain Turner, a few days ago had charge of some of our prisoners from Richmond to City Point, and caused a man of the 119th Pennsylvania to be bayoneted because he could proceed no further. The villain would not give the poor fellow even a drink of water. A soldier of an Ohio regiment, taken at Rome, Georgia, was shot on Wednesday while reaching for a cracker at Belle Isle Prison. Our prisoners were compelled to walk from their places of capture at Fredericksburg to Richmond, thence to City Point. Some gave out on the march. A member of the 20th New York regiment died on the route.

DOINGS OF THE REBEL CONGRESS.

The first rebel Congress went out of existence at Richmond at ten o'clock on the night of the 1st instant. The most important measures passed during the session were a Taxation act for the support of the Government, the army, and the navy; a Currency act, to promote the funding of Confederate notes in Confederate Bonds; the Impressment act, to authorize the seizure of all produce for army use; an act to organize a general staff for the army; the formation of a new flag, and the adoption of a new seal. The bill making it a penal offense to buy, sell, or circulate United States bonds and Treasury notes, or "greenbacks," was rejected in the Senate on the ground that the Constitution did not authorize Congress to provide any punishment for the crime which the House bill created. The acts providing for the election of members of Congress by general ticket, to authorize the conscription of resident foreigners, and for the repeal of all naturalization laws, were also rejected. The joint resolutions offering terms of peace to the Northwestern loyal States were defeated in both Houses.

A BLACK ARMY CORPS.

General Banks has issued an order proposing the formation of an entire army corps of blacks, to be called the Corps d'Afrique.

THE SENTENCE OF VALLANDIGHAM.

Mr. Vallandigham has been sentenced to close imprisonment during the war in Fort Warren. This is the decision of the Court-Martial, as approved by General Burnside, but is, of course, subject to the judgment of the President.

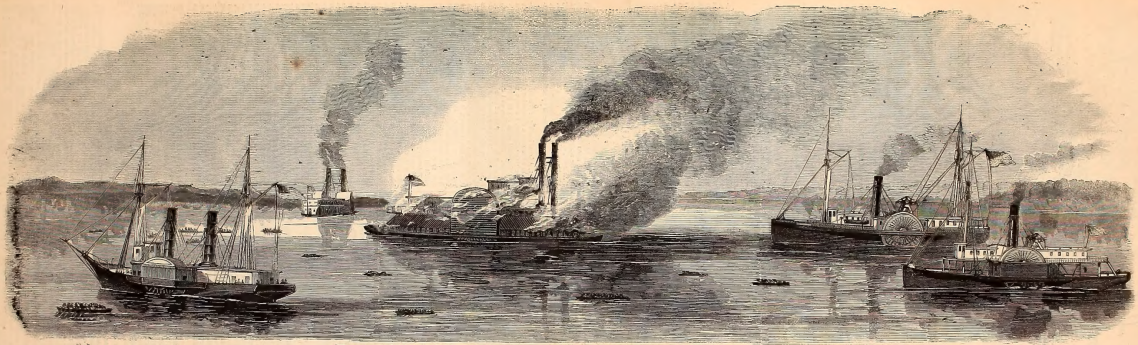
MEETINGS TO PROTEST AGAINST IT.

A meeting to protest against the condemnation and sentence of Mr. Vallandigham was held at Albany on 16th. Some very strong speeches were made, and resolutions were adopted denouncing the arrest as an unwarrantable assumption of military power. Governor Seymour sent a letter to the meeting characterizing the arrest as "an act which has brought dishonor upon our country, which is full of danger to our persons and our homes, and which bears upon its front conscious violation of law and justice." A similar meeting was held here on 18th under the auspices of Fernando Wood. It proved a fizzle.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

MR. ADAMS'S SPEECH TO THE TRADE UNIONS.



On the 2d instant a deputation of the Trades Unionists waited upon Mr. Adams, the American Minister, to present the address recently adopted at a public meeting of that body, sympathizing with the North, and applauding President Lincoln for his Emancipation policy. Mr. Bright introduced the deputation and made a few remarks. Speeches were also made by several members of the deputation.

Mr. Adams having expressed the pleasure he felt at seeing so numerous a deputation of working-men before him, said: "Gentlemen, I accept with pleasure the duty you have imposed upon me in receiving your address to Mr. Lincoln. Representing, as I do, my country in England, you must be aware that I stand outside all local questions; therefore it is not my province to express dissatisfaction or satisfaction with those persons in England who express their opinions upon America. If there are any in this country who put a harsh construction on the conduct of the American Government, it is not my place to find fault or my right to criticise. It is my duty, however, to accept from the representatives of any body of Englishmen the favorable sentiments toward the Government I represent, and to reciprocate the frank, manly, and independent spirit in which they have been tendered. I understand, gentlemen, you attend here as representing large bodies of working-men, who advocate and uphold the rights of labor; and it is, therefore, but natural you should look with dislike upon any parties, in whatever countries they may exist, who infringe on those rights. You perceive that in the struggle now going on an attempt is made to establish a Government on the destruction of the rights of labor—a Government of physical power to take away the rights of labor. It is a question above all local right; it is a general principle, and therefore, though taking place in a foreign country, you have a right to express your opinion thereon. I accept the duty you impose on me with great pleasure, the more so as you have taken advantage of the occasion to speak on the question of war. I agree with your views. With two nations of the same race, of the same high spirit, both feeling proud of their superiority on the ocean, under present circumstances it would be indeed surprising if something should not spring up on that ocean which might occasion collision. I concur with you, gentlemen, as to the great forbearance which ought to be exhibited by both countries in construing the actions of each other. I trust that, in spite of all that has occurred, there is in the Government of each country a sufficient sense of responsibility, which will induce them to maintain friendly relations with each other. There must naturally be a feeling of pride, of fear lest one nation should appear to refrain from properly resenting what it might deem to be an offense, and in this lies the great danger. I feel confident, however, that if the two peoples of the two Governments would speak together in the same sense, in the same frank and unreserved terms as you have spoken to me this evening, all fear of any collision would be at an end. [Hear, hear.] I can assure you that, notwithstanding the speeches of some of my countrymen, notwithstanding the writings in some American journals, there is no nation under the sun for which America entertains a greater regard than England; and if the real sentiments of the people of each country can be clearly established to each other, I shall have no fear of their coming into collision. [Cheers.] I believe, gentlemen, you have taken the right course to produce this desirable understanding, and I shall undertake with great pleasure the duty of at once transmitting your address to President Lincoln." [Cheers.]

RUSSIA.

THE POLISH QUESTION.

The Russian replies to the notes of England, France, Spain, Italy, and Sweden, on the Polish question, had been received. Prince Gortchakoff defines the position of the Czar, both toward Poland and all her western friends, substantially in the state-papers addressed to England and France. In both of those countries the reply gave satisfaction; but the London press was of opinion that the one forwarded to the Cabinet of St. James was not just as explicit with respect to promises of reforms for Poland as was desired. The Paris Moniteur of the 5th instant says: "It is easy to be convinced, upon reading these documents, that they open a path to projects of conciliation, and that they contain the bases of negotiations likely to lead to a common understanding between the different Courts now seeking the means of upholding the legitimate interests of Poland."

A BACHELOR'S SOLILOQUY ON THE CONSCRIPT ACT,

BY WHICH A MARRIED MAN OF MORE THAN THIRTY-FIVE YEARS OLD IS EXEMPT.

To be,
Or not to be, a conscript is the question.
Whether 'tis nobler to a man to marry—
An able-bodied man of six-and-thirty—
And enter upon the direful uncertainty
Of matrimonial life with all its accidents,
Perchance a fretful wife, a numerous family,
And bills interminable of grocer, baker,
Butcher, and doctor (for such things will follow,
As surely as the night succeeds the day),
Or take up arms against a sea of taxation,
And, by opposing, end them all—To marry—
To stop—no more. And by that step to end
The haunted dread of single-blessed natural fears
That flesh is heir to on the field of battle—
The burning bomb-shell, and the whistling bullet—
The bayonet charge:—it's mere a consummation
Devoutly to be wished. To marry—to sleep—
To sleep! perchance to dream:—ay, there's the rub;
For in that sleep what horrible dreams may come—
A Country murdered through my negligence—
What terrible lectures may assail me there
By her who hath a vested right to "Conduct" me.
When thus, by marrying, I have 'scaped the "DRAFT,"
Must give us pause: There's the respect
That makes calamity of such a life.
For who would bear the whips and scorn of time,
Be pointed at, and the jeers to come:—
"There goes a coward who, when his Country called him
To breathe blithe in the glorious cause
Of Freedom and the Hope of all the world,
Did, like a treasonable Copperhead, behind
A petticoat—Who, when he might have been
A hero in the front battery
Where Right and Union vanquished Wrong and Treason,
Did his gracious make with a—here women?"
But this the dread of something in the State,
That dark, rebellious country from whose bourn
No traveler returns—puzzles the will.
Thus marrying does make cowards of us all,
And thus the native hue of resolution
Is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of fear,
And enterprises of great pith and moment
With this regard their currents wave away,
And lose the name of action.

Soft you now!
My Country calls. She, whom of all I know
Most worthy to be loved, is whispering—"Go!"
I go; nor will I press the nuptial bed
Till she, who loves me, with a warrior clasp

SALLY'S CHOICE.

THE colored frame of the open window so set off Sally's yellow hair that it was a pity there did not pass a few more picturesque figures that September afternoon. The house was silent; it was silent out of doors; and Sally was involved in mental contemplation.

Within her view were two roads, which at present were traversed neither by pedestrian nor rider. One of these roads ran through the fields opposite the house—level, straight, and filled with the blinding rays of the setting sun. The other emerged descended past the garden gate till it made a sudden turn into the village street, a mile distant. It was obscured by tall sycamores and willows which hid the houses standing behind them, and which were already in the shade of twilight. With her mind's eye Sally saw, rolling up the cloud road, along by the trees, a soldier in a blue jacket, leather belt which had a pistol-case, and a cap which was pulled over his forehead. She turned from the vision with a start, as though it were a reality, and looked down the other road. With her mind's eye she suddenly beheld another vision. An officer with flashing buttons and shoulder-straps was strolling leisurely toward her. At the moment her father's voice outside the porch dissolved the panorama, and changed the current of her thoughts.

"What's your opinion, Sally Snow?" he asked on entering.

"She's gone to Mrs. Hall's to a quilting party."

"What am I going to do for my supper, I should like to know?"

"It's all ready but boiling the tea-kettle."

"Bile it, then."

Sally made tea; and taking off the cover which Mrs. Snow had put on the viands arranged by her own hands previous to her departure, she and her father took seats at the table.

"Only some dough-nuts, custard pie, and ris cake?" said Mr. Snow, discontentedly.

She made no reply.

"Ain't there some cold chicken?"

"Just enough for dinner to-morrow, mother said."

"Fetch out the chicken!" he demanded, pounding the table with his knife-handle.

She brought it from the pantry and Mr. Snow demolished it.

"The dog will have something now, and your mother will to-morrow the wiser. It's beyond me why she hates dogs so."

"You are afraid of mother," said Sally, hotly.

"Take care, there, take care!" replied Snow, throwing a bone on the clean floor.

"You are a sad sloven, sir."

"I declare," he exclaimed, rising, "I do perceive that the days begin to shorten! I'll have to hurry up with my chores."

"You know well, father, that mother means to make me marry Major Brewer; and you know you don't dare to pay your fist down that I shall not. Like somebody else better—you know that too."

"Reely! reely! reely!" said Snow, disquizingly, seizing his old hat and slapping it against the wall, as if he might make out of it the idea that was not in his head; but nothing came of it, and he edged himself out of the house.

Could Orderly John Cutter have known that afternoon of his being in Sally's thoughts he would have walked down the street of a canvas city in Virginia with more alacrity as he was taking a letter up to Major Brewer's quarters. As it was, he was in a rage. He must present the letter, which he knew was from her, in accordance with the rules of military etiquette, instead of thrusting it before him, as he would like to do, and demand satisfaction. He entered the tent with more abruptness than was needful, and tendered the letter. The Major, in entire ignorance of John's feelings toward Sally, kindly asked him if he had heard from Bingham lately, received in the post-mail of the letter that it was his native town.

"No, Sir."

"Bring my horse up in an hour, for the General rides this afternoon."

"Yes, Sir;" and John disappeared. If he had staid he would have seen an angry flush pass over the Major's face as he read the letter; for Sally, in a postscript, had asked him to give her respects to her old friend John Cutter.

Between seven and eight Mrs. Snow came home very cross, and could find no fault in the took refuge in bed, and huddled into her chamber. Her caresses originated from some gossip at the quilting, who told her that Major Brewer drank terribly in the army, and that Sally had said she would go to the poor-house before she would marry him. Although Mrs. Snow did not believe what she had heard, she was irritated enough by the report to write Major Brewer that very night, advising him of a plan recommending him to get leave of absence, if possible. In the stillness of that same night John Cutter penned an eloquent epistle to Sally, which contained the offer of his hand and heart she had long possessed—but it never reached her. The Major Brewer letter-bag contained, by hand, and was taken to him by John himself. To do Mrs. Snow justice, it was by accident that she happened to write on the same day when the post-office was located when John's letter came for Sally, and was handed to her by the postmaster. When she saw the letter she put it in the fire with its seal unbroken: she had her own code of right and wrong, and adhered to it faithfully. She believed it to be a love-letter from Major Brewer's sweetheart, though she knew what Sally wanted better than Sally herself. Major Brewer belonged to the highest family in Bingham. The Brewers owned the most wood-land, and lived in a square, aristocratic mansion, standing by itself for two miles out of Bingham. To overcome the proverbial inaccessibility of the family by an alliance with the good-natured Major was the secret study of efforts of the proud Mrs. Snow. The Snows were Nobody—open-mouthed, easy, indifferent to place, and ignorant. Mrs. Snow knew that to keep an humble dress-maker; but ability, courage, and a strong will had made a place for her in Bingham. Sally, also, had ambition, application, and lively eye, a terrible little plebeian, and gave no indication of the strength of character which her mother possessed. The year before the war broke out John Cutter fell in love with her at the dancing-school, and she returned his affection. He was unable to overhelp went on, which was only discovered by the sharp eyes of her mother. Although John was only a common soldier, the mother knew that Sally had a vague faith that things would come out right somehow, and that they would be happy ever after. With this idea she authorized the letter sent by her mother in reference to Major Brewer, who was an older acquaintance than John, and whose intercourse with Sally had been marked by his own relations. Major Brewer, who was more than thirty, was still without a profession, or any business whatever. The day he went over to Mr. Snow's to get his signature to some paper regarding a sale of timber, the purpose came into his head for the first time, and that purpose was to fall in love with Sally. He was adroitly aided by Mrs. Snow, who managed to be absent during the visit, who received his attentions passively. At the commencement of the war Brewer obtained through the family influence a staff appointment with the rank of Lieutenant, and John Cutter enlisted in the ranks. Without seeing much service Brewer was promoted to a Captaincy, and then to a place on a Major; while John only attained to the dignity of Orderly-sergeant when the news of the battle brought Major Brewer and John in continual contact; from the beginning they had been attached to the same post.

Soon after Major Brewer received Mrs. Snow's letter he had a slight attack of jaundice, upon which he obtained a furlough, and went home on director's certificate, and went home, and in about a month's time from the day when Sally contemplated the two roads he stopped before the garden gate to fasten his horse to the hitching-post. It was in the middle of October; a fire burned on the hearth, and Mrs. Snow was before it engaged in making fall garments. She was alone, for Sally had gone down to the village to get tea.

"Now," thought Mrs. Snow, "if he looks as if he drank, I'll give him up." But he did not look as if he did; he was stylish, his voice was weak, and he seemed inclined to be feeble. Not a word was said about Sally. They talked about the war, and about Bingham, till the visitor, rosy and animated, with several bundles. The Major grew more yellow as he rose to meet her, and his voice faltered as, the last Sally, his voice was weak, and quite a cordial welcome. He staid a short time after her arrival, and, when he went away, said that it was doubtful when he should be able to come again, he felt so miserably.

"Half the set home a long time," said Mrs. Snow, prophetically.

"What ails him?" asked Sally.

"He's consumptive, I reckon; they all get sick sooner or later."

Sally thought of John, and wondered whether he was sick. She was sure he was, and his friends in the village had heard from him in a long time. She sighed.

"What are you sighing for?" asked Mrs. Snow.

"For the soldiers."

"The whole of 'em?"

"For one," answered Sally, boldly.

"It's of no use. His thirteen dollars a month, and his being taught that he is a machine, has demoralized him before this."

Sally said no more; she was not capable of warring with her mother.

The next day the Major came in a carriage, and asked Sally to go to ride with him. She objected on account of the churning.

"Go right along, Sally; I'll attend to it," her mother ordered.

So she went. The Major was so poorly that he asked her to relieve him from the fatigue of driving, which she consented to do, and guided the horse skillfully; but not so skillfully as to prevent the conversation, in which she could not help feeling interested. He was so much, this warrior, so fatherly and kind, and withal so grateful, that she could not resist the flattery of his manner. Besides, was she not the favored one of all Bingham? There was not a girl in the town for a twelvemonth; the war had stripped the country, and the girls had been minus every thing in the way of amusement. It was pardonable in Sally for yielding to the pressure of circumstances?

Mrs. Snow played her part so well that the wedding dress was bought, and preparations for the wedding commenced, and Sally bewildered into an acquiescence which left no hope for John Cutter. No sooner, however, was the wedding-day set than Sally, owing to the contrariety of the mind, began to be occupied and lulled with dreams of what might yet happen between the now and then of the marriage-day, which would turn the Major into a man, and fill her with the impossibility. But the wedding came off, and on the twenty-eighth day of the following month the Major was on his way to his post, and Sally resumed the life she had left the day she became home, without comprehending any great change in her position. "Grove offered, and I said, "Reely!" when he looked at her; and Mrs. Snow silently wondered at her quietness and indifference.

A few bottles of "Old Rye" were opened on the occasion of the Major's return. The congratulations were, however, few, as the drinks, numerous, and John Cutter heard of them. When the Major first saw John he looked at him as if he expected gratitude. The letter was in his pocket-book; but John was silent; and the Major, remembering that Sally had asked him to give her respects if John Cutter, was silent too.

"Who cares?" said John to himself; "if she didn't, I am sorry for her. Mother Snow can put an airs to her heart's content, now that Sally is a Brewer. But who would have thought it? Let's see. Sweet Sally Snow, by-by, he burst out with, "and scare something."

Soon after this a part of the commanding general's army was ordered to the front, and Major Brewer and John were transferred with it. One of those vague Western battles then occurred, in which a great many men are killed, and which are called victories on both sides, and for which victories both the commanding Generals are rewarded; and the Major and John were concerned in it. Both were mounted that day, the Major in antici pation of the General's important order, and John with no anticipation at all; but he had two loaded pistols in his belt, which he intended to use. When the fight was hottest, and John's spirits were the highest—for he had reason to suppose that from behind General R—— he had picked off an officer—a shell exploded which blew him reel in his saddle. It was Major Brewer lying under his horse, who had been struck with a shell. John dismounted and helped him up.

"I'll have you out of this in no time, Brewer," he said.

"I am done for," answered the Major. "Don't let me be trampled on."

John made a last struggle, and raised himself so that John pulled the Major from under him. His thigh was crushed: and his back was torn by the explosion. He died. The Major was dying. John looked afield for help. Men were round him, but they were dying or dead.

"I'll run to my body's canteen, I'll bet," he muttered. "I ain't even got a handkerchief."

The Major was now past speaking; but he heard John mutter, and made out if he could, for the surgeons were down yonder," for he shook his head. John saw the motion with his hand toward his coat, which John understood; then he thrustingly grasped his watch-chain, and tried to bring it to his lips. Then he put the watch into his pocket, and pressed it to the Major's lips, and said, in a loud voice, "I will take it to her." The Major smiled; the words broke his last earthly effort, for his breath stopped with it, and he was with the "brave who sink to rest." John put the watch to his pocket, and the order, which he found crumpled in the Major's belt, and which had been the means of his death. "I suppose I ought to take a lock of his hair," said John, taking out his jackknife. But he did not get one, for a ball struck him in the arm, and he fell with the knife spinning and shattered his arm to pieces.

"By George!" he shouted, "I never thought of being shot!"

He fainted presently, and dropped beside the Major, where he was found, picked up, and taken to the hospital. Mrs. Snow received the watch, and Mrs. Snow had the gratification of riding in a carriage as one of the chief mourners in the largest funeral procession that had ever been seen in the county. Her gratification was alloyed, however, by the remembrance that Brewer disliked Sally Snow. By signified that, as the Major was dead, all connection between her and his family was at an end. The Brewers knew Mrs. Snow did not shed at the funeral, but afterward, when she revolved in her mind the failure of her plans. Sally made no complaint herself, but she was relieved by the event. She looked down the road often, but no one could tell what her thoughts were.

Nothing, meantime, had been heard of John Cutter. The hand which should have guided the pen was now no more in his possession; his arm had been amputated above the elbow, fever set in, and he lay in the hospital a month. The watch and the order he gave to the surgeon to keep till he got well, but said nothing of the owner. If he died, Sally would never get them, for the Major could not expect him to deliver them under such circumstances. But John got well—that is, well enough to be discharged—and he started for Bingham, with the watch, and the arrears of his pay, which amounted to forty dollars, in the roundabout and uncertain way of a transport.

In three weeks he reached home, gaunt, dirty, ragged, and feeble. The very hour almost that he arrived he dragged himself up to Mr. Snow's. Mrs. Snow saw him as he unlatched the gate. She gave a supernatural start, as if mercy! she could not analyzed, but waiting for coming events. Mr. Snow was calm from the barn, and hurried to meet him. Seizing John's empty sleeve, he shook it in violently by that which vibrated all over.

"I 'spose you'll say," said Mr. Snow. "How are ye? What's been to pay with ye? The Lord has preserved ye. Come in and stay a week. I'll kill ye a chicken for supper." Here Sally turned away from the door. John involuntarily clenched his teeth, and braced himself for the encounter; but she stopped suddenly before she reached him, and turned so pale that her father cried out,

"She's going into fits at the sight of ye;" but she recovered by blushing scarlet, and then she begged John, in a low voice, to walk in.

"Mother's gone," thought John, following her. Mrs. Snow, still at the window, turned and gave a not ungracious welcome to him. He lost no time in producing the watch and telling the errand he came to tell. As he handed the watch to Sally, and told her that the Major had kissed it for her, it was filled with the tears, from self-pity as much, perhaps, as from a remembrance of the sad scene. Sally took it and laid it on the table, and looked at him to go on with his story, as if it was time that he should come to himself. Mrs. Snow made a show of attention to Sally's letter, and so did John, with a great jump at his heart. When the narrative was ended Mrs. Snow said,

"So you are discharged?"

"I am good for nothing," he answered.

Sally laid her hand on his empty sleeve. John took it from her, kissed it, and their eyes met. Forgetting every thing but each other, he whispered, "How could you?"

"I never said it against ye."

"Because I wasn't here, and you were too weak to stand alone?"

"Yes, that was the reason; but why didn't you write?"

"I did."

"I never got a word from you."

"You'll get a pension?" Mr. Snow remarked, dubiously.

"I suppose so," answered John, starting up. "I must go; I have no more my folks yet."

"Wa'n't a bad 'Good-day' by no means.

"I wonder," said Mrs. Snow, "if all the army are as dirty as he is?"

"Mother, you slander," answered Snow; "it is our only chance to see rebel soil."

"Modest, Sally," she some days had passed over without any sign from John, "have you been any happier for my marriage?"

"No," her mother answered, shortly.

"Nor I."

"You might have been."

"Mother knows. Do you think that I have any right to my way now?"

"I suppose you will take it."

"I shall, Sally, if you will finally.

"How folks will talk!" said Mrs. Snow, angrily.

"About what?"

"Oh, you know that I am not to be cheated. It is all over, John Cutter. Hating him here if you choose; but I hope he will wash himself before he comes."

Sally remained silent.

"I never could do any thing with you."

"But God has done something, mother."

It was Mrs. Snow's turn to be silent.

Sally shook hands with John, as they were coming out of church the next Sunday, and all the village saw the performance. In the course of time John walked home with her from church, and was there on Sunday evening; then he slid into the habit of dropping in on week-days, and finally he married her.

Sally avowed her intention of going out dressmaking, to make up for the loss of John's arm; but neither Mr. nor Mrs. Snow would consent to it. Mrs. Snow urged John to live with them and turn farmer.

Although the war is not over, John's troubles are, and he seems to be engaged in plowing. He drives the oxen with his left hand, and Mr. Snow guides the plow.

MY FIRST DUEL.

YES, I was going to fight a duel. Not that there was any reason for me to fight a duel, for no, I had quarreled with no one. No, I was going to fight with a man whom I had only seen once before for the express purpose of fighting.

This will, I have no doubt, sound curious to English ears, but the facts of the case were as follows: I was at that time some five or six years aged studying at a German university; and was, of course, intimate with a considerable number of the students, whose customs duels by no means held witnessing. One day, as I was walking home from my lecture, Muller by name, from the fighting ground, he suddenly said to me:

"I say, Albion" (Albion was my nickname among the students), "I say, shall you ought to fight once, too; you will never get quite behind the scenes of German student life unless you do so."

"Well," I said, "I think that I should like to fight once, just to see what my sensations would be like. I wonder whether I should feel afraid or not?"

"Then you will do so?" he said.

"Yes, I think I will," I replied; "but I have no quarrel with any body."

"Never mind about that," said he. "I will arrange every thing for you, come to our Kneipe this evening, and afterward we shall be sure to pick up a man for you in the Market-place."

I accordingly went to Müller's lodgings a little before eight that evening, and he conducted me to the room in which his corps used to hold their "Kneipe;" it was a large, handsome apartment in one of the principal Restaurations, exclusively kept for the use of members of the corps. We there found about a dozen men already assembled, and nearly as many more dropped in by twos and threes shortly afterward. We all supped together, and as soon as our meal was finished, the serious business of the evening, that is to say, the beer-drinking, commenced. I am afraid to say how much Bavarian beer was disposed of—we all drank like fishes; the more we drank the thirstier we seemed to get: in fact, no one who has not seen German students drink beer can form any adequate idea of the quantity they consume. Bavarian beer is, of course, not nearly so strong as the English beer; but is still a very agreeable drink, and tastes much like pale ale. About eleven o'clock Müller said to me:

"Come, let us go and take a turn in the street, we shall not be many minutes finding you a man."

We went out, and in the Market-place found a number of students belonging to various corps walking about, all of whom, as my companion informed me, were looking for opportunities to challenge some one, or force some one to challenge them.

"We shall very soon be suited," said he.

"We!" I said, "are you going to quarrel, too?"

"Yes," he answered, carelessly. "I may as well do so now I am here. Ah! there is a man to whom I should like to say a few words."

We stopped opposite to the man whom Müller had pointed out, and to whom he said, after politely taking off his cap,

"I beg your pardon; but you look amazingly stupid."

The person thus addressed bowed in his turn, told Müller that he should hear from him, and was passing on when Müller said:

"Now do not be in such a hurry, for I should like to introduce my friend here to one of your men."

He stared, for he saw that I was an Englishman; but answered:

"If you will wait here for two minutes I will bring you several, and then you can take your choice."

He left us, and I said to Müller,

"Show me which man you think will do for me, for I do not know how they can fight, and then I suppose the right thing will be for me to call him a fool at once."

"No, no," he answered; "that is not necessary, the fellow will know perfectly well what you want; a simple introduction is sufficient. Ah! here they are."

He selected one of the new arrivals, to whom he introduced me as Mr. Jones, of London.

We bowed to each other, and the ceremony of quarreling was complete; so Müller and I returned to the Kneipe. As soon as we entered we were assailed with a volley of questions as to where we had been, and what we had been doing.

"Oh! nothing particular," answered Müller; "our English friend here wants to fight, and so I have been out with him to help him to select an opponent."

"What! do you intend to fight, Englishman?" said the senior of the corps, as he shook me heartily by the hand; "that is right, old fellow. I am going to fight the day after to-morrow, so are several more of us, and your little affair can come off at the same time. Well done, Albion, I looks toward you." And he poured about a pint and a quarter of beer down his capacious throat.

I likewise bowed, and then refilled my pipe, and sat down again with the rest to finish the remainder of the evening and what beer was left in the cask, for they said it would be a pity to let it stand till morning, as it might get flat. We separated about midnight. I went home feeling like an incipient hero, and very naturally dreamed of nothing but carte and tierce all that night, and if only half the number of duels in which I imagined myself engaged had really come to pass, I might well have called myself the hero of a hundred fights. When I awoke the next morning I must confess that I did not feel quite comfortable; I had, when watching the students' duels, seen cheeks laid open, heads badly cut, and noses slit, and now I was going to expose myself to the very same thing; perhaps I should return to England with a scar right across my face, and then what would the Governor say? I remained in a very uncomfortable state all that day, for although I was by no means a despicable opponent in the fencing-room, where no one can be hurt, yet I could not tell what my sensations might be when I found myself without a helmet facing an opponent armed with a sword a yard long and as sharp as a razor. However, I was in for it; there was no possible way of escape, so I concealed my fidgety state as well as I could, but still could not keep down unpleasant thoughts of gashed faces, and the consequent sewing up with needles and red silk, which constantly came into my head. At supper, too, that evening, I came in for a good deal of chaff, not exactly calculated to inspire me with additional confidence: one man, while examining the bill of fare before ordering his supper, remarked:

"Hm, bifsteck—no, not to-day; an Englishman is going to be slaughtered to-morrow, so we shall have real English bifsteck then, shall we not, Albion?"

Another drew my attention to some cutlets on his plate, and asked how many similar ones could be cut out of me, for he said he had just made a bet upon the subject; and on finding me unable to give him the requisite information, remarked, "Well, never mind, we shall see to-morrow." Frequent allusions were also made to mince-meat, sausages, etc., till the senior kindly put an end to the chaff by calling to me from the top of the table, "Never mind what they say, Albion; if you fight as well in earnest as you do in the fencing-room, none of those fellows who are chaffing you so could touch you; I know the man with whom you are going to fight; you are at least as good a swordsman as he; I will be your second myself, and if you only do as I tell you, all will be right."

After supper he left the room, to see our opponents, and make the final arrangements with them; and during his absence I really could not help casting anxious glances toward the door, which was presently thrown open, and he reappeared.

"All right," he said; "to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock, at the usual place; the others will bring the doctor with them."

The doctor! who to-morrow would perhaps have to try to reunite, by means of needles and thread (or rather silk), the dissevered halves of my countenance. So said my fears and some of my friends; but I determined to banish all disagreeable thoughts, expressed myself perfectly satisfied with the arrangements, and took a long draught of beer to conceal my—delight. I rose the next morning about the usual time, after having passed a rather restless night, dressed myself in the darkest clothes I had, in order that the blood—if any were spilled—might show as little as possible upon them; and after a hurried breakfast proceeded to the Kneipe, from whence we were to drive to the scene of action. Arrived there, I found almost the whole of the corps assembled, endeavoring to pass away the time with the aid of pipes and beer.

"Hallo," I said, "are you fellows all going to cut lectures to-day?"

"Yes, old boy," they said, "to be sure we are; we are all coming out to see you fight."

"But," I replied, "as it is my first appearance in public, I should like as few spectators as possible."

"Nonsense," was the answer; "you know that there are thirty or forty to look on at every fight, and there will be double that number to-day, for every one knows that you are going out, and we never saw an Englishman fight before."

This I did not like at all, but I knew that nothing I could say would make them stay at home; so, as it was now barely ten, and we were not to set off till half past, I lighted a cigar, ordered some beer, and tried to persuade myself that I felt perfectly comfortable. The conversation was of a violent and decidedly sanguinary nature, consisting almost entirely of reminiscences of duels in which one or both of the combatants had been punished with unusual severity, and the senior related to me, with great glee, how he had on one occasion cut his opponent's nose completely off! The vehicle drove up punctually at half past ten; as many of us as could find room got in, and in about twenty minutes we arrived at the ground, where we found the other party and the surgeon. The senior—a splendid swordsman—was the first to engage; and after a very spirited and scientific combat of about ten minutes' duration put his opponent hors de combat by cutting his left cheek quite through. The surgeon immediately sewed up the gash, and the wounded hero was taken home, to amuse himself for the next three or four days with making iced applications to his cheek, and living upon soup, being, of course, most strictly forbidden either to smoke or to touch any beer, which prohibition is about the severest punishment in the world for a German student. As soon as he had left the spot Müller came toward me and said, "Now then, old fellow, go and get bandaged; your turn comes next." I therefore followed him to the room where the duelists were bandaged, stripped to the waist, and was immediately dressed in a coarse linen shirt; a glove made of double leather, with a quantity of thin steel chain between the two thicknesses, intended to protect the hand and wrist, was put upon my right hand, and over that a sort of sleeve about an inch in thickness, formed of innumerable layers of silk, was drawn upon my arm, reaching from the wrist quite up to the shoulder. Over this again a sort of rope, made of old silk stockings twisted, ran all along the outside of my arm, which was thus completely protected. A thick pad was then tied over the axillary artery, a long bandage wound round my throat, and a pair of "Paukhosen," things something like cricket-pads, but reaching nearly up to the heart, strapped on. My toilet was now complete, the head and the upper part of the chest only being exposed. My antagonist was ready about the same time, the usual formalities were gone through, and we faced each other. With a passing thought of what the consternation of the "Governor" would be, could he but see me at this moment, I put myself into position; my adversary did the same; the seconds shouted "Los!" or "Go it!" and at it we went, hammer and tongs, with an energy worthy of a better cause. To my great surprise and gratification, any nervousness which I might have felt before had now entirely vanished; I felt as cool and collected as if I were only practicing in the fencing-room, but at the same time there was an excitement which I had never felt when using blunted weapons. When we had been fighting for about five minutes I suddenly felt a sharp slap on the left cheek, and found that I had not completely parried a vicious horizontal cut in carte, and that the flat of my enemy's blade had struck me in the face, just drawing blood from the cheek. An appeal was, of course, made by the opposite second, and his claim of first blood was allowed.

We all paused for a few moments to recover breath and refresh ourselves with a glass of wine; during which pause my second whispered to me, "If he tries that cut again, and I feel sure that he will, return high tierce as quickly as possible." (This, by-the-by, is considered quite fair.)

I watched for this cut, which he soon did try again; as I had been told, I returned high tierce as quickly as I could: a large lock of my adversary's hair fell to the ground, and in a moment his face was covered with blood. I had given him a smart cut on the top of the head—a cut perhaps four inches in length, which was, however, not severe enough to prevent his continuing the fight; and so we fought on for some time, but without touching each other again, till the referee warned us that the time, which is limited to a quarter of an hour, was expired. We then shook hands, resumed our ordinary habiliments, and, after my opponent's wound had been sewn up by the doctor, left the ground on the best of terms. Thus ended my first duel; but I found the excitement of fighting so very pleasant that I said to myself, as we left the ground, "I'll fight again as often as I can." And I did. I joined the corps that evening, and in course of time became one of the seniors.

WHAT'S IN THE PACK?

It was a lonely looking house, a good distance from any other, and standing at the end of a long avenue, and its only occupants on the day in question were two women-servants and a boy. The time, perhaps, hung rather heavily upon the hands of these three, since the appearance of a queer figure toiling up the avenue was hailed with unconcealed satisfaction.

"It's old Burke, the jagger," said one.

"It isn't old Burke; but he's got a pack any how. How slow he walks, and it's getting dusk; we sha'n't be able to see the things."

The jagger, or bagman, or peddler, whichever name you like best, came up to the door wiping his forehead, and groaning under his burden; and well he might. Surely a pack of such size had never before wearied the enduring shoulders of a bagman. He did not attempt to ease himself of it, however, or to display his wares in the customary manner, but he took off his hat to the women politely.

"Would the mistress take pity on him, and let him leave his pack in the hall or the kitchen—any where, so that it would be safe? And he would fetch it the next day."

Now, the master and mistress were, as we have seen, from home; so was the man who filled the offices of coachman, groom, and gardener, with the help of the boy above mentioned as a sub; and neither master, mistress, nor coachman would return that night. The three servants therefore looked at each other inquiringly, a little curious, and a great deal disappointed.

"What's in the pack?" asked one.

"Oh, it's not a regular pack, but an order," responded the bagman. "A lot of coarse cloth and some gunpowder; nothing that would do to show the ladies. But I am tired to death, and have got to go further. If I might leave it where it would be safe for to-night, I've got a few shawls and things I could bring with me to-morrow when I return for it."

Again the women looked at each other. "Shawls had he got? What else?"

"A few trifles. Maybe a gown-piece or two that would come cheap."

"Well, he might leave the pack if he liked, but he must take it away early the next day."

The peddler entered the hall and prepared to lay down his burden; then he espied the door of a little room which would have been a butler's pantry if the house had boasted a butler. Might he put it there, because of the gunpowder? And it was put there accordingly, the bagman closing the door after him carefully, and warning the friendly receivers not to take a light into the room, or meddle with the pack, because of the gunpowder.

The women went back to their kitchen, and the boy lingered in the hall meditatively, having watched the peddler down the avenue. At last he went to the door of the butler's pantry and took a long look through the keyhole. The last rays of the setting sun streamed in through that little window and fell upon the pack lying in huge state on the floor. Again the boy walked up and down the hall, and again he looked long and anxiously through the keyhole.

Did the pack move a little as he stared at it? What a fool he was, he thought; it was all fancy, of course. Suddenly his gaze became riveted on one corner of the pack, where there seemed to be a loophole, and he saw, as he believed, in the red light, the gleaming of a human eye.

He drew back his own from the keyhole; he shot a bolt into its socket noiselessly, and then he began walking up and down again. He thought about the loneliness of the place, and the helplessness of its inmates; he thought about those two in the kitchen and himself, and about the peddler, and what might happen. He walked till it was quite dark, and he could no longer distinguish the outlines of that mysterious pack; then he went into the kitchen, where the two women were still talking of the shawls and probable gown-pieces.

"Where's the old gun?" asked the boy.

"La, Joseph, what should you want with that? It's up there, over the clock."

"Is it loaded? All right," said Joseph, examining. "Now then, I'll tell you what I want with it: I'm going to shoot the pack."

"To shoot it! Good gracious, what for?"

Joseph looked at the two terrified faces, with his own rather pale, but determined. "You won't squall if I tell you what for, will you?"

"No; but Joseph—the gunpowder!"

"Gunpowder's all my eye. I'm going to shoot it because there's a mortal man in it; and a man doesn't get hisself wrapped in a pack for no good purpose; that's what I say. If you're afraid give me the light, and stop where you are."

But the women crept behind him tremulously, and kept silence while he tried again if he could see any thing through the keyhole. Then he opened the door boldly.

"If the pack's an honest pack," said Joseph, "it won't mind a shot."

Perhaps the pack really moved, or perhaps Joseph was a little nervous, for the last word was not out of his mouth when the report of a gun rang through the room.

A dead silence followed it. Joseph's eyes were fixed in a wide open stare on the pack. Presently a small red spot came oozing through the coarse wrappering; it grew larger. A little red stream trickled down on the floor, and crawled toward the boy's feet. Then he retired hastily, and locked the door again.

His face was very pale. He had killed a man, and it was a horrible thing to do and to think of.

"Now you two lock all the doors, and make them as fast as you can," he said: "that peddler chap won't stop till morning for his pack, I'm thinking. What o'clock is it—ten? Let us put lights in all the rooms, and make-believe there's a party—a regular houseful."

Once during the night, Joseph, standing near a window, fancied he heard a low whistle outside; his heart gave a great jump, and he signaled to the two women to move about, and slam the doors, and make as much noise as they could. The whistle was repeated once only, and then all was quiet. But though the morning light broke in upon the servants, they could not go to bed or rest for thinking of that ghastly thing down in the butler's pantry. Noon brought the master of the house, but no peddler came with shawls and gown-pieces.

When they undid the pack the hand of the dead man was found clutching a small whistle, and he had a belt on, stuck with pistols and a cutlass. It is needless to add that Joseph was rewarded; and some time afterward, one of a gang of robbers being caught in a burglary, confessed himself to be the identical bagman who left his pack at the lonely house, and never went to claim it.

COLONEL KILPATRICK'S RAID INTO SECESSIA.

We illustrate on page 348 one of the many sharp hand-to-hand conflicts which took place on the recent gallant raid of Colonel Kilpatrick, of the Harris Light Cavalry, through Virginia. Colonel Kilpatrick's report—a model of military style—reads as follows:

"YORKTOWN, VA., May 8, 1863.

"Major-General H. W. Halleck, Commander-in-Chief of the United States Army:

"GENERAL,—I have the honor to report that, by direction of Major-General Stoneman, I left Louisa Court House the morning of the 3d inst., with one regiment (the Harris Light Cavalry of my brigade), reached Hungary on the Fredericksburg Railroad at daylight on the morning of the 4th, destroyed the dépôt, telegraph wires, and railroad for several miles; passed over to the Brook turnpike; drove in the rebel pickets down the pike, across the brook; charged a battery, and forced it to retire to within two miles of the city of Richmond; captured Lieutenant Brown, aid-de-camp to General Winder, and eleven men within the fortifications; passed down to the left to the Meadow Bridge, on the Chickahominy, which I burned; ran a train of cars into the river; retired to Hanovertown on the peninsula; crossed and destroyed the ferry just in time to check the advance of a pursuing cavalry force; burned a train of thirty wagons loaded with bacon; captured thirteen prisoners, and encamped for the night five miles from the river.

"I resumed my march at one A.M. of the 5th, surprised a force of three hundred cavalry at Aylett's; captured two officers and thirty-three men; burned fifty-six wagons and the dépôt, containing upward of 20,000 barrels of corn and wheat, quantities of clothing and commissary stores, and safely crossed the Mattapony, and destroyed the ferry again, just in time to escape the advance of the rebel cavalry pursuit. Late in the evening I destroyed a third wagon train and dépôt, a few miles above and west of Tappahannock, on the Rappahannock, and from that point made a forced march of twenty miles, being closely followed by a superior force of cavalry, supposed to be a portion of Stuart's, from the fact that we captured prisoners from the First, Fifth, and Tenth Virginia cavalry.

"At sundown I discovered a force of cavalry drawn up in line of battle above King and Queen Court House. The strength was unknown, but I at once advanced to the attack, only however to discover that they were friends—a portion of the Twelfth Illinois cavalry, who had become separated from the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Davis, of the same regiment.

"At 10 o'clock A.M. on the 7th I found safety and rest under our brave old flag, within our lines at Gloucester Point.

"This raid and march about the entire rebel army—a march of nearly two hundred miles—has been made in less than five days, with a loss of one officer and thirty-seven men, having captured and paroled upward of three hundred men.

"I take great pleasure in bringing to your notice the officers of my staff, Captain P. Owen Jones, Captain Armstrong, Captain M'Irvin, Dr. Hackley, and Lieutenant Estis, especially the latter, who volunteered to carry a dispatch to Major-General Hooker. He failed in the attempt, but, with his escort of ten men, he captured and paroled one major, two captains, a lieutenant, and fifteen men. He was afterward himself captured with his escort, and was afterward recaptured by our own forces. He arrived this morning. I can not praise too highly the bravery, fortitude, and untiring energy displayed throughout the march by Lieutenant-Colonel Davis and the officers and men of the Harris Light Cavalry, not one of whom but was willing to lose his liberty or his life if he could but aid in the great battle now going on, and win for himself the approbation of his chiefs.

"Respectfully submitted. J. KILPATRICK,
"Col. Comd'g First Brigade Third Division Cavalry."

A SCOUT IN DIXIE.

We publish on page 349 two portraits of one of the most gallant scouts in our army—J. W. DAVIDSON, of the Eleventh Army Corps. He is a native of New York, and on the outbreak of the rebellion raised the Star-Spangled Banner on Trinity and St. Paul's Churches in this city. He accompanied General Burnside to North Carolina, and on the capture of Newbern raised the Stars and Stripes on the steeple of Christ's Church in that city, in view of the flying rebels. Mr. Davidson is a sailor by trade, and, as might be supposed from his calling, is a man of cool head, quick eye, and solid nerve. In manners he is gentle and unassuming. As a scout, he is said to be one of the most useful in the service.

TRIFLES.

THE massive gates of Circumstance
Are turned upon the smallest hinge,
And thus some seeming pettiest chance
Oft gives our life its after-tinge.

The trifles of our daily lives,
The common things scarce worth recall,
Whereof no visible trace survives,
These are the mainsprings after all.

CHAPTER IX.

JULIA TOOK MR. Hardie's note and read it:

"MADAM,—I have received a very juvenile letter from my son, by which I learn he has formed a sudden attachment to your daughter. He tells me, however, at the same time, that you await my concurrence before giving your consent. I appreciate your delicacy, and it is with considerable regret I now write to inform you this match is out of the question. I have thought it due to you to communicate this to yourself and without delay, and feel sure that you will, under the circumstances, discountenance my son's further visits at your house.

"I am, Madam, with sincere respect,
"Your faithful servant,
"RICHARD HARDIE."

Julia read this letter, and re-read it in silence. It was an anxious moment to the mother.

"Shall we refer the matter to the man this tyrannyn's?" she faltered. "Tell me yourself, what ought we to do?"

"What we ought to do is, never to let the name of Hardie be mentioned again in this house."

This reply was very comforting to Mrs. Dodd.

"Shall I write to him, or do you feel strong enough?"

"I feel that, if I do, I may affront him. He had no right to pretend that his father would consent. You wrote, and then we shall not lose our dignity though we are insulted."

"I feel so weary, mamma. Life seems ended."

"I could have loved him well. And now show me how to tear him out of my heart; or what will become of me?"

While Mrs. Dodd wrote to Alfred Hardie, Julia sank down and laid her head on her mother's knees. The tone was more hers; she approved it languidly. A long and sad conversation followed; and, after kissing her mother and clinging to her, she went to bed chilly and listless, but did not shed a single tear. Her young heart was benumbed by the unexpected blow.

Next morning early, Alfred Hardie started gayly to spend the day at Albion Villa. Not a hundred yards from the gate he met Sarah, with Mrs. Dodd's letter, inclosing a copy of his father's to her. Mrs. Dodd here reminded him that his visits had been encouraged only upon a misapprehension of his father's sentiments; for which misapprehension he was in some degree to blame: not that she meant to reproach him on that score, especially at this unhappy moment: no, she rather blamed herself for listening to the sanguine voice of youth; but the fact, or must now be repaired. She and Julia would always with him well, and esteem him, provided he made no further attempt to compromise a young lady who could not be his wife. The note concluded thus:

"Individually I think I have some right to count on your manly and gentlemanly feeling to hold no communication with my daughter, and not in any way to attract her attention, under the present circumstances.

"I am, dear Mr. Alfred Hardie,
"With many regrets at the pain I fear
I am giving you,
"Your sincere friend and well-wisher,
"LEAH DODD."

Alfred on reading this letter literally staggered; but proud and sensitive, as well as loving, he manned himself to hide his wound from Sarah, whose black eyes were bent on him in merciless scrutiny. He said doggedly, though tremulously, "Very well!" then turned quickly on his heel, and went slowly home. Mrs. Dodd, with well-feigned indifference, questioned Sarah privately: the girl's account of the abrupt way in which he had received the missive, added to her anxiety. She warned the servants that no one was at home to Mr. Alfred Hardie.

Two days elapsed, and then she received a letter from him. Poor fellow, it was the eleventh. He had written and torn up ten:

"DEAR MRS. DODD,—I have gained some victories in my life; but not one without two defeats to begin with: now then can I expect to obtain such a prize as dear Julia without a check or two? You need not fear that I shall intrude myself on you or on me as a gentleman but I am not going to give in because my father has written a hasty letter from Yorkshire. He and I never quarrel, only a half-face to face before I consent to be miserable for life. Dear Mrs. Dodd, at the receipt of your cruel letter, my kindly worded, I was broken-hearted; but now I am myself again. Difficulties are made for ladies to yield to, and for men to conquer. Only for pity's sake do not you be my enemy: do not ask me to plead for my father's fault. Think, if you can, how my heart bleeds at casting this letter without one word to you, better, a hundred times better, than my life. I am, dear Mrs. Dodd,

"Your unprofitably, but not despairing,
"ALFRED HARDIE."

Mrs. Dodd kept this letter by herself. She could not read it quite unmoved, and therefore she felt sure it would disturb her daughter's heart the more.

Alfred had now a soft but dangerous antagonist in Mrs. Dodd. All the mother was in arms to secure her daughter's happiness quite pro cutes: and the surest course seemed to be to detach her affections from Alfred. What hope of a peaceful heart without this? and what real happiness without peace? But, too wise and calm to interfere blindly, she watched her daughter day and night to find whether love or Pride was the stronger; and this is what she observed:

Julia never mentioned Alfred. She sought occupation eagerly: came oftener than usual for money, saying it was for "Luxury." She visited the poor more constantly, taking one of the maids with her, at Mrs. Dodd's request. She studied Logic with Edward. She went to bed rather early, fatigued, it would appear, for she slept; and she gave the clew to her own conduct one day: "Mamma," said she, "nobody is downright happy, who is good."

Mrs. Dodd noticed also a certain wildness and almost violence, with which she threw herself into her occupations: and a wrathful look about the eyes that told of a hidden conflict. On the whole Mrs. Dodd was hopeful; for she had never imagined the sentiment to be specific for love. To her child on the right road was much. Only the great healer Time was wanting. Time, the repentant sinner which once she owned;" and even Time can not give her back her childhood, though the former can do much.

One day came an invitation to an evening party at a house where they always wound up with dancing. Mrs. Dodd was rather averse to attend: for since that night Julia had shunned parties. "Give me the sorrows of the poor and afflicted," was her cry. They shall not be hollow world jars me more than I can bear." But now she caught with a sort of eagerness at this invitation. "Let me go, dear child," she said, "and bring the willow."

"That's a brave girl," said Mrs. Dodd, joyfully, "I would not press it; but you are right; we owe it to ourselves to outface scandal. Still, let there be no pretense: we must not undertake beyond our strength."

"Try me to-night," said Julia; "you don't know what I can do. I dare say he is not pining for me."

She was the life and soul of the party, and indeed, so feverishly brilliant, that Mrs. Dodd said softly to her, "Gently, love; moderate your spirits, or they will deceive our friends as little as they do me."

Meantime it cost Alfred Hardie a severe struggle to keep altogether away from Julia. In fact, it was a state of daily self-denial, to which he would never have committed himself, but that he was quite sure he could gradually win his father over. At his age we are apt to count without our antagonist.

Mr. Richard Hardie was "a long-headed man." He knew the consequence of giving one's reasons: eternal discussion ending in war. He had taken care not to give his son Mrs. Dodd, and he was as guarded and reserved with Alfred. The young man begged to know the why and the wherefore, and, being denied, redoubled all his art to elicit them by surprise, or get at them by inference: but all in vain: Hardie senior was impenetrable; and inquiry, petulance, tenderness, logic, were all shattered on him as the waves break on Atlas.

"Sic volo, sic jubeo, stet pro ratione voluntas," was the purport of all he could be got to say, and that was wonderfully little.

Thus began dissension, decently conducted at first, between a father indulgent hitherto, and an affectionate son.

In this unfortunate collision of two strong and cultivated natures, every advantage was present on the father's side: age, experience, authority, resolution, hidden and powerful motives, to which my reader even as well as yet; a good position immutable and concealed. Add to these a colder nature and a far colder affection; for Alfred loved his father dearly.

At last, one day, the impetuous one lost his self-command, and said he was a son, not a slave, and had little respect for Authority when afraid or ashamed to appeal to Reason. Hardie senior turned on him with a gravity and dignity a man could wear more naturally. "Alfred, have I been an unkind father to you all these years?"

"Oh no, father, no; I have said nothing that can be so construed. And that is the mystery to me; you are acting quite out of character."

"Have I been one of those interfering, pragmatical fathers, who can not let their children enjoy themselves their own way?"

"No, sir; you have never interfered, except to pay for any thing I wanted."

"Then make me your friend in your power, young man; have a little faith in such a father, and believe that he does not interfere now but for your good, and under a stern necessity; and that, when he does interfere for once, and say, 'this thing shall not be,' it shall not be—by God!"

Alfred was overpowered by th: weight and solemnity of this. Sorrow, vexa ion, and despondency all rushed into his heart together, and unmanned him for a moment; he buried his face in his hands, and something very like a sob burst from his young heart. At this Hardie senior took up the newspaper with imperturbable coldness, and wore a slight curl of the lip. All this was hardly generous, for he was not altogether unmoved; but he was a man of rare self-command, and chose to impress on Alfred that he was no more to be broken or melted than a mere rock.

It is always precarious to act a part; and this capricious was unable than wise: Alfred looked up and watched him keenly as he read the monetary article with tranquil interest; and then, for the first time in his life, it flashed into the young man's mind that his father was not a father. "I never knew him till now," thought he. "This man is σατορχος."*

Thus a gesture, so to speak, sowed the first seed of downright dissension in Richard Hardie's house—dissonum, a fast-growing plant, when men set it in the soil of the passions.

Alfred, unlike Julia, had no panacea. Had any lips, except perhaps hers, told him that "to be good is to be happy here below," he would have replied, "Negative; contradicted by daily experience." It never occurred to him therefore to go out of himself, and sympathize with the social sorrows of the poor, and their bottomless egotism in contact with the well-to-do. He brooded on his own love, and his own unhappiness, and his own father's cruelty. His nights were sleepless, and his days leaden. He tried hard to read for his first class, but for once even ambition failed: it ended in flinging books away with a curse. He wandered about dreaming and hoping for some change, and bitterly regretting his excessive delicacy, which had tied his own hands and brought him to a stand-still. He lost his color and what little flesh he had to lose: for such young spirits as this are never plump. In a word, being wore strait-jacketed into feminine inactivity, while soul of feminine patience, his ardent heart was pining and fretting itself out. He was in this condition, when one day Peterson, his Oxonian friend, burst in on him open-mouthed with delight, and, as usual with bright spirits of this caliber, did not even notice his friend's sadness. "Cupid had clapped Peterson on the shoulder," as Shakespeare hath it; and it was a deal nicer than the bum-bailiff rheumatism.

"Oh, such a divine creature! Met her twice: you know her by sight: her name is Dodd. But I don't care; it shall be Peterson; the rose by any other name, etc." Then followed a rapturous description of the lady's person, well worth omitting. "And such a 'jolly girl! brightens them all up wherever she goes; and such a dancer! did I dance[illegible] with a little Spanish bloke Rosanquet has got hold of, and made his black bolas eyes twinkle like midnight cigars; danced it with castanets, and smiles, and such, a whatdye-call-'em, my boy, you know; such a 'go.'"

"You mean such a 'abandon,'" groaned Alfred, turning sick at heart.

"That's the word. Twice the spirit of Duveray, and ten times the beauty. But just you hear her sing, that is all; Italian, French, German, English even."

"Plaintive song?"

"Oh, whatever they ask for. Make you laugh or make you cry—to order; never says no. Just smiles and turns to the music-box. Only she won't sing two running: they have to stick a duffer in between. I shall meet her again next week; will you come? Any friend of mine is welcome. Wish me joy, old fellow; I'm a gone coon."

* Vilmon bowels of affection.

"ALFRED, HAVE I BEEN AN UNKIND FATHER TO YOU ALL THESE YEARS?"

This news put Alfred in a frenzy of indignation and fear. Julia dancing the catchouka! Julia a jolly girl! Julia singing songs pathetic or merry, whichever were asked for! The heartless one! He called to mind all he had read in the classics, and elsewhere, about the fickleness of woman. But this impression did not last long: he recalled Julia's character, and all the signs of a love tender and true she had given him; he read her by himself, and, lover-like, laid all the blame on another. "It was all her cold-blooded mother. Fool that I have been. I see it all now. She spreads to my delicacy to keep away; then she goes to Julia and says, 'See, he deserts you at a word from his father. Be proud, be gay! He never loved you: marry another.' The shallow plotter forgets that however she does marry I'll kill. How many unsuspicious girls have these double-faced mothers deluded so? They do it in half the novels, especially in those written by women; and why? because these know the perfidy and mendacity of their sex better than we do; they see them nearer, and with their souls undressed. War! Mrs. Dodd, war to the death! From this moment I am alone in the world with her. I have no friend but Alfred Hardie: and my bitterest enemies are my cold-blooded father, and her cold-blooded mother."

The above sentences, of course, were never uttered. But they represented his thoughts accurately, though in a condensed form, and are, as it were, a miniature of this young heart boiling over.

From that moment he lay in wait for her, and hovered about the house day and night, determined to appeal to her personally, and undeceive her, and baffle her mother's treachery. But at this game he was soon detected: Mrs. Dodd lived on the watch now. Julia, dressed to go out, went to the window one afternoon to look at the weather; but retreated somewhat hastily and sat down on the sofa.

"You flutter, darling," said Mrs. Dodd. "Ah, he is there."

"Yes."

"You had better take off your things."

"Oh, yes. I tremble at the thoughts of meeting him. Mamma, he is changed, sadly changed. Poor, poor Alfred!" She went to her own room and prayed for him: She told the Omniscient that, though much greater and better in other respects than she was, he had not Patience. She prayed, with tears, that he might have Christian patience granted him from on high.

"Heart of stone! she shuns me," said Alfred, outside. He had seen her in her bonnet.

Mrs. Dodd waited several days to see whether this annoyance would not die of itself; waiting has one plan in most things. Finding he was not to be tired out, she sent Sarah out to him with a note carefully sealed:

"MR. ALFRED HARDIE.—It is generous to confine my daughter to the house? Yours regretfully,

"LEAH DODD."

A glow came back instantly in pencil:

"MRS. DODD.—Is all the generosity and all the good faith to be on one side? Yours in despair,

"ALFRED HARDIE."

Mrs. Dodd colored faintly: the reproach pricked her, but did not move her. She sat quietly down that moment, and wrote to a friend in London, to look out for a furnished villa in a healthy part of the suburbs, with immediate possession. "Circumstances," said she, "making it desirable we should leave Barkington immediately, and for some months."

The Rosanquets gave a large party; Mrs. and Miss Dodd were there. The latter was playing a part in a charade to the admiration of all present, when in came Mr. Peterson, introducing his friend, Alfred Hardie.

Julia caught the name, and turned a look of alarm on her mother: but went on acting.

Presently she caught sight of him at some distance. He looked very pale, and his glittering eye was fixed on her with a sort of stern wonder.

Such a glance from fiery eyes, that had always dwelt tenderly on her till then, struck her like a weapon. She stopped short, and turned red and pale by turns. "Then, that is nonsense enough," said she to herself, and went and sat by Mrs. Dodd. The gentlemen thronged round her with compliments, and begged her to sing. She excused herself. Presently she heard an excited voice, toward which she dared not look; it was inquiring the whereabouts of Julia and Alfred Airon. With every desire to gratify the young millionaire, nobody knew Alicen Arcon, or had ever heard of it.

"Oh, impossible!" cried Alfred. "Why it is in praise of Constancy, a virtue ladies shine in at least their full credit for it."

"Mamma," whispered Julia, terrified, "get me away, or there will be a scene. He is reckless."

"Be calm, love," said Mrs. Dodd, "there shall be none." She rose and glided up to Alfred Hardie, looked coldly in his face; then said with external politeness and veiled contempt, "I will attend to the song, Sir, since you desire it." She waved her hand, and he followed her sullkily to the piano. She sang Alicen Arcon, not with her classic perfection, but with a purity and mellowness that charmed the room: they had never heard her singing since.

Its spirits are said to overcome the man at whose behest they rise, so this sweet air, and the epoch of evocation it awakened, quite powered him who had evoked them: Alfred put his hand unconsciously to his swelling throat, cast one look of anguish at Julia, and hurried away half choked. Nobody but Julia noticed.

A fellow in a rough great-coat and tattered white hat opened the fly door for Mrs. Dodd. As Julia followed her he kissed her hand, and gave Mrs. Dodd's list, but she did not utter it. They were near home before she spoke at all, and then she only said, with a shudder, "My love, you will not be subjected again to these trials:" a remark intended quietly to cover the last occurrence as well as Julia's open persecution.

They had promised to go out the very next day; but Mrs. Dodd went alone, and made excuses for Miss Dodd. On her return she found Julia sitting up for her, and a letter come from her friend making a pleasant proposal, now vacant, near Maida Vale. Mrs. Dodd handed the open letter to Julia; she read it without comment.

"We will go up to-morrow and take it for three months. Then the Oxford vacation will terminate."

"Yes, mamma."

I am now about to relate a circumstance by no means without parallels, but almost impossible to accurate belief, as nothing is more uncommon and contemptible than inadequate solutions, and shall offer none at all; but so it was, that Mrs. Dodd awoke in the middle of that very night in a mysterious state of mental tremor; trouble, veiled in obscurity, seemed to sit heavy on her bosom. So strong, though vague, was the terror and mysterious oppression, that she started up in bed and called aloud, "David, David—Oh, what is the matter?" The sound of her own voice dispelled the cloud in part, but not entirely. She was awhile, and then found herself quite averse to sleep, rose and went to her window, and eyed the weather anxiously. It was a fine night, the fleecy clouds chased slowly across a silver moon. The sailor's wife was reassured on her husband's behalf. Her next desire was to see if Julia sleeping as she had no particular object: it was the instinctive impulse of an anxious mother whom some fear has seized. She threw on her slippers and dressing-gown, and, lighting a candle at her night-lamp, opened the door softly, and stepped out into the corridor. But she had not taken two steps when she was arrested by a mysterious sound.

It came from Julia's room.

What was it?

Mrs. Dodd glided softly nearer and nearer, all her senses on the stretch.

The sound came again. It was a muffled sob.

The stifled sound, just audible in the dead stillness of the night, went through and through her who stood there listening agast. Her own heart yearned over her child; and she hurried to the door, but recollected herself, and knocked very gently. "Julia, be alarmed, love, it is only me. May I come in?" She did not wait for the answer, but tried the handle and entered. She found Julia sitting up in bed, looking wildly at her, with cheeks flushed and wet. She sat on the bed and clasped her to her breast in silence, but more than one warm tear ran down upon Julia's bare neck; the girl felt them drop and her own gushed in a shower.

"Oh, what have I done?" she sobbed. "Am I to make you wretched too?"

Mrs. Dodd did not immediately reply. She was there to console; and her admirable good sense told her that to do that she must be calmer than her patient; so even while she kissed and wept over Julia, she managed gradually to recover her composure. "Tell me, my child," said she, "why do you act a part with me? Why brave it out under my eye, and spend the night secretly in tears? Are you still afraid to trust me?"

"Oh, no, no; but I thought I was so strong, so proud: I undertook miracles. I soon found my pride was a mole-hill, and my love a mountain. I could not hold out by day if I did not ease my breaking heart at night. How pitiful, how base I am! I kept my head under the bed-clothes, too; but you have such ears. I thought I would settle your mind, if not your conduct and opinions; I wrote as I am: forgive me! pray forgive me!"

"On one condition," said Mrs. Dodd, struggling with the emotion these simple words caused her. "Any thing to be forgiven!" cried Julia, impetuously. "I'll go to Australia. I'll go to Botany Bay. I deserve to be hanged."

"Then, from this hour, no half confidences between us, my child. You carry in your own bosom a much harsher judge, a much less indulgent friend than I am. Come! trust me with indulgent friend than I am. Come! trust me with your heart! I'm sure you've him very much?. Does your happiness depend on him?"

At this point, blank question Julia put her head over Mrs. Dodd's shoulder, not to be seen; and, clasping her tight, murmured scarce above a whisper, "I don't know how much I love him. When he came in at that party I felt his slave; his unfaithful adoring slave; if he had ordered me to slip Alicen Arcon's shoe under my dress: poor thing! poor thing! Who ever loved as he does me? I am dying for him; I am dying."

"There! there!" said Mrs. Dodd, soothingly. "You have mistaken your feelings, my love. I am on your Alfred's side from this hour."

Julia opened her eyes, and was a good deal agitated at such a declaration. "Oh, you do not raise my hopes," she gasped. "We are parted, forever. His father refuses. Even you seemed averse; we have been deceived."

"Me, dearest? How can I be averse to any thing lawful, or which I, your friend, think will give you your happiness at stake? Of course I have stopped the actual intercourse, under existing circumstances; but honorable addresses are not unalterable: your only obstacle is Mr. Richard Hardie."

"But what an obstacle," sighed Julia. "His father! a man of iron! so very body says; for I have made inquiries—oh!" And she was shocked. Mrs. Dodd resumed that the letter, so cold, so cruel! I feel it was written by will most unlike the writer's. I do not think we can be accomplished, so distinguished, at the very university where our poor Richard—hem—is going."

"Little simpleton!" said Mrs. Dodd, and kissed her tenderly; "your iron man is the commonest clay, coolly kneaded by your stern heroic Brutus is a shop-keeper; he is open to the gentle influences, which sway the kindred souls of men you and I buy our sheep, our tea, our gloves, our fish-kettles of: and these influences I command, and will use them to the utmost."

Julia lay silent, and wondering what she could mean.

But Mrs. Dodd hesitated now: it pained and revolted her to show her enthusiastic girl the world as it is. She added, slowly and softly, "I seem to be going to aid all these people to take the bloom from my own child's innocence. Heaven forgive me!"

"Oh, never mind that," cried Julia, in her ardent way: "give me Truth before Error however pleasing."

Mrs. Dodd replied only by a sigh: grand general sentiments, like that, never penetrated her mind: they glided off it as water does off a duck's back. "We will begin with this mercantile Brutus, then," said she, with such a curl of the lip. Julia had rejected her daughter.

"Richard Hardie was born and bred in a bank: one of those banks that, like Aaron's rod, now cowslips nor the nodding violet grows; but gold and silver clink, and things are discounted, and many people are ruined by it. Very lawful use of other people's money. Breathed upon by these 'gentle influences,' he was, from his youth, a remarkable man; measured by Trade's standard. At five-and-twenty divine what he did! His savage free mason, who have read of this! He saved Prince Harry Bubble and the South Sea Bubble. Well, in the year 1825, it was not one bubble, but thousand; rather, it was a froth on a distant lands; companies by the hundred: loans to every nation or tribe, down to Guatemala and Poyais, and the shares of companies and ships were laid on the stocks in one year, for your dear papa told me: in short, a fever of speculation, and the whole country was ablaze with it; my dear, Princes, Dukes, Duchesses, Bishops, Poets, Lawyers, Physicians, were seen struggling with their own fingers for a place in the Exchange: and, at last, good, steady, old Mr. Hardie, Alfred's grandfather, was also seized with the vortex. Now, to excuse him and appreciate the precocious Richard, you must try and realise that these bubbles, when they rise, are as alluring and reasonable, as they are ridiculous and incredible when one looks back on them; even soap bubbles, you know, have rainbow hues till they burst; and, indeed, the blind avarice of men does but resemble the blind vanity of women: look at our grandmothers' hoops, and our mothers' short waists and monstrous heads! Yet I think you have not had so good a laugh at our insanities? Well then, Mr. Richard Hardie, at twenty-five, was the one to foresee the end of all these bubbles; he came down from London and bought his people to their senses by sober reason, and 'sound commercial principles:' that means, I believe, 'get other peoples' money, but do not risk your own.' His superiority was so clear, that his father resigned the helm to him, and, thanks to his ability, the bank weathered the storm, while all the other ones in the town broke, or, suspended their trade. Now, you will perceive, Julia, my sister's ardent and speculative; but Richard Hardie's was colder and wiser than other peoples' old age: and that is one trait. Some years later, in the height of his prosperity,—I reveal this only for your comfort, and on your sacred promise as a person of delicacy, never to betray it,—he fell in love—Richard Hardie was a suitor for my hand."

"Mamma!"

"Do not ejaculate, sweetest! It rather discomposes me. 'Nothing is extraordinary,' as that good creature says. He must have thought it would answer, in one way or another, to have a gentlewoman at the head of his table. And I was not penniless, born entailed. Failing in this, he found a plain little Thing, with a gloomy temper, and no accomplishments nor graces; but her father could settle twenty thousand pounds. He married her directly: and that is a trait. He sold his father's and grandfather's house and place of business in spite of all their associations, and obtained a lease of his present place from my uncle Fountain; it seemed a more money-making business: a trait. He gave me no reason for rejecting my daughter. Why? because he is void of his reasons: that unaccountable Avarice has intelligence: a trait. Now put all this together, and who more transparent than my friend Richard Hardie? He has declined our alliance because he takes for granted we are poor. When I undeceive him on that head he will reconsider—unless, in a letter; No. 2 of the correspondence; copied by one of his clerks: it will be calm, plausible, flattering: in short, it will be—more like a gentleman; though he is nothing of the kind. And this brings me to what I ought to have begun with, our dear cousin Alfred. I have always written in our income for our children's sake; he is bringing home from the Indies during this very voyage, and it amounts to fourteen thousand pounds."

"Oh, what an enormous sum!"

"No, dearest, it is not a fortune in itself. But it is a considerable sum to possess, independent of their grandfather's one's income. It is loose cash, to speak a la Hardie; that means I can do what I choose with it; and of course I choose—to make you happy. How I shall work on what you call Iron and I call Clay must be guided by circumstances. I think of depositing three or four thousand pounds every month with Mr. Hardie: he is our banker you know. He will must likely open his eyes, and make some move before the whole sum is in his hands. If he does not, I shall perhaps call at his bank and draw a check for fifteen thousand pounds. The wealthiest provincial banker does not keep such a sum floating in his shop-tills. His commercial banker, on the semi-chivalrous sentiment in his soul, would be in peril. He would yield, and with grace: none the less readily that he has notes and bills which have been long heavily mortgaged to our trustees, were made virtually theirs by agreement yesterday (I sit late on Sundays within the hours of Mr. Iron's impertinent letter), and he will say to himself, 'Hardie has—poor thing—they call it—this afternoon for not cashing her check, and she can turn me and my bank into the street to-morrow.' Now, my sister, he shall see by my manner the velvet paw is offered as well as the claw. He is pretty sure to ask himself why I have not left my money in his—this old friendship and her fourteen thousand pounds, or—an insulted mother's enmity?" And Mrs. Placid's teeth made a little sharp just audible in the silent night.

"Oh, mamma! my heart is sick. Am I to be bought and sold like this?"

"You must pay the penalty for loving a parvenu's son. Come, Julia, no peevishness, no more romance, no more vacillation. You have tried Pride and failed, pitiably: now I insist on Love and Duty. Julia, it is the best use of our sex to carry nothing out. From that weakness I will preserve you. And, by-the-by, we are not quite so poor, Harry Richard Hardie, but Alfred Now Alfred, with all his faults and defects—"

"Mamma, you are not just to Alfred."

"Is a gentleman; thanks to Oxford, and Harrow, and nature. My darling, pray to Heaven night and day that your dear father's safe return; for on him, I assure you, and him alone, your happiness depends: as mine does."

"Mamma!" cried Julia, embracing her, "what do poor girls do, who have lost their mother?"

"Look abroad and see!" was the grave reply.

Mrs. Dodd then begged her to go to sleep like a good child, for her health's sake; and to be well; and with this was about to return to her own room: but a white hand and arm darted out of the bed and caught her. "What! Hope has come to me by night in the form of an angel, and shall I let her go back to earth unheeded? never! never! never! never! never!" And she patted the bed expressively, and with the prettiest impatience.

"Well let Hope take off her ear-rings first," suggested Mrs. Dodd.

"No, no, come here directly, ear-rings and all."

"No, thank you; or I shall have them hurting you next."

Mrs. Placid removed her ear-rings, and the render pair passed the rest of the night in one long embrace. By the time the young girl's tears were dried; and hope revived, and life bloomed again: only, henceforth, her longing eyes looked out to sea for her father: homeward bound.

Next day, as they were seated together in the drawing-room, Julia came from the window with a rush, and kneeled at Mrs. Dodd's knees with bright imploring face upturned.

"He is there; and—I am to make no fuss? Is that it?"

"Dear, dear, dear mamma!"

"Well, then, bring me my things!"

She was ten minutes putting them on: Julia tried to expedite her; and retarded her. She had her space; and could not go beyond it.

By this time Alfred Hardie was thoroughly miserable. He was no more his father, shunned by Julia, sickened by what he had heard, and indeed seen, of her gayety and indifference to their separation, and, stung by jealousy, and fretted by impatience, he was drinking nearly all the bitters of that sweet Passion, Love. But as you are aware he ascribed Julia's inconstancy, lightness, and cruelty, all to Mrs. Dodd. He hated her cordially, and dreaded her into the bargain: he played the sentinel about her door all the more because she had asked him not to do it.

"Always do what your enemy particularly objects to," said he, applying to his own case the wisdom of a Greek philosopher, one of his teachers.

So, when the gate suddenly opened, and instead of Julia, this very Mrs. Dodd walked toward him, his feelings were any thing but enviable. He stood rooted to the spot, hurriedly. It was too proud to retreat. He stood his ground. She came on with a slight pleasant smile broke out over her features. "Ah, Mr. Hardie," said she, "if you have nothing better to do, will you give me a minute?" He assented with an ill grace.

"May I take your arm?"

He offered it with a worse.

She laid her hand lightly on it, and it shuddered at her touch. He felt like walking with a murderess.

By some instinct she divined his sentiments, and found it a task much more difficult than she had thought; she took some steps in silence. At last, as he was no dissembler, he burst out passionately, "Why are you my persecutor?"

"I am not your enemy," said she, softly.

"Not openly, but all the more dangerous. You kept my sweet, you hid her away, and forget me; you are a cruel, hard-hearted lady."

"No, I am not, Sir," said Mrs. Dodd, simply. "Oh! I know you are good, and will be kind to all the rest of the world; but you know you have a heart of iron for me."

"Your daughter's friend, but not your enemy: it is you who are too inexperienced to know how little you can do, and how much harm you are. It is only since last night I see my way clear; and, look, I come at once to you with friendly intentions. I swear it. I never was serious as you are! I should, perhaps, be calling you ungrateful."

He retorted bitterly, "Give me something to be grateful for, and you shall see whether that baseness is in my nature."

"I have a great mind to put you to the proof," said she, archly. "Let us walk down this lane; then you can be as unjust to me as you please, without attracting public attention."

In the lane she told him quietly she knew the nature of Mr. Hardie's objections to the alliance he had so much at heart, and they were objections, which her husband, on his return, would remove. She had to be changed into a little, and implored her piteously not to deceive him.

"I will not," said she, "upon my honor. If you are not convinced as by daughter is in her esteem for you—notwithstanding her threadbare gayety worn over loyal regret, and to check a torrent of idle tears' tongue—you have nothing to fear from me, and every thing to expect. Come, Alfred, can you say I have been with you? can we understand one another. We only want that to be friends."

This was not to resist; and at his age. His lip trembled, he hesitated, but at last gave her his hand. She walked two hours with him, and left him at the door in confidence, quiet, and comfort his sore heart. His hopes and happiness revived under her magic, as Julia's had. In the midst of all, he was vexed—quite quick made terms, he was not to come to the house but on her invitation, unless indeed he had news of the Agra to communicate; but he might write once a week to her, and indeed a few lines to Julia. On this occasion she he proceeded to breathe her white wrist, and call her his best, dearest, loveliest friend; his mother. "Oh, remember!" said he, with a relic of distrust, "you are the only mother I can ever hope to have."

That touched her. Mrs. Roberts, he had been to her but a little daughter loved.

Her eyes filled. "My poor, warm-hearted, motherless boy," she said, "good, for my husband's safe return! For on that your happiness depends: and hers. And mine."

By now two more bright eyes looked longingly seaward for the Agra; homeward bound.

SYMPATHY.

FELLOW-WORKER, telling brether,
Come into the fields with me;
See! the sheaves support each other,
So with us it ought to be.

Lean upon me in your trouble,
And support me with your joy;
Friendship can a lifetime double,
Hatred will two lives destroy.

Oh! remember, the Eternal
Lays us in one barn together,
When with his right hand supernal
Sheaves of life he stoops to gather.

COLONEL KILPATRICK'S LATE CAVALRY RAID THROUGH VIRGINIA.—[SEE PAGE 341.]

GEN. STONEWALL JACKSON.

We publish herewith a portrait of the late THOMAS JEFFERSON JACKSON, better known as "Stonewall Jackson," in his lifetime a Lieutenant-General in the rebel army.

He was born about the year 1826, in Lewis County, Virginia, and entered West Point in 1842. He graduated in 1846, in the same class with Generals M'Clellan, Stoneman, Couch, Foster, etc., and entered the Second Artillery. He went with his regiment to Mexico, fought gallantly throughout the campaign, and received three brevets for his services in the battles of Contreras, Churubusco, and Chapultepec. After the war he left the army with the rank of Major, and became a Professor of Mathematics at the Military Institute of Lexington, Virginia. While there he married the daughter of Rev. George Junkin, now of New York, and identified himself with the Presbyterian Church. His wife dying, he espoused a daughter of Rev. Dr. Morrison, of Davidson College, North Carolina.

At the outbreak of the war Major Jackson is said to have had some difficulty in choosing where the path of duty lay; but eventually evil counsels prevailed, and he cast his lot with the rebels. The following is an accurate and succinct account of his military career:

He was at first placed at the head of a regiment of infantry, which he drilled so quickly, and yet so perfectly, as to rely upon them at any moment. With this regiment he engaged General Patterson's forces at Falling Waters on the 2d of July, 1861; but the contest resulted in a mere skirmish. At the battle of Bull Run, July 21, 1861, he was asked by General Beauregard whether—his troops being raw—he thought they would be likely to stand. "Yes," he answered, "like a stone-wall;" and stand they did till the end of the contest. From this answer he obtained the sobriquet of "Stonewall Jackson," which has stood by him to the last. He took a prominent part in the battle, it being due wholly to his coolness and skill that the day was taken after a flag of truce had been sent to him. He was soon after made a major-general over his fellows, and he was placed in command of a brigade. He displayed such skill in its organization that he was allowed a separate command to operate in the Shenandoah Valley region. On the 23d and 24th of March, 1862, he engaged the forces of General Shields at Winchester, and fought them from behind a stone-wall. On the first day General Shields repulsed him; but, being reinforced, Jackson again engaged Shields with redoubled vigor at sunrise the next morning. General Shields would have been beaten, so desperate was the onslaught, but for the timely arrival of a brigade from General Williams's division. Thus reinforced, General Shields attempted to turn his flank, but was met by a veritable stone-wall, behind which the rebels picked off numbers of our men. Subsequently, by a desperate assault, the rebel forces were finally driven from the position, but not, considering the numbers engaged, until a fearful slaughter had taken place on both sides.

For some time General Jackson was engaged only in trifling operations at the upper end of the Shenandoah Valley, the change of operations of General M'Clellan's advancing army requiring him to be on the qui vive for a movement to some other quarter of Virginia. On the 8th of May he made a dash upon the advanced position of Generals Milroy and Schenck, at the town of M'Dowell, east of the Alleghanies. After this he set the report afloat that he intended to attack Fredericksburg, then held by General Blowell's corps. While the Union troops in the Shenandoah Valley were congratulating themselves upon the idea that Jackson was not in their front, he suddenly dashed upon their advance, under Colonel Kenly, at Front Royal, near one of the gaps of the Blue Ridge. This was on the 23d of May, 1862, and the success of the movement is too recent in the memory of our readers to need more than a passing notice. For the next three days he was engaged in the pursuit of the weakened force under General Banks, whose masterly retreat saved his army from the fate that befell Colonel Kenly. Banks's force being reinforced, Jackson steadily retreated before them up the valley. On the 31st of May and 1st of June he was closely pursued by the forces of Generals Banks, Shields, and Fremont, operating from different directions, and it was believed that he would be captured with his whole force.

THE LATE "STONEWALL" JACKSON.

It was not properly understood what manner of man had to be dealt with in this pursuit; but it was shortly afterward demonstrated; for on the 8th of June he turned upon his pursuers and engaged Fremont's wing, embracing the forces under Generals Schenck, Milroy, and Blenker. These forces he compelled to give up the pursuit, and the next day he attacked those under General Shields, at Port Republic, likewise causing them to fall back. By the celerity of his movements he prevented the junction of the pursuing forces, and retreated to Richmond to join in the attack upon M'Clellan.

For this operation General Jackson was made a Major-General of the rebel regular army. Leaving a small portion of his forces to amuse the troops in the Shenandoah Valley, he removed his main army, which was further reinforced, to Mechanicsville, near the Upper Chickahominy River. Here he attacked the right wing of General M'Clellan's army on the 26th of May, following up the attack on the 26th against General M'Call, and on the 27th upon General Fitz John Porter, at Gaines's Mill. There is but little doubt that he took an active part in the various battles of that eventful period. He was reported slightly wounded; but the report has not since been definitely substantiated.

After M'Clellan's retreat to Harrison's Landing he moved with his usual celerity toward the Upper Rappahannock. Here for several days he operated against the forces of General Pope's Army of Virginia. Some of the operations finally culminated in the desperate battle of Cedar Mountain, where General Banks stubbornly resisted his onslaught, and inflicted on the rebel army a loss of some five thousand men. Finally, as General Pope, during the early part of August, fell back upon Washington, General Jackson's forces were more or less engaged in the battle incident to that retreat, especially in the raid around the Union army, where he destroyed General Pope's baggage and secured a large amount of spoil.

When Lee's army advanced into Maryland Jackson was appointed to operate along his old ground—the Shenandoah Valley—to clear the Union forces out of that region. He made a demonstration upon Martinsburg, then under General Julius White, causing that force to fall back upon Harper's Ferry, and then, by a combination with forces on the Maryland side of the Potomac, besieged for several days the key of the valley—Harper's Ferry. His was the master mind in this siege, and finally this position capitulated on the 15th day of September, 1862, with all its stores, armament, munitions, and men.

Again he moved his command with celerity, and on the night of the 16th he is reported by General Hooker to have had his forces added to those of General Lee, on the banks of Antietam Creek, and to have participated in that severe contest for the possession of Maryland.

After the rebel army had been driven out of Maryland, Jackson's forces, with Lee's, moved southward toward the Rappahannock, and when General Sumner made his rapid movement to the Rappahannock, General Jackson's force also moved rapidly to keep up with it, arriving in Fredericksburg shortly after Sumner occupied Falmouth. Had the pontoon bridges been ready General Sumner would have occupied the position first, and the slaughter of December 13 might have been avoided. General Jackson held command of the right wing during that fearful contest, and repulsed the left wing of Burnside's army, under General Franklin. For this victory he was promoted to a lieutenant-generalship, a rank equal to our commander of a corps. For some time after this battle he was reported sick; but it plainly appears that, sick or well, he was on the field at Chancellorsville.

At this, his last battle, he again demonstrated his power of moving with celerity. When the movement of Hooker's army first commenced, at the latter end of April, Jackson's command was at Port Royal, on the extreme right of the rebel line, and here he faced the advance of Reynolds's corps. Perceiving this was a feint, he pushed his command across the country, and on the 1st of May attacked with great determination the extreme right of the Union army. Again moving with remarkable quickness, he on the 2d of May attacked the forces under General Sedgwick at Salem Church, in the rear of Fredericksburg, between the Union line and the left of Hooker. He was wounded during this engagement, taken from the field, and his wound attended to by one of his most experienced surgeons of the South; but amputation of the arm was necessary. The operation, combined with other causes, resulted in his death, which took place on Sunday, May 9.

The Herald publishes the following characteristic anecdotes of the man:

He had in his service a negro who had become so used to his ways as to know when he was about to start on an expedition without receiving any notice from his master. When asked how he could know that, as his master never talked about his plans, the negro answered, "Massa Jackson allers pray every night and every morning"; but when he go on any expedition he may two, or three, or four times durin' de night. When I se him pray two, or two, or four times durin' de night, I pack de baggage, for I know he goin' on an expedition."

Another incident is connected with his idea of dying a painful death, and, before the rebellion, this became a species of hypochondria; for he would occasionally fancy his limbs were being paralyzed, first on one side and then on the other.

He had a curious way of holding his head up very straight, and his inevitable response to any remark was, "Very well" while his chin would appear as if it were trying to get up toward the top of his head.

The following item from a contemporary, if true, will illustrate the character of the soldier:

"During the battle of Chapultepec, where he commanded a section of Magruder's battery, attached to Pillow's division, he was ordered by that pitiful commander to withdraw his section, as, according to Pillow's cowardly idea, it was too much exposed. Giving no heed whatever to the General's order, he pulled apart through the main area between the above and west, making its exit through the palm of the hand; a third ball entered the palm of the right hand about his middle, passing through, and broke two bones. He was wounded on the Rank Road, about three miles in advance of the enemy. He fell on his horse, and was caught by Captain Worsley, to whom he remarked, "All my wounds are by my own men." He had given orders that, if he fell, his body should be cut into small pieces by the men. This strong-willed officer appeared ahead of him, and he turned to ride back. He was met by one cried out, "Cavalry, charge!" and immediately the regiment fired. The whole party broke forward to ride through the men, and among them Captain Boswell was killed, and another through the line by his horse, and fell among our own men. Colonel Gould, Chief of Staff, was wounded by his side. Two couriers were killed. Major Pendleton, Lieutenant Morrison and Smith, escaped unhurt. General Jackson was immediately placed on a litter and started for the rear, being attracted the attention of the enemy, and was rescued by both lines. One litter-bearer was shot down, and the General fell from the shoulders of the men, receiving a severe contusion, adding to the injury of the arm, and injuring his side severely.

The enemy's fire of artillery on this point was terrible. General Jackson was left for five minutes, until the fire slackened; then placed in an ambulance, and carried to the field hospital at Wilderness Run. He lost a large amount of blood, and at one time told Dr. McGuire he thought he was dying, and would have died by bleeding, a tourniquet was immediately applied. For two hours he was near sinking from shock. As he began to recover from the field, frequent inquiries were made by the soldiers, "How are they there?" He will be told, then, "Do not tell the troops I am wounded."

After the tremendous exhaustion war held between Drs. Black, Coleman, Wells, and McGuire, and amputation was agreed upon. He was asked, "Will the amputation necessary shall it be done at once?" He replied, "Yes, certainly; I don't do for me what I would do what I think is right." The operation was performed while he was under the influence of chloroform, and borne well. He slept on Sunday morning, was cheerful, and was doing well. On Sunday he was carried to Guinea Station house, near Guiney's depot. He was cheerful; talked about the battle, gallant bearing of General Gould's men; said that his Major-General's commission ought to date from Saturday night, because of the charge of his skirmishers; of J. ALL THAT IT CLAIMS TO BE.

So many compounds for the hair are offered for sale and unduly praised, that we confess we had no expectation of finding in Barnett's Cocaine the qualities which it was said to possess. In this we have been disappointed. Members of our family who have tried it, indorse it as possessing superior hair-dressing properties; while its freedom from greasiness, the lustre that it imparts to hair, and its economy, have given it a permanent place on the toilet table.

We have no hesitancy in recommending it as being equal to all that it claims to be.—Chicago New Covenant.

A CARD.

Owing to the increased cost of all material used in the manufacture of Cocaine and our other preparations, we have been compelled to advance the price. Our standard QUANTITY AND QUALITY will remain unimpaired.

HUBBARD BRO'S

CHRONOMETERS OF WATCHES

NEW YORK.

Have the pleasure of announcing to their numerous Friends and Patrons in the Army, that they are prepared to fill orders and transmit parcels by mail, with the utmost care and promptitude. Watches so forwarded are registered; we take upon ourselves all risks of transportation, and guarantee a safe delivery. Just received, by European steamers, several large importations of that deservingly popular novelty, the

Railway Timekeepers,

WITH HEAVY STERLING SILVER CASES, ESPECIALLY ADAPTED FOR ARMY SALES! From Lardner's Illustrated Newspaper of Feb. 21, 1863, says: "HUBBARD'S TIMEKEEPER as heretofore, stands pre-eminent for accuracy and reliability. They are particularly valuable for officers in the army and navy." The Army and Navy Gazette, of Philadelphia, in its Number of May 9th, having fully tested, says: "We are pleased to see that this importation of the Hubbard Bros. is meeting the encouragement which such extraordinary enterprise as theirs so richly merits. These watches are novelties produced by no other house, for combining the highest degree in point of accuracy and elegance. Fidelity and promptness to their patrons appear to be a cause a desirable name for theirs in the Army. The RAILWAY TIMEKEEPER has HEAVY STERLING SILVER CASES, and is a perfect time-keeper, handsomely and handsomely finished, with superior regulated movement, warranted to keep correct time, and will be sent to any part of the country by mail, post-paid, for $25. Registered for postage. Should retail readily at from $70 to $80. Sold to quantities of less than six. Also the celebrated

MAGIC TIME OBSERVER.

THE PERFECTION OF MECHANISM, BEING A LADY'S OR GENTLEMAN'S WATCH IN ONE, AND A HUNTING AND OPEN FACE COMBINED, WITH PATENT LEVER MOVEMENT. The N. Y. Illustrated News, in its issue of Jan. 10th, 1863, on page 19, voluntarily says: "We have been shown a most pleasing novelty, of which the HUBBARD Bros., of New York, are the sole importers. It is called the MAGIC TIME OBSERVER, and is a Hunting and Open Face Watch combined. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest time-piece for general and reliable use ever offered. It has within it and connected with its machinery, its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The cases of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outer one being fine 18 carat gold. The finest movement action lever movement, and is warranted an accurate timekeeper. Price, extremely cheap, for cash or half dozen, $200. Sample Watches, in neat morocco boxes, for those preparing to forward wholesale, $25. If sent by mail the postage is 36 cents.

☞ Watches REGISTERED IN ADVANCE IN ALL INSTANCES. Remittances may be made in United States money or draft payable to our order; if sent by express or mail, in a registered letter at our risk. No Circulars or Agents.

☞ Watches FOR THE ARMY CAN NOW BE FORWARDED BY MAIL. ☜ Address

CHLOSAMA, OR MOTH PATCHES.

Blemishes on the face, called Moth, are very annoying, particularly to ladies of light complexion, as the discolored spots are then more distinguishable. Unsightly on brunettes, but they contribute greatly in marring the beauty on others; and any thing that will remove such patches without injuring the skin in manner or complexion, must be hailed as a boon. The subscriber would call attention to the Tonic, prepared by Dr. Swayne, of Philadelphia, for removing Moth Patches, Freckles, and Tan from the face without injury to either texture or color of the skin. His counsel is free, either personally or at his specialty.—DISEASES OF THE SCALP and LOSS OF HAIR are treated with unparalleled success by the NEWLY DISCOVERED FOR full particulars, address, enclosing stamp, to

Duryea's Maizena

Was the only "preparation for food from Indian Corn" that received a medal and honorable mention from the Royal Commissioners, the competition of all purporting manufacturers of "Corn Starch" and "Prepared Corn Flour" of this and other countries notwithstanding. The food and luxury of the age, without a single fault. One trial will convince the most sceptical. Makes Puddings, Cakes, Custards, Blanc Mange, &c., without isinglass. 40% less or as good as a cost saleratus or cream tartar meal. A slight addition to ordinary Wheat Flour greatly improves Bread, Rolls, &c. It is also excellent for thickening sweet sauces, gravies for fish and meat, soups, &c. Sold by Grocers, who can compare with it. A little boiled in milk with chocolate rich Cream for coffee, chocolate, tea, &c., makes a delicious second luncheon for children much relished by grown persons. A most delicious article of food for children and invalids of all ages. For sale by Grocers and Druggists everywhere.

HOSTETTER'S
CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS.

TO THE DEBILITATED AND THE DECREPID.—For general debility and exhaustion of the powers of nature, whether occasioned by sickness, fast living, constitutional decay, old age, or any other physical or mental cause, the one thing needful and indispensable is HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS. When the first of life seems to be absolutely dying out in the system, and the mind, sympathizing with the body, is reduced almost to a state of imbecility, this mighty restorative seems, as it were, to lift the sufferer out of the Slough of Despond, and recruit and re-invigorate both the frame and the intellect. An old Servant, in the Valley of the Susquehanna, writes thus to Dr. Hostetter: "I can compare the operation of your Bitters upon me to nothing but the effect of a rain after a long dry spell in the fall of the year. The rain falling on the parched earth starts the second crop of grass, and your wholesome medicine seems to have started the second growth of life and spirits in me." And this is truly the effect of this grateful and powerful preparation. Lassitude of weak constitutions, or whose vitality has been impaired by sickness or age, find it a most efficacious and delightful tonic, and all who suffer from habitual costiveness or marasmus or wasting of the flesh, to young children, it is, in a much safer and surer method for the nerve system than any thing advertised specially for that purpose.

AYER'S
Cherry Pectoral

For the Rapid Cure of

COUGHS, COLDS, HOARSENESS,

INFLUENZA, BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING-

COUGH, CROUP, ASTHMA, AND

and for the relief of consumptive patients in advanced stages of the disease.

We need not speak to the public of its virtues. Through-out every town, and almost every hamlet of the American States, the wonderful cures of pulmonary complaints have made it universally known. Also, few are the families in any civilized country on this continent without some personal experience of its efficacy; and fewer yet the communities in which there have not among them some living trophy of its victory over the most dangerous diseases of the throat and lungs.

While it is the most powerful antidote yet known to human skill for the cure of the dangerous diseases of the pulmonary organs, it is also the pleasantest and safest to use of all medicines prepared for infants and young persons. Parents should have it in store against the insidious enemy that steals upon them unprepared. We have abundant grounds to believe the Cherry Pectoral saves more lives by the consumption of Consumption than those it cures. Keep it by you, and cure your colds while they are curable, nor neglect them, for you would still cure yourself of the incurable disease, fastened on the vitals, eats your life away. All know that the fatality of lung disease is due to delay. Use the right antidote at the right time, and be sure to do this, for upon them it is still made the best in use. We spare no cost, no toil to produce it the most perfect possible, and thus afford those who rely on it the best agent which our skill can furnish for their cure.

Prepared by Dr. J. C. AYER,
Practical and Analytical Chemist,
Lowell, Mass.

And sold by all Druggists and Dealers in medicine everywhere.

Pure Blood Cures.

When the bile has not the requisite healthy qualities, we become costive. To restore the bile to a state of health, the blood must be purified. You can not purify the blood with cathartics and purgatives, and they should be resorted to for several days in succession, then there may be a greater or less interval of rest. Some persons have used BRANDRETH'S Pills every day in small doses until they became cured of costiveness, which had troubled them for over twenty years. The use of this medicine does not debilitate or require an increase of dose from continued use. They in fact strengthen the bowels as exercise does the arms or legs.

DANIEL J. TENNEY, of Astor House, New York, cured himself of costiveness of ten years standing by their use alone.

MR. COOK, Editor of Democratic Banner, Bennington, Vermont, cured of costiveness and dyspepsia by BRANDRETH'S Pills, when all other medicines had failed, and when his doctors pronounced him incurable.

MR. BLISS, of Bathwick, cured of debility and costiveness by BRANDRETH'S Pills, when he despaired of ever regaining his health.

Remember reference will be given to persons whom BRANDRETH'S Pills have cured of costiveness of over twenty years duration, and in cases where no natural action of the bowels had taken place in twenty years.

COLONEL GRIERSON, SIXTH ILLINOIS CAVALRY.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY JACOBS, OF NEW ORLEANS.—[SEE PAGE 354.]

On the previous page we give a portrait of the new famous COLONEL GRIERSON, of the Sixth Illinois Cavalry, whose magnificent raid through Mississippi has won him such fame. The following is a sketch of the Colonel's life:

Colonel Benjamin H. Grierson is a native of Pennsylvania, having been born in Pittsburg in the month of July, 1837. Consequently he is nearly thirty-six years of age. As a very early age he removed to Trumbull County, Ohio, in which State he resided for nearly fifteen years, and has moved to Jacksonville, Illinois, where he was when the present war broke out. He was in the produce business, and, to use his own words, "was on a mission," being able to play on any instrument from a jews-harp to a hand-organ. Shortly after hostilities commenced he left for Cairo to join a company that had been raised in his town; but on arriving there he was sent on duty as an General Prentiss. When the Sixth Illinois cavalry was organized he was elected Major of that regiment, but remained on detached service as aid to General Prentiss, with whom he was very much a favorite. On the 1st of March, 1863, when Colonel Cavanaugh resigned, Major Grierson was unanimously elected by the officers to fill his place, and in December, 1862, he was ordered to command the first brigade of cavalry, consisting of the Sixth and Seventh Illinois and Second Iowa regiments. Colonel Grierson, as will be remembered, has been engaged in all the cavalry skirmishes and raids of West Tennessee and Northern Mississippi, and in every affair has been successful. His officers and men worship him almost, and are ready to follow wherever he will lead.

THE SINEWS OF WAR.

UP to the time we write over $110,000,000 have been subscribed and paid for to the United States loan known as the "Five-Twenties," and the indications are that by 1st July, when the subscription closes, the aggregate amount subscribed will not fall short of $250,000,000. The people of the United States are of their own accord going day by day to the various treasuries, and lending the Government more money while the war is costing. So liberal are these subscriptions, and so steadily does the money pour in, that the Loan has been doubled in size and the issue of legal-tender paper, leaving the amount afloat about $400,000,000. The chief cause of these large loans is Government's own revival of confidence, and a general belief that we have engaged in the war as a settled business, that we shall go on with it until we accomplish our purpose, and that when that purpose is accomplished no security in the world will compare in value with a United States bond.

The success of the financial policy is the bitterest of all the bitter pills which our enemies are swallowing. At the South it was proclaimed when the war began—and the confidence was widely repeated and indorsed among Southern sympathizers at the North—that the war would ruin the United States, and that great would grow in our streets. A Southern statesman, who had entertained these views, and who spent the last two years at the South, arrived last week in Philadelphia; and when he met and saw him the evidences, not of ruin and decay, but of increased activity, business, and prosperity, and congratulated him with the melancholy news he had just witnessed in his own country, he burst into tears over the execrable folly which caused the war.

Abroad, the opinion was unanimous, when the war began, that we were all going to "smash up" in a few weeks. The money writer of the London Times, who has been the most accurate and unscrupulous of our defamers, said, in May or June, 1861, in a letter to the Commercial Advertiser of this city, that the true friends of the United States in England—among whom he counted himself—were determined to prevent the negotiation of a United States loan in London. From the conviction that without money in Europe "this insane war" would come to an end in ninety days. Similar opinions were expressed in letters of every leading London banker and merchant to his correspondent here. When the year 1861 passed without an attempt being made to negotiate a loan abroad, a great deal of astonishment and disappointment was felt by these "friends of the United States;" but the London Times writer consoled himself by proving once a week, to his own satisfaction, that our financial system was all wrong, and that we must collapse within a few weeks. These cheerful prophecies were repeated at intervals, and re-echoed in the minor press, and by the politicians of England, throughout the year 1862. British examples in the way of financial independence of this country found vent in vile abuse of Mr. Chase, and loud warnings of our coming ruin. As, however, make the close of that year, we had neither collapsed, nor stopped the war for want of money, nor gone to London to ask a change made upon the great European sentiment. In spite of the warnings of our "friend" of the London Times, some farsighted Englishmen began to invest money in United States Bonds; and early in 1863 representatives of German and French bankers formally proposed to Mr. Chase to take a new loan of $100,000,000. They were at once politely informed that the United States Government did not contemplate any negotiations abroad, and that foreigners who desired to invest their money in our securities must purchase them in this market. Such astonishing language from a finance minister, whose system, according to all sound British rule and precedent, ought to have broken down two years before, drove the London Times and our other "friends" to a pitch of frenzy. But the Times writer was equal to the emergency. He immediately announced that Mr. Chase had sent agents to London to negotiate a loan of $50,000,000, and proceeded, in grave terms, to warn the public not to be subscribed to the cotton loan against the folly of taking United States securities. Of course there was not the least shadow of foundation for the statement. No person whosoever has been authorized by our Government to sell a dollar's worth of bonds abroad. But the lie served its purpose for a time, and helped to keep up the delusion that our finances needed foreign aid.

What exasperates these English writers more than any thing else is, that while the entire upper crust of society, including all the leading journals, appears to be thoroughly devoted to the Southern cause, and heartily bent on believing and propagating every imaginable falsehood about us, our cause, and our condition, the British masses steadily refuse to be believed. The emigration from Great Britain to this country is double what it ever was before. Instead of two steamers a week, four have been put on the line between Liverpool and Queenstown, and all classes of sailing vessels are sailing with full passenger lists. The Irish papers say that the people are doing a fine business in carrying emigrants to the sea-ports. And worst of all, as the emigrants walk to the quays to embark, "the true American" cheers with bands, and the crowd gives three cheers for the United States, and three groans for the British Government."

Under these circumstances we think we can let our "friend" of the London Times and his confederates lie about us to their heart's content.

SYMPTOMS OF CAVING-IN.

COLONEL GRIERSON, the man who rode 800 miles through the rebel country, and brought his command out safe at Baton Rouge, said, on coming into the lines, that he seemed to be surprised him more than the utter hollowness of the rebellion. It was, as he expressed it, a mere crust—an empty shell. A similar remark was used to us by the Confederate officer who was taken prisoner at Fredericksburg and carried to Richmond. He said that the rebellion was a mere sham, with a few conspicuous leaders, but nothing but rottenness and decay within; and that the rebels themselves were waiting for a good excuse to give up a cause in which they had long since lost faith and heart.

The opinions thus formed by intelligent observers, from a survey of general facts and individual cases, did but to be confirmed by practical evidence before very long, especially if Vicksburg fails. In no less than three States of the prescribed Southern Confederacy, we are told, have not the least powerful, measures of reconstruction are now actually in progress.

In North Carolina there is no attempt to conceal the growing hostility which prevails between the controlling party in the State and the rebel Government at Richmond. Governor Vance, who was accused of Unionism before his election, and probably owed a good many votes to the accusation, permits his organ to denounce the Richmond Government for sending 80,000 North Carolina troops from his army, and to openly discuss the advantages of a withdrawal from the rebel Confederacy. The leaders are the views of the party in power in the Old North State, an argument like the fall of Vicksburg or the defeat of Lee would certainly embolden to open assault. The Unionists are known to begin to inquire whether, after all, the old Union did not answer better than its pseudo-successor. They are beginning with names, and the inquiry from such a man as John A. Gilmer, of Goldsborough.

In Louisiana the wheel is being sifted from the chaff, and in a short time there will be few men within the productive regions of that State who have not taken the oath of allegiance. Wherever the Federal authority in any of the places may be, they can not wait for Jeff Davis forever. And after a year of military rule there must be considerable reaction to the Government, and go on with the business of raising sugar and cotton. Accordingly we learn that several members of the leading planting families river and in the Opelousas country have taken place, and that the prevailing sentiment was a willingness to accept the situation, and make the best of it. Many of them, no doubt, still hanker after the slave confederacy. But as wishes of this kind are plainly futile, like sensible men, the planters abandon them, and are trying to find out what is next best to be done. They would all like to keep their slaves. But as this can not be done, they are very wisely maturing plans of negro apprenticeship under the advice of General Banks. Altogether the prospect is that, by the time the cotton crop is ready for picking, the leading planters of Louisiana—who have not registered themselves as enemies of the United States, and hence been sent out of the country—will be honestly for supporting the old flag, and that free negro labor will be in full operation on very many estates along the Mississippi, the Red River, and its tributaries.

The situation in Georgia is still more suggestive. The Georgians have never had their hearts in this business of rebelling. They were a bold and prosperous people, did not need to better their condition as South Carolina and Virginia did, and had sense enough to know when the game was up. Their leading man, Alexander H. Stephens, resisted secession to the last. Even when they were dragged into the vortex, they followed the lead of their resolutent little neighbor with marked reluctance. They resisted the conscription law, and threatened to withdraw their volunteers from Jeff Davis's army. They were very reluctant to surrender to Jeff Davis arms which he considered requisite for the defense of his State. And more recently, it having been proposed that the credit of the Confederate Bonds—now seriously impaired—should be strengthened by their indorsement by the several States of the Confederacy, Georgia peremptorily refused to lend her credit for such a purpose. It appears that the discussion on this subject was very acrimonious, and that at last the policy of the rebel government came to be so freely canvassed, that some one proposed and the Legislature agreed to call a convention to consider and decide the relations of the State of Georgia toward the Confederate and the United States. The election of members of this convention is now proceeding. The Georgians have especial reasons for being dissatisfied with the rebel government. As we said above, they have always been a prosperous people, and have consequently felt the privations imposed by the blockade and the war with less equanimity than their poorer neighbors. Again, the captain of the Rebel Privateer recently sealed the port of Savannah. The people of that city have thus had the mortification of seeing grass grow in their streets and their wharves, while Charleston was doing a thriving business with the help of blockade-runners. Enterprise, which was always more lively in Georgia than in any other Southern State, chafes bitterly at the paralyzing effect of the war. A dozen projected railways and canals have been abandoned; and, though the iron-clads finished by Georgia has not been run by the invaders, it is distinctly understood that a time will come, if the war lasts, when Georgia must share the fate of Virginia and Tennessee. It was, doubtless, these considerations which led to the call of a new convention. What may be the result of its deliberations it would be rash to endeavor to predict. But it is quite safe to say that the debates and conclusions will possess no ordinary interest.

THE LOUNGER.

IMPORTANT TO SUBSCRIBERS AND NEWS-DEALERS.

Upon the 3d of March, 1863, the President of the United States approved an important postal act, which goes into effect on and after June 30.

By this act the publishers of Harper's Magazine to any part of the United States is SIX CENTS per quarter, or TWENTY-FOUR cents per year.

Upon the Weekly FOUR cents per quarter, or TWENTY cents per year.

Upon Harper's Pictorial History of the Rebellion two cents per number.

Our readers are reminded that the next quarterly payment is to be made on July 1.

Section 14 of the above act provides that newsdealers may pay the postage upon their packages as received, at the same rate per cent as yearly or semi-annual subscribers who pay quarterly in advance.

FACT AND THEORY.

To say that to treat the rebels according to the articles of the law of war is to wave flags of truce, to exchange prisoners, etc., is a tacit acknowledgment of them as an independent belligerent power, is nonsense. It is playing with names, and the shadow with the substance. The Government is subduing a rebellion; but it does it upon the scale and with all the resources of war. It is waging war against rebels according to the rules of war. Whether it calls it so or not, whether there is a change of prisoners at Richmond, it does not for a moment waive its right of trying and punishing them. It does not, however be may fall into its hands. Whether the Government will exercise the right is a question to be decided upon other considerations. So is the matter of sending Vallandigham or any other rebel sympathizer beyond the lines. How can it be done? asks somebody. Nothing more easy to reply. What are "the lines" of the United States Government upon its own territory, however, is that rightfully and theoretically they are the lines of its territory. But actually part of that territory is held by a domestic enemy which defies the Government. To send, therefore, over those lines an enemy of the Government is only to put its foe in front. When a man like Vallandigham is sent inland into the bosom of the rebellion for which he and his cronies are working, his arrival assures the rebels that the legal men whom they are fighting are unwilling to tolerate even an expression of disloyalty. It is a remarkably constituted mind which sees in such an act the recognition of the rebels as an independent power.

Whether, however, it is worth while for the Government to treat such persons in such a way is a question upon which most loyal men probably differ with the generous and ardent Burnside. The arrest of Vallandigham has given him a notoriety which neither his capacity nor his importance would ever have secured for him.

RETALIATION.

WHEN Jeff Davis says that he shall hang the officers of the colored United States regiments, and turn over the privates to the tender mercies of State laws, he threatens what he does not mean to execute. That he would like to do so, there can be no doubt. That he would like to hang, shoot, and quarter every such officer, and boil in oil every such private, there is no doubt. But his threat will not be executed, because it would destroy what little remaining hope he cherishes of sympathy or obstruction from other nations; because it would blend in one universal outcry of indignation all the voices of the loyal part of the country; and because of this and more retaliation that would fall upon the rebel prisoners in our hands.

It is not for Jeff Davis and his crew to decide what solution the Government of this country shall employ. By our articles of war, it is plainly declared to be the settled doctrine of military law that no arbitrary distinctions can be made among our forces by any enemy, domestic or foreign. If Count Bodisin, in case of war, should discriminate against our soldiers of Dutch or Irish descent, or against the natives of New York or California, she would do so at her own risk, knowing perfectly well that her prisoners in our hands, may by many, would pay the penalty of her temerity.

Jeff Davis is perfectly aware of all this; and he is also aware that the Government and people of the United States are no longer playing at war. The contest is one of extermination. It means, of course, to abide by his choice. If he does not, his talk of hanging officers of certain regiments and conniving at the assassination of privates, is merely the malice of impotence.

A STROKE OF HUMOR.

THE London Times keeps an epistolary agent at Richmond and another in New York, to depict the solemnity and grandeur of a rebellion which aims to secure the unrestricted power of whipping women and selling children. The New York agent lamentingly assures John Bull that "this is a good time coming" when the United States will be ruined, and when neither the aristocracy of England feel the full success of the democratic system, nor the trade of England tremble at the prospect of a rival upon the seas.

But the London weekly purveyor of news which shall comfort John Bull with the hope of our speedy downfall, is a much more amusing gentleman than the correspondent. He does not mean pitiful job in New York. In a late letter the Richmond man says that if we be protracted for three months more, it "will plunge both sections alike into that great ocean of repudiation which is consciously and without a struggle contemplated by Washington, but toward which there is at least great repugnance professed at Richmond."

There is exquisite fun in this solemn falsehood when it is remembered that the guiding genius at Richmond is Jefferson Davis, whose sole reputation in Europe before he turned traitor to his flag and country was that of a repudiator. He defended the repudiation of the State of Mississippi, and sneered at "the crocodile tears which had been shed over ruined creditors." These words, as the New York correspondent of the London Times might practically suggest, would make a very pretty legend for the notes of the "Confederate States," and possibly decorate for them a premium in Lombard Street from dealers who are fond of light literature.

A MASS MEETING.

THERE has been of late a loud vociferation for free speech and personal rights from those who for the last twenty years have engineered and led all the mobs in the city for the suppression of free speech and the forcible obstruction of the most sacred and inalienable rights of men. The immediate occasion of the outcry is the imminent danger of the absolute protection of free speech and personal rights every where in the land. These gentry would like to have free speech for their side, but shall not have it; and to enjoy perfect liberty to deprive other people of freedom.

The arrest of Mr. Vallandigham was a mistake, simply because it was not necessary. But Mr. Fernando Wood and Mr. Isaiah Rynders will hardly persuade the people that there are any other ideas of free speech or any other kind of freedom, except the freedom of white men to enslave black men, out of the party of Mr. Wood and Mr. Rynders to govern the country. And they may be consoled in their ardent love of personal liberty and free speech to know that there is an immense mass meeting at this very time upon the Rappahannock, along the Mississippi, and in Tennessee line, in perpetual session, and it will not adjourn nor dissolve until the flag of the United States shall secure the undisputed control of every conceivable right upon every inch of United States soil; until Mr. Wendell Phillips shall be protected in his freedom of saying in Charleston that slavery is a blunder and a crime, precisely as Mr. Fernando Wood is protected in New York in saying that the colored race is a servile people and ought to be enslaved; and until the personal rights of man, whatever his capacity, the color of his skin, or the race he reads, are as fully recognized in Georgia as they are in Maine.

We counsel the gentry who meet to vindicate the liberty of speech and personal rights will be charmed with this meeting and its results.

FROM ENGLAND.

A FRIEND writes privately to the Lounger from England: "I hope and pray we may not be drifting into war with the North. Whatever may have been the case about the Alabama (whose getting away is no doubt a thing to be immensely regretted by all fair-minded men on all sides), I hope the action of the Government as to the Alexandra will convince you in the North that the Government here really means well; and the extremely tight-minded tone of all Lord Russell's speeches points in the same direction. Roebuck has turned himself into a nuisance.

"No doubt the general drift of English sympathy is with the South in many respects, but not in all. The moral antipathy to a Government professedly founded on Slavery is strong throughout the English mind as a whole. And as to national sympathy in the upper, the bulk of high-minded, right-thinking, and feeling men are disposed to be perfectly fair and reasonable, and in the good old rule of hear and forbear will prevail between the two countries, despite the folly of certain citizens of both. Of course war is possible. But I do not yet think it probable."

The comment upon so sincere and well-meant extract must, of course, be that the British Government could have stopped the Alabama if it had wished to: that Lord Russell's opinion of our war is that it is a Kilkenny fight for independence and dominion: and that the speeches of the Solicitor-General and Lord Palmerston were simply the chicanery of Rothschild, who, now that "Liberalism" is fashionable in British politics, rides the sagacity of the Austrian Government as his pet hobby.

"NO PEACE WITH REBELS."

In a brief and trenchant paper under this title, by Charles Eliot Norton, the whole "Peace" question is stated in a very few words: "The war is, and it is well it should be clearly understood, that this war is not to end with any treaty of peace—any arrangement with our enemies: that it is not to be closed by any special event; that there is to be no celebration of peace; but that, on the contrary, peace is to come gradually, without form, by slow process. For the national authorities have no power to treat of peace with rebels. The war is not between two nations, each of which can become a high contracting party of a treaty. The war is between a nation and rebels against the Constitution, the laws, and the government of the nation."

Nothing can be truer; nothing more simply said. We shall not know what battle ends the war; nor will there be an embassy from Richmond to Washington to make the best terms possible. Terms for what? Terms upon which citizens will obey the laws? Suppose Mr. Fernando Wood's plan to prevail, and the Government to agree to the rebels as he says: "We can't do it. We have tried to compel you to obey the laws and we cannot. Come then into a Convention and tell us on what terms you will stay in the Union." What must their reply be? Simply this:

"Our terms for remaining in the Union would be a perpetual guarantee for slavery every where, and a recognition of the right of secession. But we hate the Union, and as you confess that you can't compel us to come back, we must have an acknowledgment of our independence."

To go into a Convention with rebels before you have beaten them, and with the conclusion that you can't beat them, is to invite precisely that proposition. And those who should call such a Convention would mean exactly that result.

MILITARY STATISTICS.

A BUREAU of the greatest importance and interest has just been established in Albany, under the superintendence of Colonel Doty, the late private secretary of Governor Morgan. It will collect historical data from each of the regiments raised in New York State. It will take account of the organized efforts of the people in various portions of the State, of boards of supervisors, trustees, councils, etc. It will preserve the memorials of the war—flags, trophies, records, correspondence, scattered pamphlets of local affairs, and regimental incidents; and it will procure portraits and biographies with such material it could get cheap and accessible.

With such a programme it is plain that the bureau may be made of the utmost advantage; and whoever knows Colonel Doty knows him to be the man to make it so.

LITERARY PIRACY.

In the second number of the American Publishers' Circular (Mr. Childs) there is an admirable paper upon literary piracy. It reply to the London Athenæum, which lately seemingly said: "English novelists suppose America, with one or two avowed fortnight throughout the entire twelve months. It would be interesting to know how often, in the same time, American publishers make remittances of money to authors in this country."

The Circular, very justly, states that this sneer is based upon twenty-six "season tales." In the list of authors appear the names of Bulwer, Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Collins, Charles Reade, Kingsley, Mrs. Henry Wood, Miss Mulock—all of whom are paid by the American publishers. Compensation, the Circular truly says, is the rule, and cases and mentions all the British authors whose works they are republishing, to whom the leading American houses have paid very large sums.

Then, pushing home upon his sour adversary, the Circular says, "It would be well more interesting to know how often during the last twelve months English publishers have made remittances of money to American authors.....It is not the rule of the trade in England to pay American authors, although it is our rule to pay for authority. .....While Spurgeon has received as much as $5000 in one year from his publishers in this country, Albert Barnes, although his 'Notes' have sold to the extent of several hundred thousand copies in Great Britain, has never been favored by the English publishers with a penny."

The Circular alludes to a complaint made by Mr. Anthony Trollope of the house which issues this paper, and quotes from the reply of the member of the firm whom Mr. Trollope drew into the discussion by name:

"I am confident that we alone (Harper & Brothers) have paid in the past five years more money to British authors for early sheets than British publishers have paid to American authors for early sheets since the first book was printed in this country."

It is a great pity that each party can not be satisfied. But in the absence of any international law no sensible man will attack publishers for not paying foreign authors, who can not protect the publishers from piracy, and who can not gladly pay domestic authors.

ABOU BEN BUTLER.

HERE is a little poem, of which John Bull will recognize the truth and beauty, and which, we imagine, is affectionately dedicated to that friend of humanity:

ABOU BEN BUTLER.

Abou Ben Butler (may his tribe increase!)
Awoke one night down by the old Balize,
And saw, amidst the rustling of the trees,
Making it warmer for the gathering gloom,
A black man shivering in the winter's cold:
Exceeding poor was he, and meek to see,
And to the presence in the dark he said,
"What wouldst thou?" The figure turned its head,
And with a look made of all sad accord,
Answered, "I wouldn't mind it much if you were the Lord."
"And am I one?" said Butler. "Nay, not so,"
Replied the black man. Butler grew more low,
But cheerly still, and said, "As I am Ben,
Thou'lt not have cause to tell me that again!"

The figure bowed and vanished. The next night
Its same shape, surprised strong in Beauregard,
And showed the names whom love of Freedom blessed,
And lo! Ben Butler's name led all the rest!

THE STORY OF A CHATTEL.

"The thing, to remain a chattel, must evade needs that there be no appeal from his master."—TOM RUFFIN, Rebel Governor.

MR. OLMSTED tells the following story of a colored man employed by Captain Janney, General Sherman's staff-engineer in the Army of the Mississippi:

Among the company which was working under him at Memphis, Captain Janney had there was very savage, sharp, industrious, and faithful fellow, who had left his plantation, about twenty miles off. Soon after his good humor had attracted Janney's attention his owner, a rank rebel, came, as they often do with complete assurance, to ask that he should be given up to him. Janney assured him that the country needed his services, and it could not be spared at present. Some weeks after this the same negro came one morning to Janney's tent, and said,

"There's a right good fowling-piece, Captain, and I want to gib it to you."

"Where did you get it?"

"Got 'em on my ole massa, Sah."

"How is that? What did you give him for a fowling-piece for?"

"Didn't gib him me, Sah; I took 'im."

"When?"

"Last night."

"Has your master been here again?"

"No, Sah. I hen down dah, to de ole place, myself last night, and I 'se got a fowling-piece for you. I was a rebel and he ortn't to be let hab a gun, and I ort to take his away from him, as Captain Janney wants it for. He ain't no business wid a gun, he ha' only to shoot our masters wid it."

"What sent you out there?"

"Well, I went dah, Sah, for to get my wife an chile dat was left behind to 'pen 'em nobber way, but I was cheated, and had to go myself."

"How did you get out you try?"

"I'll tell you, Sah. I went my wife and chile; dey was down dah on de ole plantation. Late Sunday mawn, as I got our pay, I seen a white man dis ide cher dah, and he tell me if I gib him de money he would go and get my wife and chile; but I 'spect he gone, Sah, and I gib it to him, but my wife didn't come. So I went myself. My wife hone-ourself, Sah, and I crep up to de house, and took into de winduh; and whilst was open, and I hear de ole man and de ole woman talkin' 'bout me as dey come, I put my head in and dah I see de gun standin by the fi'-place. I crep right in and took and cunn't get out by de same way I got into 'em. Says I, 'Massa, I want my wife.' 'You can take her,' says he, and he didn't say another word nor move in my direction. So I got my wife and chile, and dey come down wid de stile, and we just walk out ob de door; and I hen' de gun in de hand, and I hen' de mare, and he ortn't to hab a gun, Captain. You'll take it, Sah, 'cause I says so."

"Yes, I'll turn it in for you."

GENERAL GRANT AND SOME WESTERN HEROES.

MR. FREDRICK LAW OLMSTED, in a letter, draws these pleasant portraits of men in whom we are all interested:

"Grant is a modest head-quarters ass on the Magnolia, and he lives in the ladies' cabin. There is a sentry, or lounger for ever at his door-step, and he begs none from going on board, and there is free range in the cabin for any one to and beyond the table which the General, Rawlins, Parker, etc., occupy near the stove. He is approachable and liable to interruption than a merchant or railway company allows himself to be in his office. Citizens come in and introduce themselves; one man saying, 'I hain't got no business with you, General, but I just wanted to have a little talk with you, because folks will say I voted for you.'

"He is one of the most engaging men I ever saw. Small, quiet, gentle, modest—extremely, even unconsciously modest—that General Grant has clear intuitive kind digestion. He gives you the impression of a man of great power, and of capacity and capability under these feminine traits. As a general, I should think his quality was that of quick, common-sense perception, unobstructed by prejudices, and deep, abiding, quiet resolution. The common-sense becomes deeply attached to him. Toward Sherman there is more than attachment, something of veneration, universally expressed, most by those who know him most intimately, from which I suspect that he has more genius than Grant."

"Admiral Porter is a gentlemanly, straightforward, and modest sort of man. Brusque, his flag-captain, a smiling, cheerful, and most obliging and agreeable man, but with all this, one gets an impression of strength and grasp of character that when the time comes for boarding and cutting out, he will bear his part with the same ingenuous ease and grace."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A few days since a tow-error took in charge a lot child, and, proceeded to beat up his parents. On being asked by a lady what the matter was, he replied, "Here's an orphan child, marm, and I'm trying to find its parents."

"You don't look a-miss," to the young lady said to her boss, when he had got her home at.

A SHORT NOVEL.—Sweet Margaret Fane came up the lane from picking the red berries, and met young Paul, comely and tall, going to meet his father. Stopping, she blushed, and he looked flushed—perhaps 'twas the burden they bore. Then they passed on their separate ways, and at Christmas they were married.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE LATEST FROM VICKSBURG.

VICKSBURG had not been taken at 9 P.M. on 23d, but the rebels had evacuated the north bank the town, their colors were planted on a portion of the rebel works, and the gun and mortar boats were shelling the rear of the fortifications. It is understood that General Grant intercepted a dispatch from Jeff Davis to General Pemberton informing him that 100,000 men by way of reinforcements if he would hold out for only two weeks. We have some reason to believe that the capture of Vicksburg Monnoc; but they are so contradictory, if not purposely confusing, that little can be made of them. Stories were afloat in this city on 27th, evidently echoes of rebel reports, to the effect that General Banks three times repulsed by Pemberton on 22d. Our advices are to a late hour on the evening of 23d, and they make no mention of this.

ADMIRAL PORTER'S DISPATCH.

Admiral Porter, in an official dispatch, dated from the YAZOO RIVER on the 22d inst., details the capture of Haines's Bluff by Lieutenant Walker, of the gun-boat De Kalb, who went down with the enemy, but secured all their guns, ammunition, camps, and equipage. The destruction of property, by fire, and took the enemy twelve months to construct. Admiral Porter destroyed the gun-carriages, blew up the magazine, and destroyed the works generally, which he describes as a not-work of defenses such as he never saw before. He says that there has never been a case during the war where the rebels have been so successfully beaten at all points, and that the patience and endurance shown by our army and navy for so many months are worthy of much being rewarded.

PORT HUDSON BOMBARDED.

Information has been received officially that Admiral Farragut's fleet has been actively bombarding Port Hudson.

AFFAIRS IN TENNESSEE.

The movements of the rebels in Kentucky and Tennessee appear to indicate a certain inroad upon the former States about the 1st of June. On Friday they burned the extensive trestle-work at Hamilton, near Clarksville, Tennessee. General Bragg is reported to be on the watch for an attack by General Rosecrans. He is in a strongly fortified position at Murfreesboro. A dispatch from Murfreesboro on 23d says that General Stanley, with a portion of two brigades of cavalry, surprised the camp of the First Alabama regiment and the Eighth Confederate cavalry, under the command of Middleton, on Friday, divided and sent around to attack the rebels in the flank and rear; but the latter escaped unencumbered. Stanley then dashed alone and unsuspected into the midst of the enemy's camp, and, with his own hand, killed seven rebels. Eight rebels were killed, ninety prisoners taken, and two hundred horses captured. The camp of the enemy, including the arms thrown away by them, was destroyed. Our loss was trifling—only seven of our men being killed, and only three wounded slightly.

THE REBELLION IN MISSOURI.

A dispatch from St. Louis, dated 25th, says that a band of rebel guerrillas captured the town of Richmond, Clay County, Missouri, on 11th, together with the Union force which occupied it. Two officers of the Twenty-fifth Missouri were killed in the fight, and another lieutenant was shot after the Union troops surrendered. It was feared that the whole force would be treated in the same manner. The guerrillas made a clean sweep of the whole town. The court house was plundered to the tune of fifteen hundred dollars. Carroll, on Thursday night, and took $11,000 from the county treasurer belonging to the State.

THE "ALABAMA" BLOCKADED.

The Alabama is at the Madeira Islands, blockaded by the United States steamers Oneida and Johnson. Admiral Wilkes arrived at St. Thomas on the 16th, from Havana on Peace, Porto Rico, and after communicating with Mr. Dayton, the United States Minister, proceeded to Gundaloupe in the Vandrebilt in search of the pirate.

SURRENDER OF COLONEL STREIGHT.

A special dispatch from Columbus, Ohio, to the Commercial says that the members of the Third Ohio Regiment are there given details of the capture of Colonel Streight and his forces near Rome, Georgia. They say the surrender was justifiable, as the ammunition of the rebels was giving an impregnable position with overwhelming numbers.

HOW TAN DORN WAS KILLED.

TAN DORN was killed by a jealous husband, stating that the General was shot in his own room by Dr. Peters. He was shot in the back of the head while writing at his table. There had been a friendly conversation between the parties earnest before the assassin left the confidential executive. General Van Dorn had never seen the daughter of his murderer until that time, and his acquaintance with Mrs. Peters was such as to convince his staff officers, who had every opportunity of knowing, that there was no improper intimacy between them.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

ANOTHER ANGLO-REBEL PIRATE.

It is reported that another rebel pirate cruiser is ready to have the Clyde, under the command of Captain Bullock.

THE REBEL LOAN.

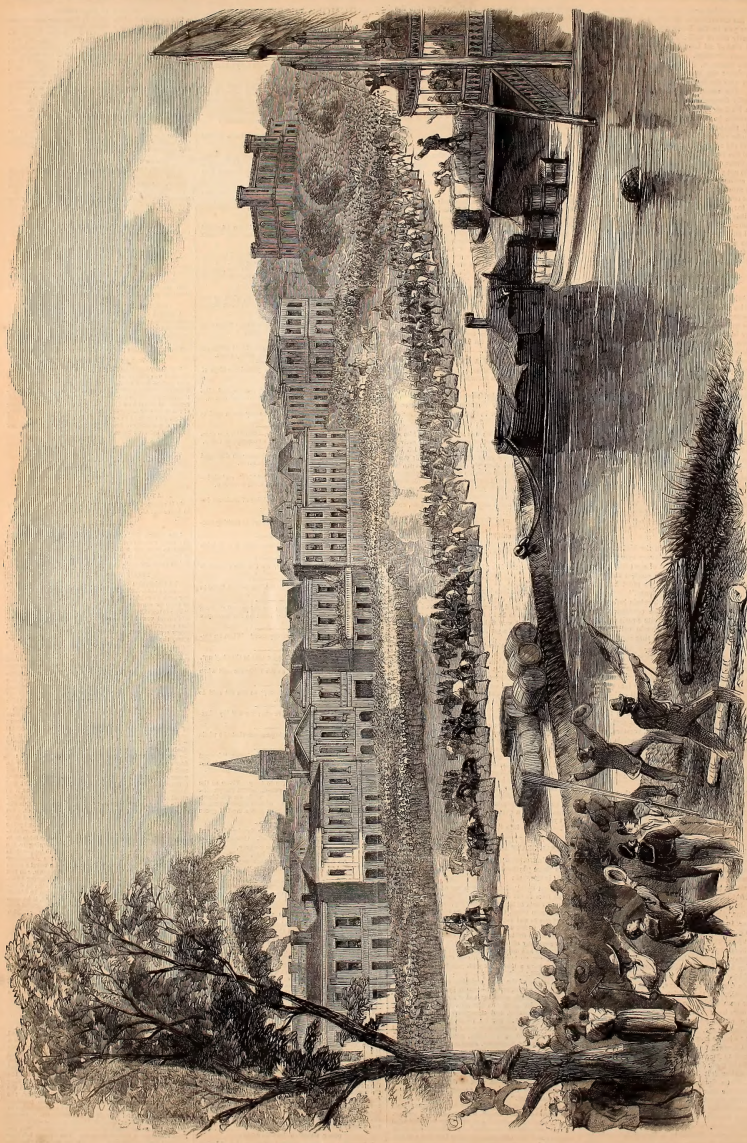
Late reports from this country caused a heavy fall in the rebel loan in London. At one moment it had gone down to four cents discount. The speculators closed at from three and a half to three discount, experiencing a fall of three per cent. in one day.

PROGRESS OF EMIGRATION.

The emigration of Irish to the United States is now so extensive that the number of steamers leaving Cork harbor each fortnight, there will be seven in the same space of time for next month. A late Dublin paper says:

"The Inman Company have increased their sailings by an additional vessel each week, and the Cunard Company has advertised its intention of starting an extra steamer every second week. On account of this increase in conveyance, the Montreal Ocean Company will this month resume their sailings between Europe and Quebec and Canada. Next week the Montreal Ocean Company will dispatch steamship Eidon from Liverpool on Tuesday and steamship Canada on Saturday. On Wednesday will sail the steamship City of Baltimore and Kangaroo, belonging to the same company, and the emigrant agent for following days Queenstown, and on Sunday the Cunard steamship will leave Cork for Boston. The Cork Examiner, of Dublin, a British Tory organ, remarks on this: "From the letters which have been transmitted it is expected that there will be any further consider denials that this increase of transport is drawn off the best element of young men in Ireland for service in the United States army." The Dublin Nation, speaking of the exodus, says: "The exodus of the people from Mayo and from the county Galway's increasing every week more and more. Whether for good or for evil, the stream continues to swell and, few on unobservant, and the emigrant every year be reckoned by hundreds from some localities." A Dundalk paper says: "A large drain on the Government has passed through Dundalk last week on their way to America and Australia. Every train is crowded to the utmost as if to avoid some terrible disaster." The Western Star remarks: "We have not seen so many people in this little district within a week as in Sunday's and Monday to the present. On Sunday last we saw two, miles with crowds and their friends, arrived in Ballinasloe, the former leaving by the evening train. On Saturday and Sunday these same stalwart arrivals—nearly all well dressed and comfortable looking young men and women, evidently belonging to the class of small farmers. The destination of these people is generally New York." The Clare Advertiser and Reporter of the 13th of May says: "We witnessed a novel feature in the last Monday's fair—the train-load of 'Yanks' in full fig," escorting the emigrants to the quay, playing 'Paddy's Day.' 'Yankee Doodle,' 'White Cockade,' etc., in a thrilling style, and with such a martial air as would be highly interesting to the American recruiting agents, if he happened to be present. A crowd of over three thousand persons cheered loudly for American and cheered the British Government."

RUSSIA.



THE POLISH QUESTION.

Prince Gortchakoff, in his replies to the notes of the courts of Berlin and Vienna, and to the French mediation, calls their attention to the influence of "outside" agitation in prolonging the struggle in Poland, and illustrates the effects of the revolutionary movement by allusions unmistakable to the course of Napoleon III. It is said that Russia has conceded to Napoleon the principle that a European congress should sanction on the subject.

MEXICO.

THE SIEGE OF PUEBLA.

Another great battle has taken place at Puebla, and again the Republicans have been successful. After a sanguinary contest, which lasted from Saturday, March 28, to Monday, March 30, the French were defeated with great loss, and driven back with the loss of their artillery and ammunition. The Mexicans, after the battle, pursued the retreating French, and captured one hundred and fifty prisoners. The French left four hundred dead on the field. It is also reported that the French have raised the siege and are in full retreat.

COLONEL GRIERSON'S RAID.

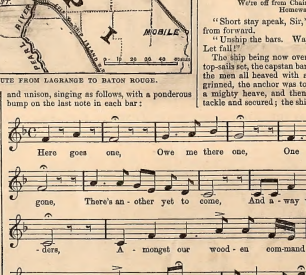
We have not space for a lengthy account of the affair, and it must suffice to say that the brigade commanded by Colonel Grierson started from La Grange, Tennessee, and rode to Baton Rouge, a distance of 800 miles, through the heart of the rebel country. They were seventeen days on the march. They captured over 1000 prisoners and 1200 horses; destroyed for many miles two important railroads, and stores and other property valued at over four millions of dollars; and finally, on May 1, were received at Baton Rouge with great enthusiasm.



VERY HARD CASH

By CHARLES READE, Esq.

CHAPTER X.

NORTH Latitude 23½, Longitude East 113; the time March of this same year; the wind southerly; the port Whampoa, in the Canton river. Ships at anchor reared their tall masts here and there; and the broad stream was enlivened and colored by junks, and boats, of all sizes and vivid hues, propelled on the screw principle by a great scull at the stern, with projecting handles for the crew to work; and at times a gorgeous mandarin boat, with two great glaring eyes set in the bows, came flying, rowed with forty paddles by an armed crew, whose shields hung on the gunwale and flashed fire in the sunbeams: the mandarin, in conical and buttoned hat, sitting on the top of his cabin and lyamoking Paradise, alias opium, while his gong boomed and his boat flew fourteen miles an hour, and all things scuttled out of his celestial way. And there, looking majestically down on all these water ants, the huge Agra, eyesore of so many loving eyes and loving hearts in England, lay at her moorings, homeward bound.

Her tin not being yet on board, the ship's hull floated high as a castle, and to the subtle, intellectual, doll-faced, bolus-eyed people, that rested to and fro busy as bees, though looking forked mushrooms, she sounded like a vast musical shell: for a hasty harmony of many mellow voices vibrated in her great cavities, and made the air ring cheerily around her. The vocalists were the Cyclops, to judge by the tremendous thumps that kept clean time to their sturdy tune. Yet it was but human labor, so heavy and so knowing, that it had called in music to help it. It was the third mate and his gang completing his floor to receive the coming tea-chests. Yesterday he had stowed his dunnage, many hundred bundles of light flexible canes from Sumatra and Malacca; on these he had laid tons of rough saltpetre, in 200-pound gunny-bags; and was now mashing it to music, bags and all. His gang of fifteen, naked to the waist, stood in line, with huge wooden beetles called commanders, and lifted them high and brought them down on the nitre in cadence with true nautical power and unison, singing as follows, with a ponderous bump on the last note in each bar:

And so up to fifteen, when the stave was concluded with a shrill "Spell, ho!" and the gang relieved steaming with perspiration. When the saltpetre was well mashed, they rolled ton butts of water on it, till the floor was like a billiard-table. A fleet of chop boats then began to arrive, so many per day, with the tea-chests. Mr. Grey proceeded to lay the first tier on his saltpetre floor, and then built the chests, tier upon tier, beginning at the sides, and leaving in the middle a lane somewhat narrower than a tea-chest. Then he applied a screw-jack to the chests on both sides, and so enlarged his central aperture, and forced the remaining tea-chests in; and behold the enormous cargo packed as tight as ever shop-keeper packed a box—nineteen thousand eight hundred and six chests, sixty half chests, fifty quarter chests.

While Mr. Grey was contemplating his work with singular satisfaction, a small boat from Canton came alongside, and Mr. Tickell, midshipman, ran up the side, skipped on the quarter-deck, saluted it first, and then the first mate, and gave him a line from the captain, desiring him to take the ship down to Second Bar—for her water—at the turn of the tide.

Two hours after receipt of the order the ship swung to the ebb. Instantly Mr. Sharpe unmoored, and the Agra began her famous voyage, which, by the skilful and active seamanship, for the wind being foul, all Sharpe could do was to set his top-sails, driver, and jib, and keep her in the tide-way, and clear of the numerous craft, by backing or filling as the case required; which he did with considerable dexterity, making the sails steer the helm for the nonce: he crossed the Bar at sunset, and brought to with the best bower anchor in five fathoms and a half. Here they began to take in their water, and on the fifth day the six-oared gig was ordered up to Canton for the captain. The next afternoon he passed the ship in her, going down the river to Lin-Tin, to hand the Chinese admiral his last chop, or permission to leave China. All night the Agra showed three lights at her mizen-peak for him, and kept a sharp look-out. But he did not come: he was having a very serious talk with the Chinese admiral; at daybreak, however, the gig was reported in sight: Sharpe told one of the midshipmen to call the bostswain and man the side. Soon the gig ran alongside; two of the ship's boys jumped like monkeys over the bulwarks, lighting, one on the main channels, the other on the mizen, and put the side ropes assiduously in the captain's hands; he bestowed a slight paternal smile on them, the first the imps had ever received from an officer, and went lightly up the sides. The moment his foot touched the deck, the bostswain gave a frightful shrill whistle; the men at the sides uncovered; the captain saluted the quarter-deck, and all the officers saluted him, which he returned, and stepping for a moment to the weather side of his deck gave the loud command, "All hands heave anchor." He then directed Mr. Sharpe to get what sail he could on the ship, the wind being now westerly; and dived into his cabin.

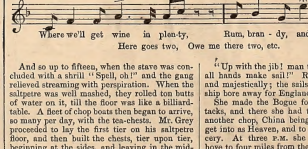
The bostswain piped three shrill pipes, and "all hands up anchor," was thrice repeated forward, followed by private admonitions, "Bear a hand and bitt!" "Show a leg!" etc., and up tumbled the crew with homeward bound written on their tanned faces.

(Pipe.) "Up all hammocks!"

In ten minutes the ninety and odd hammocks were all stowed neatly in the netting, and covered with a snowy hammock cloth; and the hands were active, unbitting the cable, shipping the capstan bars, etc.

"All ready below, Sir," cried a voice.

"Man the bars," returned Mr. Sharpe from the quarter-deck. "Play up, fifer. Heave away!"



Out broke the merry fife with a rhythmical tune, and tramp, tramp, tramp went a hundred and twenty feet round and round, and, with brawny chests pressed tight against the capstan bars, sixty fine fellows walked the ship up to her anchor, drowning the fife at intervals with their sturdy song, as pat to their feet as an echo:

Heave with a will, ye jolly boys,
Heave with a will,
We're off from Chaines, jolly boys,
Homeward bound.

"Short stay apeak, Sir," roars the boatswain from forward.

"Unship the bars. Way aloft. Loose sails. Let fall!"

The ship being now over her anchor, and the top-sails set, the captain bars were shipped again, the men all heaved with a will, the messenger grinned, the anchor was torn out of China with a mighty heave, and then run up with a luff tackle and secured; the ship's head cast to port:

Round she came slow and majestically; the sails filled, and the good ship bore away for England.

She made a quick run, forty-six in three or four tacks, and there she had to come to again for another chop, China being a place as hard to get into as Heaven, and to get out of as—Chancery. At three P.M. she was at Macao, and bore to four miles from the land, to take in her passengers.

A gun was fired from the forecastle. No boats came off. Sharpe sent out to see for the wind, though light, had now got to the N.W., and they were wearing it. After a while the captain came on deck, and ordered all the carronades to be scaled. The eight heavy reports bellowed the great ship's impatience across the water, and out pulled two boats with the passengers. While they were coming Dodd sent and ordered the gunner to load the carronades with shot, and examine each apron them. The first boat brought Colonel Kenealy, Mr. Fullalove, and a prodigious negro, who all mounted by the side ropes. But the whip was rigged for the next boat, and the Honorable Mrs. Beresford and poodle hoisted on board, mother white and baby, icon her black nurse, item her little boy and male Oriental in charge thereof, the strangest compound of disparities that ever sailed: a child of black and white, being clad in snowy cotton and japanned to the nine.

Mrs. Beresford was the wife of a merchant in council in India. She had been to Macao for her boy's health, intending to return to Calcutta; but meantime her husband was made a director, and went home: so she was going to join him. A tall, handsome lady, with too curved a nose. Like most aquiline women she was born to domineer a bit; and, for the last ten years, Orientals cringing at her knee, and Europeans flattering at her ear, had nursed this quality high, and spoiled her with all their might. A similar process had been going on for her boy from his very infancy; he was now nearly six: arrogance and caprice shone so in both their sallow faces, and spoke so in every gesture, that, as they came on board, Sharpe, a reader of passengers, whispered the second mate: "Bayliss, we have shipped the devil."

"And a cargo of his imps," grunted Mr. Bayliss.

Mr. Fullalove was a Methodist parson—to the naked eye: grave, sober, lean, lank-haired. But some men are hidden fires. Fullalove was one of the extraordinary products of an extraordinary nation, the United States of America. He was an engineer for one thing, and an inventive and practical mechanician; held two patents of his own creating, which yielded him a good income both at home and in Great Britain. Such results are seldom achieved without deep study and seclusion: and accordingly Joshua Fullalove, when the inventive fit was on, would be buried deep as Archimedes for a twelvemonth, burning the midnight oil: then, his active element predominating, the pale student would dash into the front of the prairie, with a rifle and an Indian, and come out bronzed, and more or less leparthered or bebuffaloed; thence invariably to sea for a year or two: there, Anglo-Saxon to the back-bone, his romance had ever an eye to business; he was always after foreign mechanical inventions—he was now importing an excellent one from Japan—and ready to do lucrative feats of knowledge: thus he bought a Turkish ship at the bottom of the Dardanelles for twelve hundred dollars, raised her cargo (hardware), and sold it for six thousand dollars; then weighed the empty ship, pumped her, repaired her, and navigated her himself into Boston harbor, Massachusetts. On the way he rescued, with his late drowned ship, a Swedish vessel, and received salvage. He once fished eighty elephants' tusks out of a craft foundered in the Firth of Forth, to the disgust of elder Anglo-Saxons looking on from the shore. These unusual pursuits were varied by a singular recreation: he played at elevating the African character to European levels. With this view he had bought Yespasian for eighteen hundred dollars; whereof anon. America is fertile in mixtures: what do we not owe her? Sherry cobbler, gin sling, cocktail, mint julep, brandy smash, sudden death, eye openers. Well, one day she outdid herself, and mixed Fullalove: Quaker, Nimrod, Archimede, Philanthropist, decorous Red Rover, and What Not.

The passenger boats cast loose.

"All hands make sail!"

The bostswain piped, the light-heeled topsmen sped up the rattlines, and lay out on the yards, while all on deck looked up, as usual, to see them work. Out bellied sail after sail aloft; the ship came swinging round to the southward, spread her snowy pinions high and wide, and went like a bird over the wrinkled sea—homeward bound.

It was an exhilarating start, and all faces were bright; here it is. The captain had somewhat grave and thoughtful, and often scanned the horizon with his glass; he gave polite but very short answers to his friend Colonel Kenealy, having nothings in his ear; and sent for the gunner.

While that personage, a crusty old Niler, called Monk, is cleaning himself to go on the quarter-deck, peep we into Captain Dodd's troubled mind, and into the circumstances which connect him in the heart of this story, despite the twelve thousand miles of water between him and the lovers at Barkington.

It had always been his pride to lay by money for his wife and children, and, under advice of an Indian friend, he had, during the last few years, placed considerable sums, at intervals, in a great Calcutta house, which gave eight per cent. for deposits: swelled by fresh capital, and such high interest, the hoard grew fast. When his old ship, sore battered off the Cape, was condemned by the consuming agents at Canton, he sailed to Calcutta, intending to return thence to England as a passenger. But while he was in Calcutta the greatest firm there suspended payment, carrying astonishment and dismay into a hundred families. At such moments the dross and the fireside ring for a little while with the commonsense cry,* "Good interest means bad security." So for John Dodd till then had existed these great houses with nautical, or childlike, confidence, a blind terror took the place of blind trust in him. He felt guilty towards his children for risking their money (he had got to believe it was theirs, not his), and vowed, if he could only get hold of it once more, he would never trust a penny of it out of his own hands again; except, perhaps, to the Bank of England. To his dismay, but hardly to his surprise, the clerks looked at one another, and sent the check in to some inner apartment. And he was kept waiting. His heart sank within him: there was a hitch.

Meantime came a government officer, and paid in an enormous sum in notes and mercantile bills, principally the latter.

Presently Dodd was invited into the manager's room.

"Leaving the country, Captain Dodd?"

"Yes, Sir."

"You had better take some of your money in bills at sight on London."

"I would, if they were notes, Sir," faltered Dodd.

"Oh, bills by Oliveira upon Baring are just as good, even without our indorsement. However, you can have half and half. Calcutta does but little in English bank-notes, you know."

They gave him his money. The bills were all manifestly good. But he recognized one of them as having just been paid in by the civilian. He found himself somehow safe in the street clutching the cash, with one half of his great paternal heart on fire, and the other half freezing. He had rescued his children's fortune; but he had seen destruction graze it. The natural chill at being scraped by peril soon passed, the triumph-ant glow remained. The next sentiment was precaution; he filled with it to the brim; he went and bought a great broad pocket-book with a key to it, though he was on dry land, he cov-ered it with oiled silk against the water; and sewed the whole thing to his flannel waistcoat, and felt for it with his hand a hundred times a day: the fruit of his own toil, his children's hoard, the rescued treasure he was to have the joy of bringing home safe to the dear partner of all his joys.

Unexpectedly, he was ordered out to Canton to sail the Agra to the Cape. Then a novel and strange feeling came over him like a cloud; that feeling was a sense of personal danger: and that the many perils of the deep were new to him: he had faced them this five-and-twenty years; but till now they were little present to his imag-ination; they used to come; he encountered; he gone: but now, though absent, they stood the way. It was the pocket-book. The material treasure, the hard cash, which had lately set him in a glow, seemed now to lead his chest and hang heavy round the neck of his heart. Sailors are more or less superstitious; and men are creatures of habit, even in their courage. Now David had never gone to sea with a lot of money on him before. As he was a stout-hearted man, these vague forebodings would, perhaps, have cleared away with the bustle, when the Agra set her studding-sails to the breeze, for a piece of positive intelligence he had picked up at Lin-Tin. The Chinese admiral had warned him of a pirate, a daring pirate, who had lat-ely cruising in these waters: first heard of south the line: but had, since, taken a Nonsia ship at the very mouth of the Gulfs there, mur-dered the crew in sight of land, and sold the wo-men for slaves, or worse. Dodd asked for par-ticulars: was he a Ladrone, a Malay, a Chi-nese? In what latitude was he to be looked for? The admiral on this examined his memorandum-by-book: it appeared little was known as yet about the miscreant, except that he never cruised long on one ground; the crew was a mixed one: the captain was believed to be a Portuguese, and to have a consort commanded by his brother: but this was doubtful; at all events the pair had never been seen at work together.

The gunner arrived and saluted the quarter-deck; the captain on this saluted him, and beckoned him to the weather side. On this the other officer kept religiously forward.

"Mr. Monk," said Dodd, "you will clean and prepare the small-arms directly."

"Ay, ay, Sir!" said the old Niler, with a gleam of satisfaction.

"How many of your deck guns are service-able?"

"My deck guns! serviceable! how the ca-ses they, when that son of a sea cook your third mate has been and bashed the water butts to their bowstrings, and jammed in wedges between their nozzles, till they can't breathe, poor things, for less bark. I wish he was lashed between the devil's third hocks with a red-hot cable as tight as he has jammed my guns!"

"Be so good as not to swear, Mr. Monk," said Dodd. "I am your age, Sir, I told you to set an example to the petty officers."

"Well, I won't swear no more, Sir: d—d if I do!" He added very loudly, and with a seem-ing access of ire, "and I ax your pardon, cap-tain, and the deck's."

When a man has a deep anxiety, some human midge or mosquito buzzes at him. It is a rule. To Dodd, heavy with responsibility, and not di-vinging he must not communicate, came deli-cately, and by degrees, and with a semiguesoffic-tion even at times, one like a man, that the mas-putting his hands together, as our children do to approach the Almighty, delivered himself thus, in modulated tones, and good Hindoostanee: "The Daughter of Light, in whose beams I, Ramgudee, do glow with an amiable desire to see the lord commander of the ship resembling a mountain; and to make a communication."

Dodd by sad experience now knew what are the communications the daughters of light pour into nautical commanders at sea, Dodd hailed Mr. Tickell, a gentleman, and said that was not to the lady's cabin. Mr. Tickell soon came back red-dish, but grinning, to say that nothing less than the captain would do.

Dodd sighed, and dismissed Monk with a promise to inspect the gun deck presently, and went down to Mrs. Beresford and found her in dignant. Why had he stopped the ship miles and miles from Macao, and given her all the fear and annoyance of a voyage in that nasty little boat? Dodd opened his great brown eyes, and "Why, madam, it is shoal water off Macao; we dare not come in."

"No excuse, Sir. What have I to do with your shoal water? it was laziness, and want of consideration for a lady who has rented half your ship."

"Nothing of the kind, madam, I assure you."

"Are you the person they call Gentleman Dodd?"

"Yes."

"Then don't contradict a lady! or I shall take the liberty to dispute your title."

Dodd took no notice of this, and with a pa-tience few nautical commanders would have shown, endeavored to make her see that he was obliged to give Macao shoals a wide berth, or cast away the ship. She would not see it. When Dodd saw she wanted, not an explana-tion, but a grievance, he ceased to thwart her.

"I am neglecting my duties to no purpose," said he, and left her without ceremony. This was a fresh offence; and, as he went on, she declared open war. And she made it too from that hour: a war of pins and needles.

Dodd went on the gun deck and found that the defense of the ship had, as usual in these peace-ful days, been sacrificed to the cargo. Out of twenty eighteen-pounders she carried on that deck he cleared three, and that with difficulty. To clear one more he must have sacrificed either merchandise or water: and he was not the man to do either on the mere chance of a danger so unusual as an encounter with a pirate. He was a merchant-captain, not a warrior.

Meantime the Agra had already shown him great sailing qualities. The ship was love at sun-down and gave eleven knots; so that, with a good breeze abaft, free fore and aft rigged, pi-rates could overhaul her. And this wind sur-ried her swiftly past one nest of them, at all events; the Ladrone Isles. At nine o' at all the lights were ordered out. Mrs. Beresford had brought a novel on board, and refused to com-ply: the master-at-arms insisted; she threaten-ed him with the vengeance of the Company, the premier, and the nobility and gentry of the Brit-ish realm. The master-at-arms, finding he had no chance in argument, doused the glim—pitia-ble resource of a weak disputant—then basely hid the historical consequences.

The northerly breeze died out, and light varia-ble winds baffled the ship. It was the 6th April ere she passed the Macclesfield Bank, in latitude 14. And about noon a sail was seen to the out of sight of land; Dodd's chest expanded: his main anxiety at this part of the voyage lay in the state of his crew; all the ports in the world are open to a sailor like fire. He set a watch day and night on that spoiled child.

On the 1st May they passed the great Natu-na, and got among the Anambas and Malay Is-lands: on which the captain's glass began to sweep the horizon again: and night and day at the dizzy foretop-gallant-mast-head he placed an Eye.

They crossed the line in longitude 107, with a slight breeze astern, and ran down the Doldrums. A dead calm, and nothing to do but kill time. Dodd had put down Neptune; that old black-guard could no longer be seen on the fore-top-sail yard, nor on the starboard, pretending to come from ocean's depths; and the cruel ser-vices with a rusty hoop and dab a soapy brush in their mouths. But Champagne popped, the ducks fled, and the cocks crowed, and the mon-yarns, and danced rattling hornpipes; fiddled to by the grave Fullalove. "If there is a thing I can dery, Sir," said he, "it is the love of a friend, as he systematically called Vespasian, taught the crew Yankee steps, and were be-loved. The honest sailors' favorite air, though that western pair his grog for a week. Even Mrs. Beresford emerged, and walked the deck, quenching her supercilious pride with a famish-nuin on Colonel Heresby, her escort: this gal-lant, accustomed always to command, was a gen-nine, and, finding her sweeten with his treacle, tried to reconcile her to his old friend Dodd. Straight she soured, and forbade the topic im-periously.

By this time the mates and midshipmen of the Agra had formed a mess together. Mr. Tickell delivered the mind of the united midshipmen when he proposed Dodd's health in their mess-room, "as a seaman, a navigator, a scholar, a sea-man, a gentleman, and a brick, with 3 times 3."

Dodd never spoke to Mrs. Beresford, or cap-tain, nor yet palavered them: but he had a very pleasant way of conveying appreciation of an officer's and a gentleman's conduct, by a quiet smile on the heels of it. As for the men, they seldom come in contact with the captain of a well ordered ship, but they soon knew him at first as a good-tempered soul, who didn't bother about nothing. But one day, as they lay be-calmed south of the Line, a silly foreigman came on the quarter-deck with a fid of soup, and saluting and scraping, as he had seen the mates to the captain, asked him if he would taste that.

"Yes, my man. Smoked!"

"Like sausage, Sir, your honor, axing your pardon, and the deck's."

"Young gentleman," said Dodd to Mr. More-dith, a midshipman, "be so good as to send the cook aft!"

The cook came, and received, not an oath not a thrash, but a reprimand, and a grain warn-ing.

In the teeth of this he burned the soup hor-ribly the very next day. The crew sent the lucky foretopman aft again. He made his scrape and presented his fid. The captain tasted the soup, and sent Mr. Grey to bid the boatswain's mate pipe the hands on deck and bring the cook off.

"Quartermaster, make a fire-bucket, and fill it from the men's kids: Mr. Tickell, see the cook swallow his own mess. Bosen's mate, take a light of the flying jib sheet, stand over him, and start him if he dallies with it!" With this the captain went below, and the crew supping at the buckets, delivered himself as follows: "Well, ye lubbers, it is first—rate. There's no flies in that. It goes down like mil. Now your lady-like stomachs; you ain't fit for a ship; why don't ye go ashore and man a gingerbread coach and feed off French frogs and them fancy pie stews? (Whack.) What the —— is that for? Boatswain's mate. "Sap more and jaw less!"

"Well I am supping as fast as I can. (Whack, whack.) Bloody end to ye, what are ye about? (Whack, whack, whack.) Oh, Joe, Lord bless you I can't eat any more of it. (Whack.) - I'll give you my grog for a week only to let me fling the —— stuff over the side. (Whack, whack, whack.) Oh, good, kind, dear Mr. Tickell, do go down to the captain for me." (Whack, whack.)

"Avast!" cried the captain, reappearing, and the uplifted rope fell harmless.

"Silence, there, and all!"

("Pipe!")

The cook has received a light punishment this time for spilling the men's mess. My crew shall eat nothing I can't eat myself. My care is heavier than theirs, but not my work, nor my danger in time of danger. Mind that, or you'll find I can be as severe as any master afloat. Clear!"

"Sir!"

"Double the men's grog! they have been cheated of their meal."

"Ay, ay, Sir!"

"And stop the cook's and his mate's for a week."

"Ay, ay, Sir!"

"Boson, pipe down!"

"Shipmates, listen to me," said the foretop-man. "This old Agra is a d—d com-for-table ship."

The oracular sentence was hailed with a ring-ing cheer. Still it is unlucky the British seaman is so ensnarer of theological terms; for he con-stantly misapplies them.

After lying a week like a dead log on the calm but heaving water, one morning a few light puffs in the upper air and inflated the topsails only: the ship wavered undecided, the crew whistling for wind.

At last, one afternoon, it began to rain, and after the rain came a gale from the eastward. This watchful captain saw it purple the water to windward, and ordered the topsails to be reefed and the lee ports closed. This last order seemed an excess of precaution: but Dodd was one of thoroughly acquainted with his ship's qualities: and the hard cash round his neck made him cautious. The ports were closed, all but one, and that was lowered. Mr. Grey was working a problem in the cabin, and wanted a little light and a little air, so he just dropped his port; but, not to deviate from the spirit of the captain's in-structions, he fastened a tackle to it; that he might have mechanical force to close it with should the ship lie over.

Down came the gale with a whoo, and made all crack. The ship lay over pretty much, and the sea poured in at Mr. Grey's port. He up-held his gunner's, and broke it. But though he tackle gave him the force of a dozen hands, he might as well have tried to move a mountain: in the course of the tremendous sea which fol-lowed it burst the port wide open. Grey, after a vain struggle with the weight, shrieked for help: down tumbled the nearest hands, and hauled on the tackle in vain. Destruction was rushing on the ship, and no help. But Dodd was master on deck: tain, with a shrewd guess at the general nature of the danger he could not see, had roared out. "Slack the weather sheet!" The ship righted, but the port came flying to, and terror-stricken men breathed hard, up to their waists in water and floating things, and heard the unlucky port, and went aft, drenched in body and wretched in mind, to report how they had failed. But the captain looking grim as death. He told him, almost crying, what he had done, and how he had miscalculated the power of the water.

Dodd looked and saw his distress. "Let it be a lesson, Sir," said he, sternly. "How many ships have been lost by trifles in fair weather, and not a man saved to tell how the craft was fooled away?"

"Captain, bid me fling myself over the side, and I'll do it."

"Sir, I'm afraid I can't afford to lose a good officer for a fault he—will—never—re-peat."

It blew hard all night and till twelve the next day. The Agra showed her weak point: she rolled abominably. A dirty night came on. At eight bells Mr. Grey, touched by Dodd's clemency, and brimful of zeal, reported a light in Mrs. Beresford's cabin. It had been put out as usual by the master-at-arms: but she refrac-tory one had relighted it.

"Go and take it away," said Dodd.

Soon screams were heard from the cabin. "Oh, mercy! mercy! I will not be drowned in the dark."

Dodd, who had kept clear of her so long, went down and tried to reassure her.

"Oh, Sir, save me, save me, pompest!" she cried. "AND TO BE DROWNED IN THE DARK!"

"Tempest? It is blowing half a gale of wind; that is all."

"Half a gale! Ah, that is the way you always talk to us ladies. Oh, pray give me my light, and send me a clergyman!"

Dodd took pity, and let her have her light, with a midshipman to watch it. He even made her a hypocritical promise that, should there be one grain of danger, he would lie to; but said his most stout-hearted denial of a fair one for a few lee lurches. The Agra broke plenty of glass and crockery though with her fair wind and her lee bulwarks.

Wind down at noon next day, and a dead calm.

At two P.M. the weather cleared; the sun came out high in heaven's centre; and a balmy breeze from the west.

At six twenty-five, the grand orb set calm and red, and the sea was gorgeous with miles and miles of golden ripples: it was the first glowing smile of southern latitude. The night stole on so soft, so clear, so balmy, all were both to close their eyes on it: the passengers linger-ed long on deck, watching the Great Bear dip, and the Southern Cross rise, and overhead a whole heaven of glorious stars most of us have never seen, and never shall see in this world. No belching smoke obscured, no plunging pad-dles deafened; all was musical; the soft air sighing among the sails; the phosphorescent water bubbling from the ship's bows; the mur-murs from little knots of men on deck subdued by the great calm: home seemed near, all dan-ger far; Peace ruled the sea, the sky, the heart: the ship, making a track of white fire on the deep, glided gently yet swiftly homeward, urged by snowy sails piled up like alabaster towers against a violet sky, out of which looked a thou-sand eyes of holy tranquil fire. Dodd watched the sweet night away.

Now carmine streaks tinged the eastern sky at the water's edge; and that water blushed; now the streaks turned orange, and then yellow, and then sparkled. Thence splashes of living gold flew and settled on the ship's white sails, the deck, and the rigging; and, with her usual pro-fogue, being so near the line, up came majestic-ally a huge, fiery, golden sun, and set the sea flaming liquid topaz.

Instant the look-out at the foretop-gallant-mast-head hailed the deck below.

"Strange sail! Right ahead!"

The strange sail was reported to Captain Dodd, then dressing in his cabin. He came soon after on deck and hailed the look-out: "Which way is she steering?"

"Can't say, Sir. Can't see her move any."

Dodd ordered the boatswain to pipe to break-fast; and taking his deck glass went lightly up to the foretop-gallant-mast-crossfees. There, through the light haze of a glorious morning, he espied a long low schooner, latine-rigged, lying close under Point Leat, a small island about some miles distant on the westward: and nearly in the Agra's course, then approaching the Straits of Gaspar, 4 Latitude S.

"She is hove to," said Dodd, very gravely.

At eight o'clock the stranger lay about two miles to windward: and still hove to.

By this time all eyes were turned upon her, and half a dozen glasses. Every body, except the captain, delivered an opinion. She was a Greek lying to for water: she was a Malay com-ing north with coco canes, and sheet of bands: she was a pirate watching the Straits.

The captain leaned silent and solemn with his arms on the bulwarks, and watched the suspect-ed Craft.

Mr. Fullalove joined the group, and leveled a powerful glass, of his own construction. His inspection was long and minute, and while the glass was at his eye, he was asked his half in a whisper, could he make out any thing?

"Wa'al," said he, "the varmint looks consid-erably saucy." Then, without moving his glass, he let drop a word at a time, as if the facts were trickling into his telescope at the lens, and out at the sight. "One—two—four—seven, false ports."

There was a momentary murmur among the officers and men. The British sailor has an un-demonstrative disposition. Steadily watching the deck with his cigar, saw the men's faces, and gave ship with maritime curiosity and making comments; but he discussed no particular emo-tion nor opinion in what he said to them. In the grave low tones they said it in. Perhaps a brother seaman would though.

The next observation that trickled out of Fulla-love's tube was this: "I judge there are too few hands on deck, and too many—white—eyeball's a-glittering at the ports below."

"Confound it!" muttered Bayliss, uneasily; "how can you see that?"

Fullalove replied only by quietly handing his glass to Dodd. The captain, thus appealed to, raised his eye to the tube.

"Well, Sir; see the false ports, and the white eyebrows!" asked Sharpe, ironically.

"I see that in the four glass I ever looked through," said Dodd, doggedly, without inter-rupting his inspection.

"I think he's a Malay pirate," said Mr. Grey.

Sharpe took him up very quickly, and, indeed, angrily: "Nonsense! And if he is, he won't venture on a vessel of this size."

"Says the whale to the sword-fish," suggested Fullalove, with a little grimness.

The captain, with the American glass at his eye, turned half round to the man at the wheel: "Starboard!"

"Starboard it is."

"Steer South South East."

"Ay, ay, Sir." And the ship's course was thus altered two points.

This order lowered Dodd fifty per cent. in Mr. Sharpe's estimation. He held his tongue as long as he could: but at last his surprise and disatis-faction burst out of him. "Won't that bring him out on us?"

"Very likely, Sir," replied Dodd.

"Begging your pardon, captain, would it not be wiser to keep our course, and show the black-guard we don't fear him?"

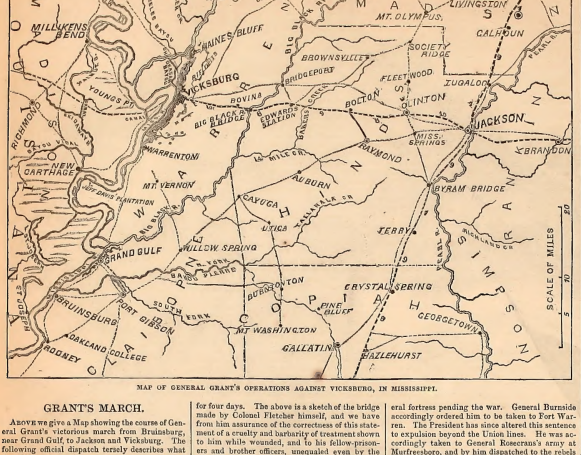
"What say you?" Sharpe, he has made up his mind an hour ago whether to be still, or bite. Say changing my course two points won't change his mind: but it may make him declare it; and I must know what he does intend, before I run the ship into the narrows ahead."

"Oh, I see," said Sharpe, half convinced.

The alteration in the Agra's course produced no movement in the mass of the mysterious schooner. She lay to under the land still, and with only a few hands on deck, while the Agra sliped away from her and entered the Straits between Long Island and Point Leat, leaving the schooner about two miles and a half distant to the N.W.

Ah! The stranger's deck swarms black with men!

His sham ports fell as if by magic, his guns grinned through the gaps like black teeth; his huge foresail rose and filled, and out he came in chase.



The breeze was a kiss from Heaven, the sky a vaulted sapphire, the sea a million dimples of liquid, lucid, gold.

"THE MEN OF THE NORTHWEST WILL HEW THEIR WAY TO THE GULF OF

MAP OF GENERAL GRANT'S OPERATIONS AGAINST VICKSBURG, IN MISSISSIPPI.

GRANT'S MARCH.

ABOVE we give a Map showing the course of General Grant's victorious march from Bruinsburg, near Grand Gulf, to Jackson and Vicksburg. The following official dispatch tersely describes what they did on the way:

HEAD OF VICKSBURG, Wednesday, May 20, 1863.

The Army of the Tennessee landed at Bruinsburg on the 30th of April.

On the 1st of May we fought the battle of Port Gibson, and defeated the rebels under General Bowen, whose loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners was at least 1500, and loss in artillery five pieces.

On the 12th of May, at the battle of Raymond, the rebels were defeated with a loss of 500.

On the 14th of May we defeated General Joseph E. Johnston, and captured Jackson, with a loss to the enemy of 400, besides immense stores and manufactures, and seventeen pieces of artillery.

On the 16th of May we fought the bloody and decisive battle of Baker's Creek, in which the entire force of Pemberton, under General Pemberton, was defeated, with the loss of twenty-seven pieces of artillery and 4000 men.

On the 17th of May we defeated the same force at the Big Black River Bridge, with the loss of 1000 men and fourteen pieces of artillery.

On the 18th of May we invested Vicksburg closely.

To-day General Steele carried the rifle-pits on the north of the city.

Assistant Adjutant-General.

On pages 360 and 361 we give a picture which will enable our readers to form an idea of what is meant by "carrying a line of rifle-pits," "storming heights," "taking a position with the bayonet," terms of very frequent use at present, and which convey but a vague meaning to those who have not witnessed the stern realities of war. The reader can fancy, if he pleases, as he looks at the picture that he is gazing at the gallant onslaught of Grant's army upon the rebel rifle-pits and breastworks at Vicksburg. We have appended to the picture the memorable words of warning which were uttered in Congress, while the Southern men were still there, by Representative, now General, Logan. Alluding to the Southern secession plot, they would hold the mouth of the Mississippi, he said that "the men of the Northwest would have their way to the Gulf of Mexico with their swords." Similar words were uttered at the same time by Representative M'Clernand, who, like Logan, had up to that time acted with the South in politics, and who, like him, is now a General in Grant's army.

THE PRISON AT JACKSON, MISSISSIPPI.

We illustrate on page 364 THE PRISON AT JACKSON, MISSISSIPPI, where many good Union men have been confined since the war broke out, and which was lately destroyed by General Grant. The gentleman who sends us the sketch adds the following account:

"On the 30th December last, at the gallant charge of Blair's brigade upon the works of the rebels at Chickasaw Bluffs near Vicksburg, Colonel Thomas J. Fletcher, of the Missouri 8th, Awake Zouaves, who was wounded and captured by the rebels, was with twenty other officers put in the jail in this city, where they were kept in the most loathsome cells and fed upon the worst fare ever meted out to the vilest criminals for one month, when they were removed to Jackson, Mississippi, and thrust into the old rickety ruin of the bridge which was yet standing above water, the remaining part having fallen down. Here they were kept for another month in the coldest season of the year, without beds or bedding; no fire or lights were allowed them. Three hundred and eighty privates, also prisoners, were put into the bridge with them. Almost every day two or three were carried out dead, and sometimes the dead lay at the entrance of the bridge unburied for four days. The above is a sketch of the bridge made by Colonel Fletcher himself, and we have from him assurance of the correctness of this statement of a cruelty and barbarity of treatment shown to him while wounded, and to his fellow-prisoners and brother officers, unequaled even by the rebels in their cruelty to our soldiers heretofore while in their hands."

Colonel Fletcher appends the following certificate:

"The within statement is in all respects correct, but does not fully represent the barbarity of our treatment by the rebels. THOMAS C. FLETCHER,
Colonel 31st Missouri Volunteers

THE ENGLISH PIRATE "ALEXANDRA."

WE publish on page 364 an illustration of the new Anglo-Rebel pirate "ALEXANDRA," which has just been built at Liverpool. She was built by Miller & Co. of Liverpool for a firm by the name of Fawcett, Prescott & Co. of the same town, both firms connected with the rebel piratical business. Just as she was approaching completion the remonstrances of our Government in relation to the piracies of the Alabama and Florida, together with some expressions of indignation by leading British orators, compelled the Government to show some semblance of a desire to enforce the laws, and the Alexandra was seized and is now held by the authorities. It is not believed, however, that the seizure will involve any thing worse than a temporary detention. The ship-owners and commercial interest of England are decidedly in favor of the destruction of our merchant navy by pirates, and after a farce of a trial the Alexandra will be set at large to prey upon our ships after the manner of the Alabama and Florida. She is a three-masted schooner with engines of 300 horse-power.

CLEMENT L. VALLANDIGHAM.

The first that we can remember of this man is his appearance at Harper's Ferry on the occasion of John Brown's Raid. There, with a bullet, as they mortally wounded, and laid by the body of his dead son, was confronted by the infuriated slaveholding leaders of Virginia, and bullied, as only slave-owners can bully, the most insolent, outrageous, and brutal of all the old man's tormentors was Clement L. Vallandigham. A man of no consistency, which is Dayton, Ohio, it does not seem, however, that the disgust which his conduct created every where else injured him in the least. He was again returned to Congress, and took his seat as usual. Throughout the three sessions of the Thirty-seventh Congress he was conspicuous as an opponent of the United States and a sympathizer with the rebels. He voted against every measure which was intended to enable the Government to prosecute the war, and at every thing which ingenuity and malice could devise to hamper the Administration, weaken the country, comfort the enemy, and promote foreign intervention. At the election of November last he was dropped, and General Schenck elected from his district. Since then he has been perambulating the country, delivering seditious speeches, urging the people to resist the draft, misrepresenting the purposes and policy of the Government, and endeavoring to provoke an outbreak at the West. For one of these speeches he was arrested a fortnight since by order of General Burnside, tried by court-martial, and sentenced to imprisonment in a Federal fortress pending the war. General Burnside accordingly ordered him to be taken to Fort Warren. The President has since altered this sentence to expulsion beyond the Union lines. He was accordingly taken to General Rosecrans's army at Murfreesboro, and by him dispatched to the rebels under a strong escort of cavalry. The rebel officer refused to receive him, but allowed him to remain under guard until the pleasure of Jeff Davis should be ascertained. Vallandigham insisted on being considered a prisoner of war.

GOVERNOR ANDREW G. CURTIN.

WE present our readers on page 365 with an admirable likeness of the present distinguished Governor of Pennsylvania, ANDREW GREGG CURTIN. Of all the public men now prominent in the country there is no one who has created a deeper interest in, and none deserves better for the untiring energy and faithful devotion in aiding to maintain the integrity of, our Government.

Governor Curtin is about forty-five years of age, and was born in Centre County, Pennsylvania. His education was liberal, and having graduated at the law school connected with Dickinson College, Carlisle, he commenced the practice of law at Bellefonte, the seat of justice of his native county. For some years he devoted himself exclusively to his profession, and earned an enviable reputation as a counselor and as an advocate. His prominence in the politics of the State was in the Presidential canvass of 1844. He entered upon this with zeal, and became recognized as one of the most efficient stump speakers of the day. From that time he actively participated in all the political contests in the State. Upon the election of Governor Pollock he was proffered the position of Secretary of State and Superintendent of Common Schools. Although the youngest man who had ever filled these offices, his administration of them was marked by an untiring fidelity to the public interests; and his labors in this department, while they exhibited signal ability, contributed largely to the success of Governor Pollock's administration.

In the early part of the year 1860 a State convention was held at Harrisburg for the selection of a Gubernatorial candidate. This being the year of the Presidential election, the action of the convention was looked forward to with greater anxiety than had, perhaps, ever been known in Pennsylvania. General Hone of Pittsburg, Judge Packer of Lancaster, Taggart of Northumberland, and Covode of Westmoreland, were among the candidates. Each of them had warm and devoted friends, who did not failed to exert themselves for the success of their respective candidates. It, however, soon became manifest that the advantages were on the side of Curtin, and upon the third ballot he was nominated by an overwhelming majority. He immediately went into the canvass with a spirit and activity that his warmest admirers could scarcely expect him to maintain to the end; but in this he showed that he had not himself overmeasured his strength. His Democratic competitor, the Hon. Henry D. Foster, formerly endeared to the party friends; and, doubtless, feeling the contest to be one of overwhelming importance, he manifested a determination to exert his utmost powers as the standard-bearer of his party. The rival candidates both went upon the stump; and without any disposition to detract from the merits of General Foster, it is impossible to deny that the great success of Governor Curtin on a public speaker contributed largely to the result of his election by a triumphant majority. The National Convention at Chicago for the nomination of a Presidential candidate occurred during the summer. Governor Curtin was alive to the fact that there would be some candidates presented to that body whose nomination would, to say the least, act as a dead weight in the preliminary contest in Pennsylvania at the October elections. His personal interests were involved in this; but above all, and as was shown by his course, of infinitely larger consideration to his mind would be the public calamity that might follow an injudicious nomination. With characteristic boldness and candor he prepared to do what he could toward preventing any unwise nomination by going to Chicago in person, there openly to disclose his views and convictions, rather than to pursue the secret and tortuous paths of chicanery and intrigue, by which, it is true, he might have averted much of personal enmity and bitterness that would possibly flow from chafed and disappointed aspirants for political elevation. He then and there claimed to know the people of Pennsylvania, their prevailing sentiments, and the temper in which the nomination of this or that candidate would be accepted. The stake which he held, and the right afforded by his position for him to speak with unswhat of authority, were accepted as of influential value. It is but just to say that the result showed to him to have been right, and that on this occasion, as in the many emergencies that have arisen since he came into authority as Governor, he has never failed in his estimate of public sentiment throughout the Keystone State.

With clear and decided convictions upon every question that has arisen during his eventful administration, he has yet never permitted himself to be carried away from his contemplation and study of the mind of the people. Of this great essential of practical statesmanship he has time and again shown himself the possessor, as he has also illustrated its inevitable importance. While watching the current of popular events he has never permitted himself to lose sight of the breakers and shoals that must needs be avoided, nor has he failed to note the contrary error of seeking to traverse the ocean of great events upon which the nation is embarked by a system of back-water navigation.

SCENES AT NEW ORLEANS.

THE two pictures on page 357, from sketches by our special artist Mr. Hamilton, will be found described at length in the following extract from the Times correspondent:

MAY-DAY.

I was present, on the first of May, at one of the most beautiful and interesting celebrations that ever occurred here—the festival of the Madison Girls' School. Pleasing as is every thing that has been considered of national public importance for mention here, it—in the present condition of the country—such gatherings have a deeper, a festal significance, and a very deep one.

The Madison School is one of the most effective gatherings of the kind I have seen. Its chief characteristics were, hitherto, held indoors. But this occasion was to be carried out in the old City Park, some distance out of New Orleans, the grandest collection of old trees spreading, some thirty acres of ground, over a space of ground.

Here the young ladies met, under the care of Miss Whitney, the accomplished Principal, crowned as the "May Queen" with all due ceremony, and spent the whole day in the enjoyment of every species of innocent and healthful sport, in which they were joined by very many "children of a larger growth" from the city. Commodore Farragut, commander of the gun-boat Kinsee, had kindly sent there a large number of sailors to put up the May pole and festoon with abundance of ropes for swings, and detailed two or three of his men to come and arrange matters for the young friends.

In the midst of the beauty and gayety of the scene, as these graceful young creatures flitted over the green sward, in the light of the glorious, like a revival of chivalrous days not lost sight of the fact that this was a Union demonstration in the midst of the City of New Orleans, and that at least two-thirds of the children present were the offspring of enemies to the Union, either open or concealed. I could in a scene appeared extraordinary to a stranger, how much more must it have done so to me, who had been a witness to who could contrast it with the state of things existing so short a time before.

The fact is that the school authorities here are making strenuous efforts to accommodate its antidote to the venomous poison of secession, too long corrupting the tender minds of the young generation, and their efforts have been attended with the greatest success. In every public school in a new republican State, the children assembled daily commence and close with patriotic hymns, and that the flag of the Union floats over the building, as well as the same tendency. Union flags have been raised over every public school in the city—the Girls' School having the honor of inaugurating the movement—and soon there will not be a single place of education in the city without its emblem of loyalty. By such efforts as these, and by printing their music-books, the exercises and songs frequently with friends, whom they have been cruelly taught to look upon as natural enemies, their minds become stamped with ideas of truth and genuine love of their country, to counteract the evil effects of their former teachers.

It was really interesting to watch some little dark-haired Southern beauty innocently romping with her blue-eyed brother, the latter a native of some chilly State, or Massachusetts—and then to be reminded that the father of the little girl was a "registered enemy." What was that exquisite girl laughing with that young officer? and what were those sweet thoughts? Keep on your May-Day festival, my dear ones, and let the cheering sounds of your laughter, that may, due to, undermine and overthrow the satanic rebellion, be heard even to that U. S. ship, whole brigade of his followers annihilated on the bottle-field.

"REGISTERED ENEMIES."

In my last I referred to two very important orders just issued by General Banks—one of them requiring "registered enemies" to leave the Department within a period of 15th May. General Bowen has since then published the following:

"OFFICE PROVOST-MARSHAL GENERAL OF LOUISIANA,
NEW ORLEANS, May 1, 1863.

"Notice is hereby given to the registered enemies of the United States within the Department of the Gulf, that, in accordance with the order of the Commanding General, dated April 24, 1863, they are required to remove from within the lines of the enemy, on or before the 15th day of May, 1863. Such persons now registered as desire to take the oath of allegiance and will not leave the prescribed oath of fidelity, and subscribe to it, to the United States, a copy of which oath is hereunto annexed, will make application for that purpose at the office of the Provost-Marshal General, Custom-House, New Orleans, on or before the 10th day of May.

"JAMES BOWEN, Brigadier-General, P. M. G."

"OFFICE OF THE PROVOST-MARSHAL GENERAL,
DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF, No. 103 CUSTOM-HOUSE,
NEW ORLEANS, May —, 1863.

"I do hereby solemnly and sincerely swear, in the presence of Almighty God, that I will support, protect, and defend the Constitution and Government of the United States against all enemies, whether domestic or foreign, and that I will bear true and faithful allegiance and loyalty to the same,—any ordinance, resolution, or law of any State, Convention, or Legislature to the contrary notwithstanding: and I take this oath, and assume all its responsibilities, and all moral, of my own free will, and with a full determination, pledge, and purpose to observe and keep it, and without any mental reservation or evasion whatever; and, further, that I will well and faithfully perform all the duties that may be required of me by law, or a true and loyal citizen of the United States. And may God help me to do so!

"(Signed)

"Sworn to and subscribed before me, this —— day of ——, 1863."

You can readily imagine what a flutter this has caused in the ranks of the Seceah. Any one reading the form of oath here quoted can hardly imagine how any one pretending to a particle of soul or manhood could subscribe to it without a mental reservation; and yet a number, I know of mine the other day, when asked what he was going to do—take the oath or not—Oh, just as all the rest have done; take it over the left."

It will be noticed, however, for these people to be warned in time, and not attempt to get around General Banks by buying such worthless property as their souls. There is one man who subscribes to that oath but will henceforth find himself under a sort of moral mortgage, to the extent of every loyal man in the place. He has studied human nature but little who does not know that with all their high sounding natures, the General Banks's, are those whose souls could most instinctively spurn and scout at such a foul deception. Therefore, the very leniency of the General's post administration will probably make him the more three villainous against offenders; and if he smites one, he will, in meeting, be found to out-Usher Ingram.

It is really quite amusing to spend an hour at the headquarters of General Brown. People—particularly ladies—are constantly seeking in to try if there is no possible way of avoiding the terrible alternative of starvation in Texas or bowing to the horrible Yankee flag. Some have long, despairing faces,—some have a haughty bearing, as if they scorned the very favors they had come to try and get; some, sad, vainly appeal to the conscience of the remorseless Captain Nott, "as a father," while others as vainly waste their breath in appealing upon the blackened heart of effect, Lieutenant Milner Brown, neither of whom can swerve one inch from the inexorable duty of swearing them in, or banishing them to DIXIE.

THE RAPPAHANNOCK.

We are with you, brothers, brothers, fighting on the Rappahannock;
We are with you in the morning and at setting of the sun;
All our thoughts are flying thither where our brothers are a-bleeding;
Heart and hand we will be with you till your noble work is done.

We are with you, fathers, fathers, fighting on the Rappahannock;
Do not think that we are happy when the cannons pour forth smoke!
But we know you fight for justice, and the waving of our banner
Over every State and hamlet where it ever waved before.

We are with you, children, children, fighting on the Rappahannock;
Oh! we wish that we could chap you fondly, and a mother's heart-felt kiss
We would plant upon our offspring—but, dear children, go on bravely,
And in thousand matron-prayers shall be given for your bliss.

We are with you, kinsmen, kinsmen, fighting on the Rappahannock;
We remember all your hardships on Virginia's crimson soil;
We are not forgetting, kinsmen, that you battle for our country,
And we pray that God will bless you in the cold and in the chill.

We are with you, friends and loved ones, fighting on the Rappahannock;
Heart and soul we are among you, and our bodies shall not lack;
For if traitors take your life-blood we will step into your traces;
If you conquer, friends and loved ones, we will meet you coming back.

God is with you, patriot-soldiers, fighting on the Rappahannock;
He has heard His great mandate, "Ananumission to the slaves"
He has given you the weapons, He has given you the power,
He has given you our country, and our country you must save.

MISTE, PRINCE OF FOGGE.

THE fairy MYRTILLA was getting ready for a trip to Fairy-land. Her mouse-skin chair was warming by the fire, her chariot was before the door, and her team of blood-beetles stamping themselves; nearly out of the harness in their impatience, while she herself was putting on her mullen-leaf leggings, for it was as yet early spring, and the weather was somewhat cool.

Quoth Lilla, her god-daughter, pouting, "Every one goes to Fairy-land. Nobody knows or vagabond unbeam but has something to tell of itrosy rates and diamond palaces: only I must mope at home."

But answered her godmother, "Patience! There are people who go to Fairy-land, and there are those to whom it comes. Keep the door shut and let no one in; for the sprites of the forest are ever ready for mischief; and have an eye on those spider-spinners. But you'll be long about the errand that the Queen is getting impatient. If you are lonely, talk to the birds or practice your dancing, and we shall see what we shall see."

Now Myrtilla's eloquence, like that of mortals, was very unfortunate to herself; for, standing on her mouse-skin cloak, she whirled away over the tree-tops, so well satisfied with herself that she must needs stop the goblin of the brook and a sprite or two of the mist, that she happened to meet, to tell them how Lilla's god-daughter ruled her house, and Miste had run away with a grey young Northern Light, while Lilla was content to stay at home and spin, and never even guessed that she was fair."

But Lilla sat looking into the cedar-wood fire, and saying, "I am tired of talking to the birds, who tell me nothing but how the young Robins are coming on, and what little eaves-droppers are the Wrens, and what airs the Oriole takes; and as for my dancing, the very mention reminds me of that ridiculous old Grasshopper, with his green tights, and his little fiddle, and his everlasting whir-r, ma'm'selle, that is the very air of the Fairy Queen; and as for the Spiders, I am afraid of them. They look as if they could eat me up."

And she fire roared the words up the chimney, and the pines that stood thick about the old castle caught it up, and whispered about it till the zephyrs got hold of it, and these told it to the brooks, and presently there wasn't so much as a violet in the forest that had not heard how Lilla was discontented and moping in the old castle; and there arose such a buzzing, and humming, and whispering on the subject, that Lilla, hearing it, began to fancy that she was all aloud.

So she called to a Sparrow, passing by; and said to the Sparrow,

"There is a Fairy Prince coming hither."

But Lilla answered,

"The Prince, whatever that may be, must go further, then; for godmother bade me open the doors to none."

And, sitting down at a golden wheel, she began to spin stuff for pansy-leaves, singing the while the Song of the Giants of the Mist, and their wives, and Angela herself wondering what like was this Fairy Prince; for in her whole life she had seen no one but her godmother; and while she was singing came hosts of wild sunbeams and tittering flowersprites, tapping at the window; but Lilla hardly stopped to shake her head at them, or to know their tricks of old; and then followed a whistle and a gruff voice, as the wind went about the castle, trying every door and window, and threatening to blow the roof off; but Lilla stinted her song none the more for that, for the castle was well built, and it was a fairy that would open to none without her will.

The day went on and drew toward the close; and though there are five hundred verses in the Song of the Giants, Lilla had sung them all; and though there was still a little twilight remaining, presently she spun so fast that now, at twilight, they were done. The stir and whisper, too, in the forest had quite died away; and, as Lilla looked from the fire, she began once more to wonder what the Sparrow meant by his Fairy Prince.

Some just then a soft tap at the door.

"Who is there?" cried Lilla.

"Mista, Prince of Fogge," answered a voice, "who has traveled thither from Fairy-land for love of you."

"Alla!" returned Lilla, "you must go away. I am bidden to keep the doors fast."

"I saw your godmother in Fairy-land," pursued the sweet voice. "The Fairy Queen has talks to violet stockings of late, and none but Myrtilla can shape them. She has three days' work before her."

"I dare say," sighed Lilla.

"Then I must die. Fairy princes, and specially the children of the mist, always die for love."

"Why do you love me?"

"Because you have hair like sunbeams, and eyes like a June heaven at noon, and a sweeter voice than any Fay in Fairydom.

Now Lilla knew all the tales in the book of the Ages, and the Songs of the Mist, and the Fairy Ballads of the Birds; but none of these were half so witty and interesting as a prince (whatever that might be) who could tell her, "You are fair," and that all must love you. How then can you blame me?" And if she were only quite sure that her godmother was busy with violets stockings, and thinking nothing of her—

It was very still without: what if he were dead! He had said that he should die for love of her! If she could be certain that her godmother wouldn't find her out and hurt her up for a thousand years with the Witch of the Sea, or Jack Frost!

Just then an owl began with his great coarse voice.

"Towhit! towhoo! Here is a fine fool of a Fairy Prince dying for a girl who hasn't the spirit to open a door and take a look at him."

"I am going to open the door!" cried Lilla, angrily.

But the words were hardly uttered when a handsome young man stood before her.

"You let the door, you say between us," he said, with a cold smile that made Lilla (though she could hardly tell why) wish him well outside again. She had not long to wonder, however, for just then came a tremendous prancing of beetles, and a bouncing at the door. Myrtilla had come back.

"Miste, Prince of Fogge!" she cried, at the fire, "Hide him!" but, "No," said the fire, "it should burn him."

And she ran to the fountain and prayed it to shelter him; but, "No," gurgled the nymph, "I should drown him." "You, and the Prince," said the flowers, "have no fear!" and, wrapping his cloak about him, became invisible.

Myrtilla entered in a rage.

"Let me in!" she cried, thumping at the door. "I hear your whispering within."

Lilla went timidly and unbolted the door.

"Now I've caught you!" exclaimed her godmother, bouncing in, but stopped short in surprise at seeing Miste alone. "Some one has been here," she began. "The birds and the brooks told me so, and the very bolt has not been drawn. The door-stone was charmed, and it was echoing with a strange footstep, and yet I see no prints on the floor, which is like snow for every foot but yours and mine."

"I know nothing of your birds, and brooks, and charmed door-stone," answered Lilla. "For all company I have had the hooting of an old owl who lives in the pine yonder. Perhaps, however, he is a Prince in disguise."

"Prince? how know you that there is such a thing? I must ask the Fairy Queen."

Lilla sat down at her empty wheel and began to spin in a violent hurry.

"What are you doing there?" demanded Myrtilla. "Spinning air?"

"I want to keep in practice."

Here the Prince, who, though invisible, hovered about her, gave her hand a gentle squeeze, at which she cried, "Oh!"

"What is the matter now?" said her godmother.

"Nothing; I was only thinking of the Spiders, who have droned all day."

"But what made you blush?"

"What is that?" said Lilla. "I have never heard the word."

"Humph!" returned the fairy; "it is a word that goes with prince;" and, sitting down, she began to pull off her mullen-leaf leggings.

"Dear Lilla," whispered Prince Miste, "will you come with me?"

"Miste, be off with thee," cried Myrtilla, at the same moment.

"Yes, love," answered Lilla, aloud, quite forgetting what she was saying, not which her godmother jumped up in a passion and boxed her ears.

"Are you out of your wits? Go to your room and stay there. Yes, by me, indeed!"

Lilla obeyed, weeping; but hardly had she closed the door when Miste, who had followed her, took her again and kissed her cheek.

"Are you ready to come?" he asked.

"Alla!" sighed Lilla, "the doors are fast, and I have no wings that I can escape through the windows. I must now dim my eyes with weeping, and spin prickly thistle sheaths, or mullen leaves, that are more hateful still. Since, however, I shall see you no more, my Prince, it hardly matters. No one else will ever love me, or know that I have hair and eyes at all."

At this the owl commenced again,

"Lilla has hair and eyes indeed, and is going to bed like a great school-girl."

"Lilla is not afraid!" she sobbed, pulling at her golden hair for spite.

"Better become as I am," said the Prince.

So Lilla looked, and saw an opal blushing a jet of flame, that quivered and leaped continually, and paled only at the approach of danger. Looking at it now she saw that it had grown dim, and drew back.

"Oh! you believe in stones rather than in me," said Miste, quietly, looking out at the window.

"Hoo! hoo!" cried the owl, "leave her, Prince Miste, to spin and get her ears boxed. It is what she deserves."

"Stop!" exclaimed Lilla, "I will become as you are, whatever that may be."

The cloud returned, it wrapped her round, it seemed to penetrate her with cold and dread. The flame in the opal had gone out and was dead, like her heart that seemed turning to ice. She herself was losing shape and outline; her rounded limbs, her bright hair, her fair face, falling into blank whiteness, thinning away into mist, till, like a breath, she floated from the window into the forest, quivering all the while under her ominous laughter.

Once there the winds seized her. They hurled her across the leaves and fearful wastes; she was shuddering with cold and terror, torn by jagged rocks and boughs, longing for rest.

"Let us stop here," she cried, "and give me back my shape!"

"Nay," returned the Prince, "you became as I, and your mortal form once gone it is lost forever, for the sprites of the mist change not in essence. They are always cold at heart; they find no rest; they are the wind and the breeze; and they flee before all things. You must abide by the choice you have made."

So Lilla wanders over desolate seas and barren hills, a mist wreath forever.

THE GOD-NEEDLEMAN WITH ONE EYE.

ANOTHER half-way between two small towns whose names are unimportant, there is or was a wayside inn called the Traveler's Delight. Its name was probably a mistake, as it might have been a satire, since the Traveler's Delight presented an aspect by no means delightful; indeed, a timid traveler would have been apt to turn from it with a shudder, as intolerably desolate and gloomy, and prefer pressing on at all risks to making trial of it.

One evening, however, at dusk, a horse laboring under the weight of two persons, a man-servant and a lady on a pillion—you must remember that it is a long time since this happened—stopped before the door of the Traveler's Delight.

"We must stop here, Stephen, for now," said the servant. "I don't remember any inn on the road." Whereupon he proceeded to make some inquiries of a ferry-looking boy, who, when turned to the lady. "We have missed the turning, and are some miles from the right way. Can we have rooms?"

The lady—we will call her Mrs. Benson—looked at the scarcely inviting sign, and shivered as a blast of wind went howling by.

"Is there accommodation for us here? But I think we had better go on."

The servant, however, was not inclined to go on. There was plenty of accommodation for his mistress, he said, and the horse was dead beat. As for himself, he frankly said there was an outhouse he could sleep in; and he was sure his master would not like that. Considering (here) her health and safety in going on in the cold dark night.

The lady suffered herself to be persuaded, and entered the house, a dreary one with an unpleasant face came to meet her. When Mrs. Benson saw this woman she looked again at the dark road hesitatingly, but the horse had been taken to the stable, and the servant was not to be seen.

"Can I have a private room?" inquired the lady.

"A bedroom, of course. But there's no sitting-room, except the kitchen. You'll find it warm and comfortable, and can have the best seat."

By this time the outer door was shut and fastened, and Mrs. Benson taking courage in the thought that at least her servant was somewhere within call, made a virtue of necessity, and accepted the offered best seat with seeming satisfaction.

Supper was placed before her, which the landlord and his wife shared at her request.

During the meal there was a violent knocking at the outer door, and when it was opened there entered a tall, broad-shouldered man, with one eye, and a shock head of red hair.

"Can I have a bed?" was the query.

"Well, I suppose you can, if the missis and me gives up our room. It won't be the first time we've had to camp in the kitchen."

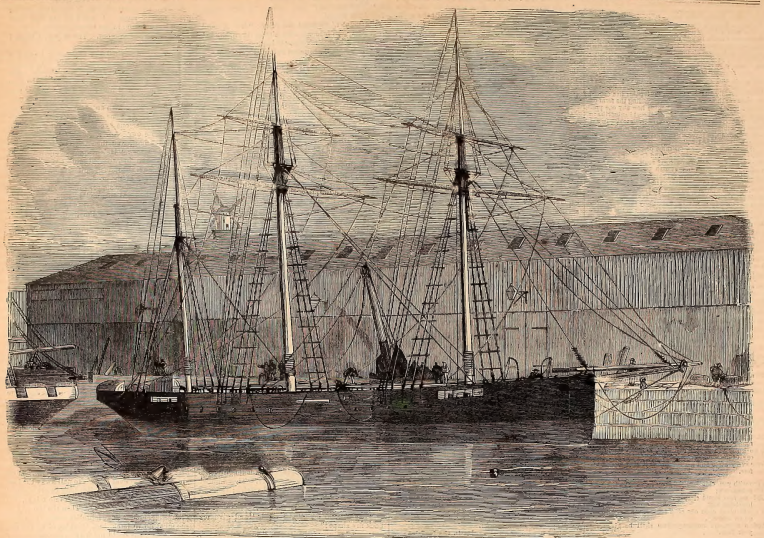
"Sorry to put you out. Thank you, I think I will take a mouthful."

No one had invited the new-comer to take a mouthful, and as he helped himself his one eye turned on the strange lady. Mrs. Benson could not avoid returning the look with interest, the man had such a comical face; and then his hair was so reddish she had never seen the like before. It seemed to be jolly with an expression of grotesque good-nature. At some early remark of the landlord's, however, the man turned to him all right quickly; its owner gave a comical sidelong nod toward the host, and then the eye twinkled, as much as to say, "He's a queer-tempered chap; but don't be frightened—I'll protect you."

Mrs. Benson felt quite as sense of security in the presence of the good-natured man, and was sorry when his huge supper came to an end.

"Well, then, I'll turn in," he said, pushing his plate away, "if the master here will be good enough to show me the room, for I'm tired. Good-night, missis—servant, ma'am."

Then Mrs. Benson fancied that the sour face of the hostess grew sourer still; it fairly scowled at her, but she did not feel at all inclined to be civil. There was no alternative, however; she could not sit up all night, and as she was, because the master and mistress had expressed their intention of remaining there. She asked for her servant, and was told that he had retired to the outhouse for the night; there was no further pretext for lingering, so she accepted the repeated offer of the lady to show her to her room.



When she got inside that room, Mrs. Benson's first impulse was to lock the door, and as she did so her eye rested on a key in the lock. Not satisfied with the lock, which looked crazy, she proceeded to pile every movable article of furniture against the door; that done, she turned to the fire, which was burning cheerfully. While she stood there contemplating with the insufficiency of the fortress for a barricade, the door-key, which she was twisting about in her fingers, dropped into the ashes. Mrs. Benson stooped to pick it up, and as she stooped, with her face bent in an upside-down position, a gleam of fire sent its light underneath the bed (which was low). It flashed upon a broad leg of the reddest hair she had ever seen. Mrs. Benson raised her head again rather quickly. The bed lengthwise in front presented to her the dripstones that crept over her as to pull away the barricade, and call for help. But she knew no sound could be made audible below, her fate might, and doubtless would be decided. Then she thought of confessing that she have forgotten something which she must go to fetch, but, thinking of all the circumstances, she could not help believing the sour people about would be in league with the red man, so that certain death must follow that move, even if the robber were not to wide awake to perceive the ruse. She could not bring herself to that, and so no doubt he had, and he would understand it. Besides all this, she had not bound the key, and somehow she shrank from bending down again to search for it. Who knew what she might encounter the next time? A knife, a pistol, or that one gleaming eye; and some startled motion might cause the robber to suspect her knowledge of his presence. No, she could not look for the key.

A little while longer Mrs. Benson stood warming her hands at the fire, then she turned round to examine the position of the bed, and yawned aloud. She saw that the bed had been drawn down so as to have a space between it and the wall, and it occurred to her that this arrangement had been made by the robber, who would doubtless prefer to escape behind, where there would be least chance of the victim catching sight of him, and so unnecessary noise might be avoided.

By reason of the barricade against the door, and the wall on the other, she would have to creep in at the foot of the bed. After thinking over her position as long as was possible under the circumstances, she took a strong thick woolen scarf of unusual length, which had been wrapped over her cheat for the journey, and tied behind; and putting out the candle, she got into bed, yawning again audibly. The fire burned low in the grate, and the room grew nearly dark. If any one could have looked into it, they would have seen on the bed a muscular figure, holding in its two hands the two ends of a scarf—one of these ends being slipped through a long loose knot on the other, and by pair of large sewer eyes attending upon that space between the bed-head and the wall.

A clock struck down below. Mrs. Benson could hear the dull sound of every stroke in the silent house, and a hysterical desire to scream possessed her. But then there was a slight creaking noise under the bed, and her eyes were again fixed in that strained watchfulness. The dragging noise ceased suddenly, and the watcher half well calculated that the form of her terrible visitor must push itself up head first, shoulders flat against the wall, and in a more compassionate attitude. The hideous chance was that it might come up on one side or the other of the big mattress in front of it. More dragging, then a shock head above the pillow, a stifled, gurgling cry, and the two hands of the watcher were tugging with all their might at the two ends of the woolen scarf.

Chancing to pass by the strange lady's door in the early morning, the sour landlady was startled by the sound of a voice uttering strange sounds, a medley of talking, screaming, and chuckling. She called her husband first, then the lady's servant; and after some altercation the latter insisted on breaking open the door. A clatter of falling furniture followed; and edging themselves in with some difficulty, they found the lady still in her crouching posture, and still clutching with both hands the ends of the scarf about that ghastly, staring head. At the sight of those three horrified faces she burst into a fit of hysterical crying, which probably saved her reason.

MAJOR-GENERAL U. S. GRANT.

WE publish herewith a portrait of the hero of the day, MAJOR-GENERAL ULYSSES S. GRANT, Commander of the Army at Vicksburg.

General Grant was born at Point Pleasant, Clermont Co., Ohio, on 27th April, 1822, and is consequently forty-one years of age. He entered West Point in 1839, and graduated in 1843, with Franklin, Reynolds, Steele, etc. Having entered the Fourth Infantry, he obtained his full commission at Corpus Christi in 1845, and served at all the battles under Taylor. His regiment subsequently joined General Scott, and young Grant signed conspicuously at all the battles of the old hero's campaign. For Molino del Re he got a brevet of First Lieutenant, and for Chapultepec one of Captain. He subsequently obtained his full rank as Captain, and accompanied his regiment to Oregon. In 1854 he resigned his commission, and took up his residence at Galena, Illinois.

On the outbreak of the rebellion he tendered his services to Governor Yates, and was shortly afterward appointed Colonel of the Twenty-first Illinois. On 17th May, 1861, he was commissioned a Brigadier-General, and filled various commands in Missouri and the vicinity. After the capture of Fort Henry, February 6, 1862, a new district was created, under the denomination of the District of West Tennessee, and General Grant was assigned by General Halleck to the command of it on the 14th of that month. He was in command of the Union forces at Fort Donelson from February 13 to 16, 1862, and his noted correspondence with General Buckner gained him the sobriquet of Unconditional Surrender Grant, answering to his initials of U. S. Grant. For the success of that action he was created a Major-General of Volunteers, dating from February 16, 1862.

After a few days he was again ordered into the field, and the manner in which he conducted the action at Shiloh, April 6 and 7, 1862, raised him still higher in public estimation.

He was second in command to General Halleck at the noted siege of Corinth, in May, 1862; and when General Halleck was ordered to Washington, General Grant was placed in command of the Department of Tennessee, embracing all the country west of the Tennessee River, and on both shores of the Mississippi River, from Corinth to Louisiana. He was now placed in command of the Thirteenth Army Corps, and his troops fought the famous battles of Iuka and Corinth, although General Grant did not command in person, being at Jackson, Tennessee, his head-quarters. In December, 1862, he removed his head-quarters to Holly Springs; and on the 22d of that month, his forces having been greatly increased, he divided them into four corps, viz.: the Thirteenth, Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth Corps of the United States Army.

After the attack and failure of General Sherman at Vicksburg, December 27, 1862, a regular plan of operations had to be worked out, and many schemes were planned and attempted to get into the rear of the rebel strong-hold, either from above or below, among which may be particularized the Yazoo Pass expedition, the Big Sunflower expedition, the Vicksburg Canal, the Lake Providence Canal and Great Union River, and several others; but the one that has most successfully contributed to the grand result was the moving down of his troops overland by way of the Louisiana shore, running transports and gun-boats past the Vicksburg batteries, and so carrying the men across the Mississippi to Brunnsberg and landing them under cover of the gun-boats. These manœuvres have each taken up time, but, with the exception of the last, were mere feints to draw off the attention of the rebels from his main movement. With three out of his four corps of troops he has advanced into the heart of a rebel State, taken its capital, and beaten the rebels in four pitched battles. The Herald says:

> General Grant is a modest, unassuming man, and on first taking command was regarded as a curiosity by the soldiers on account of his plainness of dress in comparison with the young and new-fledged colonels and less advanced officers, and particularly a shocking bad stove-pipe hat, which he wore for a long time before donning a military tile. The General is a man of business, and very popular with the troops. He appears about forty-five years of age, sandy complexion, reddish beard, medium height, pleasant, twinkling eyes, and he weighs about one hundred and seventy pounds. He smokes continually. He is a strict disciplinarian, and an example of General Grant's strict government of the troops in his department will be gathered from the following: On the night of the 7th of November a portion of the Twentieth regiment Illinois volunteer infantry, at Jackson, Tennessee, entered a store and some tents and took therefrom a quantity of goods and destroyed the tents, the damage amounting to $1342 66. Upon complaint of the suffering party, and a failure to ferret out the men guilty of the offense, the General issued a special field order. The two sections embodying the penalty will be read with interest. They read as follow: 1. That the said men and officers will be arrested against said regiment and the officers herein named (the names being given), excepting such enlisted men as were at the time sick in the hospital or absent with proper authority: that the same be charged against them on the proper muster and pay rolls, and the amount each is to pay noted opposite his name thereto, the officer to be assessed pro rata with the men on the amount of their pay property, and that the same so collected will be paid by the commanding officer of the regiment to the parties entitled to the same. 2. That Captain Orrin Fribley and Captain John Zuniser, of the Twentieth Illinois infantry volunteers, for wilful neglect of duty and violation of orders, are hereby mustered out of the service of the United States, to take effect this day.

CHLOASMA, OR MOTH PATCHES.

Blemishes on the face, called Moth, are very annoying, particularly to ladies of light complexion, as the discolored spots on the skin show more strongly on blushes than on brunettes, but they contribute greatly to the beauty or otherwise; and any thing that will remove moth patches without injuring the skin is a desideratum, and would no doubt be considered a great achievement in medical science. DR. C. BEHANNA, having that in view, examined and attention to Diseases of the Skin, will guarantee to remove Moth, Freckles, Tetter, Ringworm, Blackheads from the face without injury to either texture or color of the skin. Ladies residing in this, or in other branches of his specialty.—DISEASES OF THE SCALP and LOSS OF HAIR.—Will warrant him in guaranteeing a CURE in EVERY CASE. For full particulars, address, enclosing stamp for a circular,

ALL THAT IT CLAIMS TO BE.

So many compounds for the hair are offered for sale and unduly praised, that we confess we had no expectation of finding in Burnett's Cocoaine the qualities which it was said to possess. In this we have been disappointed. Members of our family who have tried it, inform it as possessing superior hair-dressing properties; while its freedom from greasiness, the tone that it imparts to the hair, and its economy, have given it a permanent place on the toilet table.

We have no hesitancy in recommending it as being equal to all that it claims to be.—Chicago Nea Consonat.

A CARD.

Owing to the increased cost of all material used in the manufacture of Cocoaine and our other preparations, we have been compelled to advance the price. Our standard QUANTITY and QUALITY will remain unimpaired.

AYER'S Cherry Pectoral

For the Rapid Cure of
COUGHS, COLDS, HOARSENESS,
INFLUENZA, BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING-
COUGH, CROUP, ASTHMA, AND INCIPIENT CONSUMPTION,
and for the relief of consumptive patients in advanced stages of the disease.

We need not speak to the public of its virtues. Throughout every town, and almost every hamlet of the American States, its wonderful cures of pulmonary complaints have made it already known. Many of these cures fill every page of civilized country on this continent without some personal acquaintance with them, and fewer yet the communities anywhere which have not among them some living trophy of its victory over this most fatal class of diseases of the throat and lungs. While it is the most powerful antidote we yet know to man for the formidable and dangerous diseases of the pulmonary organs, it is also the pleasantest and safest remedy that can be employed for infants and young persons. Parents should have it in store against the insidious enemy that steals upon them unprepared. We have abundant grounds to believe the Cherry Pectoral has saved more lives by the consumption it prevents than those it cures. Keep it by you, and cure your colds while they are curable, nor neglect the cough that in human skill can master the inexorable canker that fastened on the vitals. Many of you, we are glad know the dreadful fatality of lung disorders, and we only know, too, the victories of this remedy, and not do justice to ourselves unless them it is still made the best it can be. We spare no cost, no toil to produce it the most perfect possible, and thus afford those who trust it the best agent which our skill can furnish for their cure.

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRA'ED STOMACH BI..TERS.

TO THE MARTYRS OF LIVER COMPLAINT.—Among the wonderful medical properties which have rendered HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS pre-eminent among the health-restoring preparations of the age, its tonic-like virtues are not the least remarkable. No organ can do justice to its marvelous effect upon the diseased liver. Perhaps the strongest words of commendation suffice, we describe it as "going right to the spot," tell the liver to do its duty, and it does it. The debt right to the liver is openly acknowledged upon the relieved organ; it is also equally active on the stomach, bowels, and blood. Its combination of the three elements so essential to the well-being between the shoulders and in the right side, yellow suffusion of the skin, dizziness, drowsiness and languor, dimness of sight, colic, palpitation of the heart, dry cough, low fevers, and other symptoms, which indicate the worst disease of acute and chronic liver complaint, are one and all promptly relieved and finally removed, by the action of this famous preparation, which is at once the best of correctives, the gentlest and most genial of aperients, an infallible regulator, and a powerful restorative. Prepared on a different basis, this one Bitters as a preventive medicine, will never suffer the pains and penalties of liver disease or bilious remittent fever. This the proprietors guarantee.

Dr. Brandreth:

MY DEAR SIR: I received your letter acknowledging draft on Bank of Commerce, and thanking me for Brandreth's Pills, which have been largely sold in this town for the last thirty years.

Within a few weeks one of the most respectable of our citizens was sorely afflicted with gravel; no less than eight medical men were called in with a view to giving relief to the severe pain, which caused the patient to utter piercing cries, which were heard a block. The doctors exerted their skill in vain; as a last resort Brandreth's Pills were procured from me. I sold a full dose of six grave ese, and two boxes effected a perfect cure within two weeks. In our town, there are persons who have been cured of many severe diseases by the use of these Pills. Be sure and see my "new supply are fresh Pills and new style.

HUBBARD BROS'

GREAT DEALERS of the WORLD, NEW YORK.

Have the pleasure of announcing to their numerous Friends and Patrons in the Army, that they are prepared to fill orders and transmit parcels by mail, with the utmost care and promptitude. Watches so forwarded are registered; we take upon ourselves all risks of transportation, and guarantee a safe delivery. Just received, by European steamers, several large importations of that deservingly popular novelty, the

Railway Timekeepers,

WITH HEAVY STERLING SILVER CASES,

Exceedingly Appropriate for Army Service.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper of Feb. 21, 1863, says: "HUBBARD'S TIMEPIECES are becoming proverbial for their accuracy and reliability. They are particularly valuable for officers in the army and travelers."

The Army and Navy Gazette, of Philadelphia, in its notice of them, says: "HUBBARD'S watches are well worthy of the high character they have attained in this country."

The RAILWAY TIMEKEEPER has strong and massive STERLING SILVER cases, beautiful white enamel dial, hardened and tempered balance, with regulator, compensated, warranted to run and keep excellent time! Price per case of half dozen, $54. By mail, $1 05 additional for postage. Should retail readily at from $20 to $50 each. Liberal discount in quantities of less than six. Also the celebrated

MAGIC TIME OBSERVERS

THE PERFECTION OF MECHANISM!

BEING A HUBBARD OR OWEN FACE, OR LID'S OR GENTLEMAN'S MOVEMENT, WITH THE LATEST STEM WINDING IMPROVEMENT.

The N. Y. Illustrated News, in its issue of Jan. 10th, 1863, on page 147, voluntarily says: "We have been shown a most splendid specimen of which the HUBBARD BROS. of New York, are the sole importers. It is called the 'Magic Time Observer,' and is a Hunting and Open Face Watch combined. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and withal the best and cheapest time-keepers for general and reliable use ever offered. It has within it the combined, and by the application of its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The cases of this Watch are composed of pure metals. The outer one being fine 16 carat gold. It has the improved ruby action lever movement, and is warranted an accurate timepiece." Price, superbly engraved, per case of half dozen, $84. Sample Watches, in same Gorgeous cases, for those proposing to buy as wholesale, $35. If sent by mail the postage is 56 cents.

THESE CARDS! REQUIRED IN ADVANCE IN ALL INSTANCES! Remittances may be made in United States money or draft payable to our order; if sent by express or mail in a Registered Letter at our risk.

Just Tribute to Merit.

AT INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION, LONDON, July 11th, 1862,

Duryea's Maizena

Was the only "preparation for food from Indian Corn" that received a medal and honorable mention from the Royal Commissioners, the exemption of six prominent manufacturers of "Corn Starch and Corn Flour" or "Corn Flour" of this and other countries notwithstanding. The first and luxury of the age, without a single fault. One trial will convince the most sceptical. Makes Puddings, Cakes, Custards, Blanc Mange, &c., without bein-ghars, Gelatine or an egg, at a cost astonishing the most economical. A slight addition to ordinary Wheat Flour greatly improves Bread and Cake. It is also excellent for thickening sweet sauces, gravies for fish and meat, soups, &c. For Ice Cream nothing can compare with it. A little boiled in milk will produce rich Cream for coffee, chocolate, tea, &c. Put up in 1 pound packages, under the trademark "Maizena," with directions. A most delicious article of food for children and invalids of all ages. For sale by Grocers and Druggists everywhere.

1,200,000 Acres, in Farms of 40, 80, 120, 160 Acres and upwards, in ILLINOIS, the Garden State of America.

The Illinois Central Railroad Company offer, ON LONG CREDIT, the beautiful and fertile PRAIRIE LANDS lying along the whole line of their Railroad, 700 MILES IN LENGTH, upon the most Favorable Terms, for the benefit of Actual Settlers, Farmers, Manufacturers, and Mechanics, and to make a home for themselves and their families a competency, and a HOME they can call THEIR OWN, as will appear from the following statements:

ILLINOIS

Is about equal in extent to England, with a population of 1,717,000, and a soil capable of supporting 50,000,000. No State in the Valley of the Mississippi offers so great an inducement to the Settler as the State of Illinois. There is no part of the world where all the conditions of climate and soil so admirably combine to produce those two great staples, CORN and WHEAT.

CLIMATE.

Nowhere can the industrious farmer secure such immediate results from his labor as on these deep, rich, loamy soils, cultivated with so much ease. The climate, from the extreme southern part of the State to the Terre Haute, Alton, and St. Louis Railroad, a distance of nearly 190 miles, is well adapted to Winter wheat,

WHEAT, CORN, COTTON, TOBACCO,

Fruits, Roots, Vegetables, and every variety of fruit and vegetables is grown in great abundance, from which the Chicago, Alton, and Illinois Rivers and their tributaries find their way to the Mississippi, and thence to New Orleans. Between the Terre Haute, Alton, and St. Louis Railway and the Kankakee and Illinois Rivers a distance of 138 miles on the Branch, and 156 miles on the Main Trunk), lies the great Corn and Stock raising portion of the State.

THE ORDINARY YIELD

of Corn is from 50 to 70 bushels per acre. Cattle, Horses, Mules, Sheep, and Hogs are raised here at a small cost, and yield large profits. It is believed that no section of country presents greater inducements for Dairy Farming than the Prairies of Illinois. A branch of farming to which but little attention has been paid, and which must yield sure profitable results. Between the Kankakee and Illinois Rivers, and Chicago and Dunleith a distance of 96 miles on the Branch and 147 miles by the Main Trunk), Timothy Hay, Spring Wheat, Corn, &c. are produced in great abundance.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

The Agricultural products of Illinois are greater than those of any other State. The Wheat crop of 1861 was estimated at 75,000,000 bushels, while the Corn crop yields not less than 140,000,000 bushels, besides the crop of Oats, Barley, Rye, Buckwheat, Potatoes, Sweet Potatoes, Pumpkins, Squashes, Flax, Hemp, Peas, Clover, Cabbage, Beets, Tobacco, Sorghum, Grapes, Peaches, Apples, &c., which go to swell the vast aggregate of production in this fertile region. Over Four Million tons of produce were sent out the State of Illinois during the past year.

STOCK RAISING.

In Central and Southern Illinois uncommon advantages are presented for the extension of Stock raising. All kinds of Cattle, Horses, Mules, Sheep, Hogs, &c., of the best breeds, yield handsome profits; large fortunes have already been made, and the field is open for others to enter with the fairest prospects of like results. DAIRY FARMING also presents its inducements to many.

CULTIVATION OF COTTON.

The experiments in Cotton culture are of very great promise. Cotton was successfully grown in 1862, see Mattson on the Branch, and Assumption on the Main Line, the Company owns thousands of acres well adapted to the production of this fibre. A settler having a family of young children, can by their gainful labor to a most profitable account in the growth and perfection of this staple.

THE ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD

Traverses the whole length of the State, from the banks of the Mississippi and Lake Michigan to the Ohio. At the same imports, the Railroad runs through the centre of the State, and on either side of the road along the whole length lie the lands offered for sale.

CITIES, TOWNS, MARKETS, DEPOTS.

There are Ninety-eight Depots on the Company's Railway, giving access to over sixty miles. Cities, Towns, and Villages are situated at convenient distances throughout the whole route, where every desirable commodity may be found as readily as in the oldest cities of the Union, and where buyers are to be met for all kinds of farm produce.

EDUCATION.

Mechanics and workmen will find the free school system encouraged by the State, and endowed with a large portion of the proceeds of the sales of the school lands in sight of the school, the college, the church, and grow up with the prosperity of the leading State in the Great Western Empire.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VII.—No. 337.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 13, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3,00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE ARMY OF THE TENNESSEE.

We devote considerable space this week to illustrations of the Army of the Tennessee, whose splendid exploits are the theme of every conversation. On pages 376 and 377 we give an equestrian portrait of its gallant Commander, MAJOR-GENERAL ULYSSES S. GRANT, showing him where always he shines most—under fire; in our last number we gave a brief sketch of his life and career.

On this page we give a portrait, from a photograph by Anthony, of MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN A. LOGAN, one of the most gallant of Grant's division commanders. General Logan first attracted public attention as a member of Congress from Illinois. A lawyer by trade, he was a strong Democrat in politics; in Congress he generally acted with Senator Douglas and his friends. When the secession of the South became imminent, he was one of the most decided of the Western members in opposing the movement and in warning the Southern members, with whom he had previously acted, that their folly would unite men of all parties at the North against them. His memorable threat—that "the men of the Northwest would cleave their way down the Mississippi Valley to the Gulf of Mexico with their swords"—we illustrated last week. At the actual outbreak of war, Mr. Logan resigned his seat in Congress, and though representing a district in which Copperheadism was rampant, raised a regiment, and entered the service as its Colonel. Like M'Clernand and Wallace, he soon proved himself as able in the field as he had been in the courts and political assemblages. He served with credit under Grant at Fort Donelson, and again at Shiloh, and was speedily promoted to a Brigadier-Generalship. On the reorganization of the Army of the Tennessee last fall, General Logan took command of a division, and was applauded and confirmed a Major-General. In the recent campaign against Vicksburg he distinguished himself conspicuously.

The pictures on this page, and on page 372, are from sketches by Mr. Theodore R. Davis, our special artist who accompanied General Grant. He writes:

MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN A. LOGAN.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY ANTHONY.]

CROSSING BAYOU PIERRE.

"HEAD-QUARTERS SEVENTEENTH ARMY CORPS, NEAR BLACK RIVER, MISS., May 4, 1863.

"On the night of the first ult. the routed and disheartened rebels, under General Bowen, crossed and burned the bridge over the Bayou Pierre at Port Gibson.

"At early dawn on the second our men were on the march in eager pursuit of the flying foe. A raft bridge was speedily constructed by the negro engineer corps, under the command of the engineer officer of General Logan's division, Captain Tirrillian.

"Passing, I may say of Captain T. that he is considered one of the very best officers that we have. He has organized a corps of willing workers—negroes, who have fled from the swamps and fastnesses in which they were 'corraled' in droves like cattle. The brave soldiers of the gallant Logan's division, more than impatient at the necessary delay, were speedily crossing the just completed bridge. The yet burning structure and the often-clouded night moon lent aid and comfort to M'Pherson's corps, and they pressed on in hot haste to reach, if possible, the fleet-footed chivalry."

SHELLING THE REBEL REAR.

"HEAD-QUARTERS MAJOR-GENERAL M'PHERSON, NEAR BLACK RIVER, MISS., May 4, 1863.

"During the day the rebel force under General Bowen were closely followed in their hasty flight by a portion of General M'Pherson's command, the divisions of Generals Logan and Crocker. The rich hues of sunset were tinging the western skies as our advance reached the river. The rebel rear was exposed, and a piece of Captain De Golyer's battery being brought into position at top speed of its horses, its shot soon reached the tender part. The haste of the flying rebels may be imagined by the fact that General Bowen left his 'presented pistol' upon the hastily constructed bridge."

THE BATTLE OF RAYMOND.

"HEAD-QUARTERS MAJOR-GENERAL M'PHERSON, May 15, 1863.

"At 10 o'clock on the 12th the 'Body Guard,' under Captain Foster, discovered the enemy in small force upon the road three miles from Raymond. A portion of General Dennis's brigade—the Twentieth Ohio and Thirtieth Illinois Regiments—were deployed to the right and left of the road. Being advanced, the enemy were discovered in line of battle, occupying a commanding position, a mile and a half from Raymond.

"A section of De Golyer's battery was placed in position in the road, and at a distance of one thousand yards opened the fight, when the whole battery was placed in position, with the brigade of General Dennis for its support, it being in turn supported by the brigades of Generals Smith and Stevenson, who soon after formed in line of battle upon the right. These troops, constituting General Logan's division, were soon charged by the enemy. The charge was upon the right flank, but the previous disposition of troops frustrated it, and a sharp engagement of an hour ensued. The enemy were repulsed.

"General Crocker's division coming up, was disposed to the right, left, and reserve by General M'Pherson, and the line immediately advanced. The rebels, being driven from their position, retreated through the town toward Jackson, and our troops occupied Raymond. Our loss was 23 killed and 198 wounded. Among the killed was Colonel Richards. Colonel M'Cook was wounded."

THE CAVALRYMAN'S STORY.

"Tell again," the grandsire faltered,
Sitting by the farm-house door,
"Tell again the tale unaltered,
How you rode of yore;
It will quicken the slow beating
Of my pulse once more."

And the bronzed and bearded yeoman,
Of the wondrous, daring ride,
Through the country of the foeman
In his bright springtide,
Told with homely grace the story
By the old man's side.

"Good twelve thousand were we there, gran'ther;
Every man of us was tough
As the wiry, brown-haired panther,
And our hands were rough
As the clothes you wore when granny
Spun and wove the stuff.

"We had winered by the river
In the muddy, hutted camps,
Where we had to fight forever
With the twisting cramps
That came prowling round at night-time
Through the fogs and damps.

"But the sunny spring had brought us
Round as right as men could be;
Had you been there you had thought us
Each a gnarled oak-tree;
It could eat of hearty bacon
Then enough for three.

"Dashed we through the Rappahannock,
By brave Stoneman gayly led,
Each man eager for a square knock
On an S. C. head:
How our horses stirred the mud up
In the river's bed!

"Oh! the wild, exciting gallop
Round the trainers' hair;
Where a foe was left to wallop
Surely we were there,
Terror through the basements sending
Of his rising hair.

"Hissed the delicate-handed ladies,
Shrill between their rage and fear;
But the dark-eyed, half-bleached babies
Grinned from rear to ear,
And their sable, gladdened mothers
Never showed a sneer.

"And the brawny bondmen weary,
Stood at once erect and high,
As upon their midnight dreary
Broke a morning sky:
Guess it was the light of freedom
Flashed as we went by.

"The defenseless and the lowly
Tenderly we left unharmed;
God had made our weakness holy
And their safety charmed;
But we pounced, like sudden falcons,
On the traitors armed.

"If we thundered down the highways
To the farmered villages;
How we scouted all the by-ways
Underneath the trees;
How we stung the rebel minions
Like a swarm of bees!

"Over swamps and dusty ridges
Rushed we to the sacred streams,
And the ponderous wooden bridges,
Tracked for iron teams,
Quick as thought went bursting skyward,
With their clamps and beams.

"Flamed the wellfilled army storehouse—
Bacon smoked as ne'er before;
Burst the doors of every warehouse,
Ruined were their store;
Many a rebel missed his rations
For a month and more.

"Rumor buzzed along before us,
Threatening death to every man,
And at times, the shadow o'er us
Darkened like a ban;
But we rode so swift that Rumor
Hardly kept the van.

"Then at dark we camped so wary
Out upon the lonely heights,
With the solemn heavens starry
Holding all our lights;
And the picket's tread was muffled
Through the silent nights.

"Ten long, reckless days of danger
Swept we through the foeman's land,
Every keen-eyed, daring ranger
Bearing in his hand
All of life's uncounted value
Lightly as his brand.

"Though the perils gathered thickly
Hour by hour on every hand—
Fiery signals leaping quickly
Onward through the land—
Through a hundred leagues of foemen
Scathless came our band.

"Oh! the memories of battle
Stir me, gran'ther, by your side;
I can hear the fiery rattle
Echo far and wide;
And forever in my dreaming
That wild raid I ride."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 13, 1863.

TO ADVERTISERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY has a circulation of OVER ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND COPIES, which are scattered over the whole country. Every number is probably read, by eight or ten persons, so that advertisements in its pages reach the eye of more individuals than advertisements in any other periodical. It is essentially a home paper, and is found in every country house whose inmates take an interest in the thrilling events of the day. It is not destroyed in a week, like most city papers are, but is kept, and in many cases bound, placed in a library, and referred to from time to time. Advertisers who wish to bring their business to the notice of the public at large, and especially of the householding class, can find no medium so suitable for their purposes as Harper's Weekly.

Advertisements on the last page of Harper's Weekly are TEN DOLLARS per line; inside SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS per line. The space allotted to advertisements is limited, and an early application is advisable to secure a place.

WOULD-BE MARTYRS.

NOW that Mr. Vallandigham is comfortable among people of his own way of thinking in Canada, we presume that the noble army of would-be martyrs will undergo a diminution. It is still asserted, we perceive, by Vallandigham's friends, that the atrocious tyranny of which he bears the victim will have the effect of making him Governor of Ohio; and quite a number of aspiring politicians, anxious to be Governors or at least Congressmen, themselves are trying busily to get themselves locked up or exiled with a view to the honors and profits of martyrdom. We, however, believe we are as some of our friends seem to be that the people of Ohio will send to the Court of Jeff Davis for a successor to Governor Tod. Ohio has nearly 100,000 men in the field who are shedding their blood in a deadly struggle with rebels who welcome, appreciate, and extol Vallandigham; these citizen-soldiers and their friends will wait at all events until the war is over before they send to the enemy's camp for a Governor and Commander-in-Chief. For our part, we think that Mr. Vallandigham is effectually extinguished. By whatever specious ingenuity he may have heretofore exculpated himself from charges of disloyalty, it is patent now that he is a welcome guest among the enemies of his country, and is casting their salt, and probably sharing their counsels. They may trust him hereafter; the North never can.

As to the smart talkers and writers who are coming at the Capitol or the White House by way of Fort Lafayette, we fear their ambition will be disappointed. The price of provisions is advancing daily, and the Government is already at expense enough for their board of troops, without undertaking to fatten traitors likewise. It would be no small gain to many of these New York and Brooklyn patriots, who do claim against the destruction of our liberties, to get their board gratis this summer. But Mr. Lincoln can not afford such luxuries. The peace orators had far better give up the idea of getting free board and lodging, with eventual contingencies in the shape of a martyr's reputation, and betake themselves to some honest trade.

When the war is over, the public will probably be apt to scan rather closely the record which public men made for themselves while it was raging. At that time, protests against being classed as a contemptible Copperhead will be vain. The men who are now noisiest against the atrocious despotism of Lincoln will then call Heaven to witness that they were loyal supporters of the Government. Yet it will then be as odious to have been false to the country in her hour of greatest peril as it was eighty years ago to have joined the Tories in the Revolution. Already there are indications that public sentiment is being formed in this direction. Even among persons not over-friendly to the Government, "ticket-of-leave" men from Fort Lafayette are beginning to be shunned. Pretty soon the public will make no great distinction between a rascal who was sent to State's Prison for burglary and a traitor who was sent to Fort Warren for treason. And the stigma will stick. Our children will be brought up in holy horror of traitors, and the time will come when innocent creatures, now unborn or mere infants, will be pursued through life with the bitter and unbearable taunt that, in the dark and dreary days of the Great Rebellion, their father was a Copperhead!

THE LOUNGER.

DESPOTISM.

When the rebels, in a kind of mad spite, talk of the despotism which prevails at the North—speak of the President as his "Majesty Abraham First," or "King Lincoln"—and compliment themselves upon being relieved from the contamination of Northern society, the dull banner can hardly excite a smile among those who have the earnest work of the war upon their hands and hearts.

But when papers and orators among ourselves repeat and reiterate a thing that can positively paralyze the spirit and perplex the activity of loyal men, appealing to the basest prejudices and the meanest passions, they rely upon a party warfare while the nation is in deadly peril from armed rebellion—insisting that the danger to the country from the despotism of the Government of the United States is greater than that from the desperate rebellion of Davis and his associates—and in the same breath declaring that the proof of that despotism is its interference with free speech; there can be but one emotion in every loyal mind, and that a feeling of unutterable contempt.

There is always a public common sense which understands the interest of speeches and articles which are skillfully prepared to seem to favor what they really attack. That common sense is perfectly aware that a man who, in this critical period of our history, steadily depreciates every act and measure every word and sign of Administration, under pretense of supporting the "Government," is a man who delights in our defeats and rejoices in rebel successes. It understands that Mr. Fernando Wood is more interested in the maintenance of personal rights than General Burnside, or that the party known as the Loyal League is more unswervingly devoted to the maintenance of the supreme constitutional authority of the Government than the President of the United States, is too gross for any one, except a man who believes that Mr. Rynders really respects the right of free speech.

The people of this country have invested the authorities with unusual powers for carrying on the war and suppressing the rebellion. Nobody supposes that summary proceedings may not be often necessary, and every body knows that in case of any extreme abuse of such powers or of any tyranny, every officer will be held to the strictest account. But the spirit and method of public criticism which unfortunately exists to-day is made from real sympathy with the cause of the country or from secret hostility to it. Every candid, patriotic, intelligent, loyal man believe that the liberties of American citizens are in more danger from the action of the authorities than from the rebellion? Does such a man truly believe that a Copperhead convention, is more jealous of the national honor, or more earnestly desirous of a speedy and permanent peace than those who prefer even to see some rights temporarily abridged rather than all rights finally destroyed?

THE WESTERN BOYS.

WHILE we write, the fate of Vicksburg is undecided. But whatever that fate may be, the sturdy and undaunted spirit of the Western soldiers who have fought for a month in the very heart of the rebellion will be one of the most glorious traditions of the war.

They stand beside the river which is their giver. They fight not only for the great and general cause of the Government and of civil order which inspires all our troops, but they strike for a palpable, present object, the control of the river, which is the lifecurrent of their country, which is the natural highway to the sea of ten millions of free men between the Alleghanies and the Rocky Mountains, the vast, central basin of the continent, the valley of imperishable empire.

They fight, too, with a heroism proportioned to the grandeur of the stake, with the inspiration of men who know that justice, law, necessity, national life itself, are on their side. To the wiles of demagogues and desperate traitors they oppose a glistening front of silent steel. They know that no treaty with a foreign power can secure to them the navigation of that river so certainly as its unobstructed control by a powerful unitized nation from the head to the gulf. They know that to seek that control by separation from the Eastern and union with the Southern part of that nation would be to renounce the guarantee of a great sovereign power for the uncertain alliance of a faction which does not respect its own honorable engagements, and repudiates the unity of parts as an essential condition of collective force.

Throughout the whole land, and through our history, the praise of these men rings and shall ring forever. Men of the West, whether this time Vicksburg falls before your conquering hands, or whether its fall be yet delayed, remember that every drop of heart blood that has ever flowed or will in the land together, and binds yet more closely the bonds that hold our common country! In the East and in the West the river is the sea, all hearts follow you with hopes, and prayers, and pride, and the children of our children shall bless you!

FROM A DIARY.

THE Lounger is glad to hear once more from his friend the Diarist, who continues to jot down his little daily experiences.

I was sitting in Edward's office the other morning when John came in and announced that the world was a-dod and that I was found in the same shoe (forever) but something ever radically changed; and that when Edward was older he would know that a man was an ass who supposed there was any social progress or amelioration. It is needless for me to record that John is a full-blown Copperhead. He continued that he prided himself on his consistency. He vowed that he had never changed; that he started in life with certain fixed principles, but that while other people had budged he had been steady.

"Yes," said Edward, drily, "and the principles of such people before. The Bourbons never changed. They had a fixed principle. It was to bolt their heads against a stone wall. And they butted until they were jelly. Do you present this quality of yours as a subject of admiration? For you really seem to be plumbing yourself upon it."

"I mean," said John, "that I don't change my views of right and wrong."

"Well, who does?" replied Edward, smiling.

"Why, I should rather think you did," continued John, "for I heard Ebony the other day—think of it!—Ebony, the Abolitionist—the Abolitionist, by Jupiter!—actually praising you, my dear Edward. And I was truly sorry for you."

"How does that show any change of my view of right and wrong?"

"Why, didn't he use to search you because you believed in slavery?"

"I never believed in slavery."

"The devil you didn't."

"No—I thought that to right to be let alone, and that it would cure itself. But since the slave-drivers began to plead the country to save slavery, I am for crushing slavery to save the country, and for upsetting it so thoroughly that there shall be nothing left of it. My view of the right or wrong of slavery is precisely the same. But my view of the true policy in regard to its treatment has changed. Does that penetrate your brain my dear John? But, John—I"

"Well."

"You say that you heard Ebony, the Abolitionist, praise me?"

"Yes."

"Well, Ebony and I both go in for Union, and liberty as its security. But the other day I heard Scale, the meanest of Copperheads, praising you without stint. I have heard you flattered in many things by many, and laughed. But, by George, I blushed this time to hear you praised for doing all you could to help the rebels, under a plea of concern for the Union and Government!"

"Edward," said John, "you are a fanatic for slavery, and honor, and Union, and human rights, does not trouble me very much. But to be praised by a fanatic for slavery, indecency, dishonor, and disunion, that, I think, Master John, would be a little tough. What do you think of it?"

"I do not believe in slavery."

"What?"

"I have always been consistent. I have always said that whosoever may body would say how Slavery could be sustained in a way not more beneficial to masters and slave, I would consider the proposition."

"Governor mine!" said John, I am not abductyl in favor of theft. I say only that whenes or somebody will point out to me how thieving can be done away with, with a due regard to the right of property and of theft, I will consider it maturely. But meanwhile I must be permitted to promote theft by every means in my power. Meanwhile, for it expressly speaks of thieves breaking through and stealing, Society, thieving in some form has always prevailed, and must therefore be considered Providential, and society experts thieving and is adjusted to that expectation; and some men are clearly raised to thieves or they wouldn't be thieves; and what on earth do you propose to do with the thieves if you abolish theft? Your position and your reasoning, John, do equal honor to your brains and your heart. You are a fine Slavish social cuss and a Copperhead by natural selection."

John smiled vaguely and turned over the papers.

"I am really very much concerned about Vicksburg," he said.

"Yes, of course you are, for there is a chance of Jeff's losing it," answered Edward.

John smiled still more feebly.

"Oh, you are such a horrid Abolitionist," said he, as he walked out.

REBELS AND COPPERHEADS.

THE Copperheads and the rebels have an equally sensitive regard and veneration for the Constitution of the United States. It was a favorite and universal theory of the rebels at the time of Mr. Lincoln's election that the Constitution did not permit the Government to save itself. Mr. Russell, in his Diary, mentions by name the rebels in certain notorious Copperheads of to-day who were of the same opinion. And the Copperhead journals, which struggle to show that there is no terrorism at the South, which magnify our disasters, and nobly sneer at "Sambo," appear day after day without one single word of hearty abhorrence of the rebellion, but with painfully-elaborated columns of complaint that the Constitution of the United States is in imminent danger of destruction by—Davis and his crew? Not at all; but by the Government.

It is, indeed, marvelous to see what profound respect for the Constitution the rebels have who are slaughtering our loyal citizens by the thousands to overthrow it, and the Copperheads who are doing all that men can do to secure the success of the rebellion. Indeed, if we may judge by Copperhead or rebel authority, the Government of the United States, which acts sometimes summarily, and the great mass of the loyal people who support the Government, are wickedly regardless of the august instrument at whose foundation Washington, the only hope of maintaining the authority of the Constitution and restoring unity lies in Jeff Davis and the rebels at the South, and in Jeff Davis at the North, like Messrs. Vallandigham and Rynders.

It is not surprising, therefore, since Copperhead is only the Northern view of a rebel, to find an absolute likeness in the phrases by which the rebel and Copperhead papers and orators describe the process of subverting the Constitution in which the Government is engaged. In the rebel states, as showing the identity of spirit which animates them. By way of illustration. Can any reader tell at which of these three criticisms of the Administration at Cincinnati" are taken from rebel or Copperhead sources? The "new campaign for consolidating all power . . . and ferociously stamping down the last murmurs and struggles of those liege subjects who used to be citizens." A LITTLE DISH OF "PEACE."

MR. WALL, of New Jersey, who was confined in Fort Lafayette a year or two ago, and afterward sent to the United States Senate to complete a vacant term, lately made a speech in Philadelphia, Pa; feeling in regard to the orator, who is known to favor submission to the rebels, was so strong in that city that he was protected in speaking by two hundred "minions of Abe Lincoln," who were also the municipal "tyrants and despots" of Philadelphia.

In the course of his speech the orator said that if the North, which is the stronger of the belligerents, did not offer overtures of reconciliation the war would become one of subjugation and annihilation. Of course it will. When some citizens arm to overthrow the Government of the people, and the people accept the war, there can be but one of three results: either the rebels must be subjugated by the superior power of the Government, or they must conquer the Government; or the war must continue until the weaker party is exhausted or annihilated. In the proposition that the Government shall offer terms of reconciliation is merely the second of these alternatives. For what is a Government which, after two years' hard fighting with citizens who refuse to obey laws constitutionally made, asks them what they want, and agrees to do what they desire? It is merely a power which says, "You are stronger than I." It is a Government dishonored and destroyed, after a conspicuous failure to enforce its authority.

That is exactly the feast of "Peace" to which Messrs. Vallandigham, Wall, Wood, Kynders, Brooks, & Co. invite the country.

THE FLAG.

DEDICATED TO COLONEL ROBERT G. SHAW AND THE MASSACHUSETTS FIFTY-FOURTH REGIMENT.

At last, at last, each glowing star
In that pure field of heavenly blue,
On every people shining far,
Burns, to its utmost promise true.

Hopes in our fathers' hearts that stirred;
Justice, the seal of peace, long scorned;
Oh, perfect type, too long deferred,
At last, at last, your day has dawned.

Your day has dawned, but many an hour
Of storm and cloud, of doubt and tears,
Across the nation's sky must lower
Before the glorious noon appears.

And not for us that noontide glow:
For us the cloud, the toil, the pain;
But welcome toil, for now we know
Our children shall their glory see.

At last, at last, oh, Stars and Stripes!
Touched by your birth by Freedom's flame!
Your purifying lightning wipes
Out from our history its shame.

Stand to your faith, America!
Sad Europe, listen to our call!
Up to your manhood, Africa!
That gracious flag floats over all.

Pure as its white the future see;
Bright as its red to save the sky;
Fixed as its stars the faith shall be
That nerves our hands to do or die.

SLANDER.

MR. BENJAMIN N. MARTIN has performed a public service by writing to the New York Times that General Benham "uses no spirituous liquors when in active service." The Times upon the previous day had denounced as damaged reputations, and imputed to General Benham a "proneness to strong drink."

Now strong drinking is a great evil, but a public charge of drunkenness is not a small one. And it has become a charge which is alarmingly universal. Many of the most conspicuous civil and military leaders of the war have been its victims. For a long time it was chiefly asserted that they were only "habits were shocking." Then he smoked opium in his cigar. And the Lounger has been assured, by lovers that are extremely "liquorish," that the most important dispatches which have emanated from the State Department were prepared under the influence of strong drink. Innumerable Generals have also been painted in the same colors. Miss Dickinson is forgetful herself as to insinuate that General M'Clellan was intoxicated during the battle. General M'Dowell, who never drinks any thing stronger than lemonade, was on one day currently represented as overcome with liquor upon the field. So strong was the national tendency to charge drunkenness upon every public man that the President, whom we all knew to be a teetotaller, was described by our gentlemanly slaveholding brethren, who can not associate with vice in any form, as "a drunken baboon." The habit of imputing intemperance to the foe is so far that we have often heard the question asked of a person, whose act was singular or inexplicable, "Does he drink?"

It is beyond question that many public men seek the relief of stimulating drink, and to excess. The history of the country, of every state and city, is full of the melancholy warning. But unwise writers for the press should be more careful how they insinuate of any one what should be unsaid until its truth is beyond cavil. There is a sacred responsibility upon all newspaper writers of which we are all to forgetful. It is easy to say hasty notations—to suggest plausible suspicions—and pregnant and suggestive questions. It is as easy as to say that our soldiers are lost, and that the President is Genghis Khan, because Vallandigham is sent across the lines. And in such a case as Benham's it appears to be just as true.

LONDON LITERATURE.

How absurd literature has become a profession in London is curiously illustrated by an advertisement in a late literary paper. "To authors. Tales wanted. Good original stories, MS., containing 5000 to 50,000 words, will be liberally paid for; and rejected MSS. returned at the author's risk. Of short stories most are required; and when religious opinions are involved, they should be in favor of the national church. Translations quite unsuitable."

And another in the same paper: "To authors. A Publishing House, who (sic) intend to publish a popular history of England from 1688 to the present time, will be glad to receive proposals from competent writers for the preparation of the work."

It would be interesting to know the final result of such advertisements. Their appearance is not surprising, for the circulation of small weekly papers in London devoted to stories is enormous. The London Journal, for instance, the most popular of the class, circulates three hundred thousand copies weekly. There is a vague impression that the poorer Londoners do not read much. Yet Lloyd's penny paper circulates half a million of copies, issuing three editions, on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, respectively. It is edited by Blanchard Jerrold, son of Douglas Jerrold, and has been steadily and strongly in favor of the Union cause in this country. It is a paper of the masses, and is very influential with the laboring poor. The Daily Times, on the other hand, the first daily which circulates about forty thousand. A single copy sells for threepence. The Daily Telegraph sells for one penny, and circulates 130,000 daily. The principal owner of the Times is a Mr. Walter, although, as Kinglake tells us, it is largely owned by a company. The Telegraph belongs to a Mr. Levy, a Hebrew of Fleet Street, and George Augustus Sala is its editor. Percy B. Singer is also an editor.

Of Sala the letter to the Washington Chronicle, in which we find these statements, gives a very unattractive portrait, which may be the result of some personal difficulty. "Sala writes one leading article daily for the Telegraph, for which he receives three guineas per diem. He is also the editor of Temple Bar (a magazine) and he will write for one month, for which he was the boon companion of Train—drank his Champagne, puffed his tramway, borrowed his money, and when Train lost his property, he lost his. I do not like to mention here, but he is simply a wordy, mercenary pretender, courses in his manner and in his talents, his tatters."

Of his "Captain Dangerous," which this writer calls "a flimsy sketch of rubbish," the Athenæum says: "As a book Captain Dangerous is of an obsolete form of literature, setting forth with much vigor and freshness of humor a living writer's ideal of the views and ways of life of a class of men and manners now for some generations since, the book will delight those who are familiar with the sources from which its stores of information have been drawn."

A COMMON COMPLAINT.

"NEW YORK, Monday, June 1, 1863.

"DEAR MR. LOUNGER,—We are a quiet and quiet-natured Lounger, incline your ear to the grievances of the fair sex! Will you deign to use the services of a little sympathy and a little advice while we lay our cause of complaint before you? Our dresses are getting beyond endurance—in fact, it has ceased to be a virtue.

"We will not stop to know whether it is well here or gallant for a crowd of elaborately-dressed men—not ex-tiemen—to post themselves in front of the Fifth Avenue Hotel every time when people are en route to and from church, for the sole purpose of criticising the ladies. Is it a joke for them to make satisfactory comments on dress or looks, and our style generally? It is very good-looking, if we don't say so ourselves, and we are particular. We were plain, we certainly can dispense with a proclamation of the fact, but whether that little bustle contrivance is re-enacted, until the Fifth Avenue Hotel is positively dreaded by the ladies. Nor can we avoid the infliction, unless we be so rash as to go unaccompanied by our principal churches. Now, dear Lounger, won't you have those blackguards have a gentle hint as to the fate of your lady readers? Do, and we'll be your firm friends and allies ever after.

"ONE OF THE SUFFERERS."

It is an old complaint, dear ladies. In Thackeray's "Pendennis," you will remember a charming poem at "the Church Perch," which is not indeed the hotel perch, but the lounging around both places is the very same. And when Miss Fotheringay was a man at the Lounger's elbow this moment who says that the world never moves; that nothing ever changes; and that what has been will continue to be forever. What do you think of that? There will indeed, we fear, for a long time be plenty of room for the criticism of the gentlemen, and criticism audibly or inaudibly the aspect of the ladies who pass before them. But as to dress, the avoidance is very simple, but it is quite effective. Cross to the other side of the street, ladies; and in effect that is the public opinion. A great city there must be a great many inconveniences and nuisances which you can not wholly escape.

In the gallery with the Aquaria at Barnum's Museum there is a large picture, painted by Louis Lebrun, of John Brown on his way to execution. He is just leaving the jail under military escort and meets his young woman wife and child. Well were of the despised race for whose sake he had suffered so much, and was now about to lay down his life. He passed a negro woman with a black baby and the child tenderly." It is one of the incidents that history will always fondly record and art delineate. The fierce and bitter fighting of the abolitionists in the old man is already tempered. Despised and forsaken in his own day, the heart of another generation may well hail him as the hero of the anti-cast child. In the picture his head is conspicuous against the yellow ground of the flag which surrounds it like a halo. The eager officer by his side pushes the mother away, and the bedizened soldier in the fore-ground looks as if he had just left the confectioner, there is a solemnity and pathos in it which is wanting in many a finer painting.

When the Lounger was a boy and went to museums, the chief and terrible attraction was the murder of old Mr. White in Salem, done in wax. But here for the boys of to-day is a terrible scene of another kind, to which the artist has brought an earnest and loving hand. Mr. Barnum will be in the constant throng at the Museum—more than many books or orations, will repeat the significant story to the popular heart. That heart will remember long that those who were fiercest in their condemnation of John Brown are faintest in their censure of the rebels.

LITERARY.

MR. WALTER LOW, the bookseller at No. 823 Broadway, has the good and most useful habit of advertising in every Saturday's Evening Post the new books of the week. Readers and buyers will find his bulletin a great convenience.

Mr. Low has also for sale the admirable photograph by Rockwood of Darley's characteristic drawing, "The Story of a Battle."

Bayard Taylor has a novel in press, called "The Strong-Minded Woman: a Romance of American Life."

Donald G. Mitchell, "Ik Marvel," has a new book nearly ready—"My Farm: a Book on Rural Affairs." When Rubens was sent as minister to a foreign court he said that he was a painter playing ambassador. Mr. Mitchell would probably call himself a farmer playing author.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WHEN Mademoiselle Arnault, the actress, went to visit Voltaire, he said to her, "Ah! Mademoiselle, I am eighty-four years old, and I am considered as many footsteps." "Quite a trifle," replied the actress; "I am only forty, and have committed a thousand."

Some poet says the wind kisses the waves. That, we suppose, is the reason they "kiss for a blow," about which we have heard so much.

The young man who asked the daughter's hand and got the father's heart, the consolation of knowing that his wooing was not heatless.

"Ah," said a teacher—"ah, Caroline Jones, what do you think you would have done if you had been born of your mother?" "I suppose, mum," said Caroline, who was very much struck with the soft appeal, "I suppose, mum, as I should ha' been a orphan."

On hearing a clergyman remark, "the world is full of change," Mr. Punch remarked that he could hardly bring her mind to believe it, so little found its way into her pocket.

Often at fashionable balls we have seen a good many gents, and a pair of kids to every gent.

A young gentleman having made some progress in acquaintance with a young lady, addressed a few verses to an organ-grinder in his parent seat, but was astonished at receiving the following reply: "Get out, you fool!"

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

VICKSBURG.

Up to this, three assaults had been made by our forces on the rebel strong-hold, and in each case with success repulsed. The last assault was made by General Sherman, with the utmost determination, in which we lost six hundred killed and a large number wounded. Our color line is within one hundred yards of the rebel works. Our sharp-shooters prevent the rebels from working their guns. The rebel works lie in the rear of the city are far more formidable than those in front. General Joe Johnston is in the neighborhood of Jackson with about fifteen thousand men, and is reported to be short of provisions and ammunition. General Grant has taken 6000 prisoners and 54 pieces of artillery.

LOSS OF THE "CINCINNATI."

News from Memphis to the 1st inst. recounts the destruction of the United States gun-boat Cincinnati by the fire of the rebel batteries on the 26th ult., and the loss of fifteen by forty killed and wounded.

FOSTER ON THE YAZOO.

The following dispatch was received last week at the Navy Department:

"HEADQUARTERS, "BLUE HAWK," MISSISSIPPI SQUADRON,
"STEAM YAZOO RIVER, May 31, via STEAMER ——.

"To Hon. Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy:

"SIR,—I have the honor to inform you that the expedition under the command of Lieutenant Commander Walker, after visiting Satartia, Yazoo City, and Benton Bluff, was perfectly successful.

"Three powerful steamers and a ram were destroyed at Yazoo City. The ram was a monster, 310 feet long, 70 feet beam, and covered with four inch iron plates. Also a fine navy-yard, with machine shops of all kinds, sawmills, foundries, &c., &c., were burned up.

The property destroyed and captured amounted to over two millions of dollars.

Had the monster ram been finished she would have given us some trouble.

One battery was destroyed at Drury's Bluff.

Our loss on the expedition was six killed and seven wounded. DAVID D. FOSTER,

Acting Rear-Admiral, Lower Mississippi.

GENERAL BANKS'S OPERATIONS.

Address from the Legislature of the Gold to the 24th ult. states that Port Hudson, like Vicksburg, is in a state of siege. A preliminary reconnoissance was made from Baton Rouge on the 12th, Colonel Grierson with his famous cavalry covering the rear. It was further continued on the 13th, and the rebel pickets at Port Hudson were driven in. Colonel Grierson proceeded to Clinton and Woodville completing committing the piece, and succeeded in destroying a railroad bridge. On the 14th reconnoissance was pushed to within a mile and a half of the rebel works without bringing on an engagement. On the 21st, however, a heavy force having been brought up from Baton Rouge, the 13th army corps, under the command of General Augur, and the 19th army corps, under General Banks, the whole commanded by General Banks, the whole commanded by General Banks in person, the rebels were driven into their works, leaving a large number of killed and wounded on the field. The 19th army corps was then reinforced by our forces, if it has not already fallen into our hands.

A FIGHT AT FLORENCE.

A dispatch from Cincinnati, dated June 5, says that Colonel Conyn defeated General Roddy at Florence, Alabama, on the 27th ult., capturing one hundred men, eight officers, four hundred mules, and three hundred horses. Also about fifty thousand dollars worth of clothing, boots, families, mills, and every thing else useful to the enemy that he could lay his hands on.

THE REBEL ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

It is stated that the enemy is in motion, their trains being all packed and moving toward Culpepper, guarded by a heavy column of troops. General Lee, it is said, has issued an address to his troops congratulating them upon their past achievements and foreshadowing a raid into Pennsylvania. It is known that they are in motion, and rapid marches through a country without railroads, and with open every man to be prepared for the severest hardships.

BURNSIDE AT WORK.

A correspondent of the Chicago Tribune, by authority of General Burnside, contradicts the statement that he has asked to be relieved of the command of the Department of the Ohio. He says, on the contrary, that the command it was with the understanding that he should take the field with his Ninth Army Corps, and that orders were to be forwarded to him, and pierce through Kentucky and Tennessee. He did not intend to remain in Cincinnati more than ten days, but has been detained until now. He proposes to leave for the front in a few days, and will take immediate command of the troops. His health is fully restored with those of Tennessee, and also with those of Grant, as soon as Vicksburg is taken.

GENERAL BURNSIDE'S HEADQUARTERS.

A dispatch was sent under a flag of truce last week by General Burnside to General Bragg, stating that if any retaliation for the hanging of two rebel spies was made according to the usages of war, should be resorted to by the rebels he will hang all the rebel officers in his hands.

UNION PRISONERS HELD BY THE REBELS.

It appears that measures are being taken to parole the officers of Colonel Streight's command, recently captured near Rome, Georgia; but still retain them as prisoners of war at Richmond.

EXPLOITS OF THE ENGLISH PIRATES.

The following are the names of the rebel officers who were elected in Western Virginia on the 28th ult.:

Governor—F. H. PIERPONT.
Lieutenant-Governor—L. C. P. CORPER.
Attorney-General—J. S. BOSWELL.

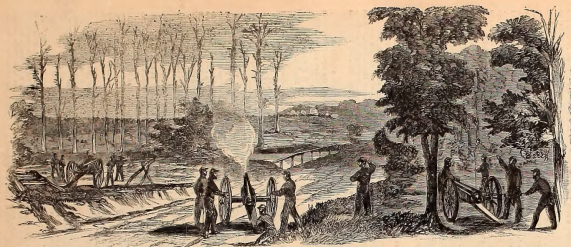
FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

SEIZURE OF BRITISH VESSELS.

EARL RUSSELL, in the House of Lords, defended the American prize courts and the course of policy of Secretary Seward in general, in the case of captured British vessels of the blockading coast against a severe attack of the Earl of Derby and others. He stated that when the law officers of the Crown had considered almost every case of seizure, only four reported were found to be on rational ground of objection" to the action of the American prize courts.

MEXICO.



REPORTED FALL OF PUEBLA.

It is reported that the French have ultimately succeeded in the capture of Puebla, with its commander-in-chief General Ortega, and a large number of inferior officers, and thousands of soldiers. The garrison artillery, by the cessation of supplies, is said to have been reduced to 60 rounds. It is said that immediately on the arrival of his heavy guns the French General Forey opened a tremendous bombardment on the city, and on the 17th ult. ordered a general assault. The garrison, however, is said to have made but little resistance, and the whole force, commander, officers, soldiers, and artillery, unconditionally surrendered. The whole story needs confirmation.

BRAZIL.

HOW AN HONEST GOVERNMENT ACTS.

The recent raids of the privateer Alabama on the coast of Brazil have provoked the indignation of that country to remove the commander at Fernando de Noronha for permitting the rebel vessel depredations in Brazilian waters, and her presence in that region was forbidden by his consul.

THE PROFESSOR.

"An you please."

"Good-evening."

"Good-by!"

That was the thing called a lover's quarrel as nearly as can be described (for, in that condition, mortals dwell in no curious an atmosphere of intuitions, gestures, and glances, that mere earthly dictionaries have no scales fine enough for the proper weighing out of such precious and subtle commodities); a thing, unfortunately, out of the province of medicine, and apt to be a hopeless affair enough, as it is quite sure to require a giving up of self-will, and a going on pilgrimage into the Valley of Humiliation, for which, in this case at least, the parties concerned by no means felt a call.

Violet was positive on that score, as she sat thinking over the pithy conversation quoted above, mechanically pulling violets and camelias to pieces —remnants of a bouquet that he had given her—and looking at a package of letters addressed Captain John Luynes, and a little satin-lined case, in which was her betrothal ring. Although from the street of the room, one might have imagined that she waxed after the fashion of the Southern chivalry, and, having killed her love, had killed also; but, at any rate, one thing was certain—there could not have been a more unfortunate morning.

Not but that the morning was well enough in itself—one of those brisk, stirring mornings, when the flowers seem to be in a hurry to get out, and there is a general stir among the birds, and communication in the barn-yards, and big blundering bees rush in and out as if distracted with the pride of business, and the leaves, and the wind, and the water, and the sunshine keep up a continual waving and shimmering, sparkling and quivering. Violet's fairy godmother—by-the-by, have I mentioned that she had a fairy godmother? or that this is an old-fashioned story, dating back as far as "once upon a time," in which fairies are to trip in and out at their pleasure and mine, in utter despite of probability or common sense? if not, let it be understood now, and let me go on to tell you how Violet's fairy godmother had chosen this of all unlucky mornings for her yearly visit, and, coming without ceremony down the chimney—for she was an old-fashioned soul—surprised Violet in the midst of her sulks and her expressive room.

Worse than that, she wore her spectacles—fairy spectacles, of course, the Giants of Kir, possessed of the peculiar property of reading people's thoughts —so it was of no use for Violet to feign raptures over her coming of the sharp little old fairy godmother.

"You know you are not glad to see me," said her godmother, shortly; "so please don't say you are. You wish me a hundred miles away; for you don't know of what use that to do with your lovers and your love-tokens." Clicking her golden heeltips with emphasis; for she was knitting stockings out of cornsilk.

Now Violet was a plucky young lady.

"I can't contradict you, though you should turn me into a cat and send me on pilgrimage," she answered, with spirit.

"Oh, make yourself easy, god-daughter," returns the Fairy, with a chuckle. "I owe the race of cats no ill-will at present, nor you either. On the contrary, you see I have brought you a gift," tossing a ring into Violet's lap.

Violet slipped it on her finger.

"Thank you, godmother." But the next moment she cried out in terror, "Why, it won't come off, godmother."

"No," said the Fairy; "but then it has this excellent property: while you wear it your every wish will be fulfilled."

And with that, sticking her needles into their sheath, she whisked up the chimney so smartly that Violet had not time for so much as a syllable in reply.

Violet looked dubiously after her, and then at the ring. It was a simple little circlet—a mere line of gold scarcely noticeable on her finger.

I wonder if godmother has any conscience," she thought, "and whether it is right for fairies to fib it. I wish—"

"Did you ring?" asked a small voice at her elbow.

Violet stared and rubbed her eyes, and stared again; but there was! a little figure not twice as long as her finger, in a professor's cap and gown, looking at her with an important air over the top of his spectacles.

"Ring!" repeated Violet.

"The ring on your finger," he explained, "is simply the handle of a bell-pull in the Fairy Godmother. My bell, Miss, which, acted upon by your wish, sounds in my study, and calls me at once from Fairy-land. I am the Queen's professor of human nature."

"Of what?"

"Human nature. We study your race precisely as you do crustacea and mammalia. In all ages you have been the subjects of our profound and scientific inquiry, specially the class to which you yourself belong, at once the most difficult and entertaining from the infinite variety you afford, and the impossibility of considering you as under the dominion of any laws except that of contraries. But we waste time," pulling out a watch the size of a dew-drop. "What is your wish?"

"I don't quite like to send this package to Captain Luynes, and I do not choose to tell any one in the house about it, but—"

"Oh, make yourself easy," returned the professor of human nature, with infinite condescension. "In the cause of science you mortals are quite content to dig and butcher. For a new development in my favorite study I am quite willing to perform a menial service."

Now all this Violet might have thought a dream; but as he spoke both ring and letters disappeared. There was not a trace that they were gone, and had vanished with him; so doubtless Jack had already, and would begin now to believe that she was in earnest, and had a mind of her own; which thought so cheered her that she began to cry.

In the midst of this feminine amusement came an airy tap at the door, followed by a vision—an earthly one this time, but a very pretty one, Belle Layton, Violet's best friend.

"I didn't wait, my dear," cried Belle. "I knew you would see me, and I am in such a hurry! There! don't speak! there isn't time. My marriage is waiting, and I want you to get ready now and come and stay a week with me. I have driven here on purpose, and you must come. I have asked ever so many nice people, and among them Jack Luynes of course.

"Won't I torment him?" thought Violet. "Come, child, call Bessie, and let her pack up your trunk, and be sure you bring your hat, and—I did! I tell you about our beat, and—do hurry—there is a precious child, so that we can get back for lunch."

"I wish that Jack would start before we do," thought Violet. "I should so like to meet him at the door, and then he will be sorry."

Could it be her overheated imagination, or did she really, at that moment, see Lilliputian professor's cap and gown skurrying past her window? She so wondered about it while packing that she scarcely heard Belle's chattering; and when they had reached Layton House and passed the great iron gates, her heart began to beat thick and fast. Should she find him waiting? Would her wish indeed be fulfilled? Some one came down the steps, helped Belle out, and held out a hand to her —Jack Luynes, who had grown quite a few moments before them! Violet barely glanced up, and waved away his proffered hand with a little airy gesture of contempt; but he placed himself between her and the steps.

"One moment, I pray," said he. "Is what you have done this morning the result of pique, or a deliberate conclusion?"

"A conclusion—in every sense."

"You are determined then."

"Quite."

Here Violet heard a low whistle, and there, perched on the tip of her parasol, was the Professor of human nature, note-book in hand, and looking for her in contented wonderment. Jack turned quietly away. Violet ran up stairs in prodigious spirits. She had him now sure enough.

"I wish now," she thought, "that Ottoman Velours may come and make himself ridiculous as soon as may be, for I am in earnest about a few."

The Professor vanished from the tip of or parasol. Violet went on with her dressing. She rolled her hair her prettiest, and put on her pink cherry bow jauntily therein because Jack liked it. He fancied, too, a certain blue dress and velvet waistband proving very becoming to her eyes. She knew just what pleased him, so she had him at a disadvantage, and could be at once as irresistible and provoking as she chose. She was sure of Captain Ottoman Velours below; for by this time she had full faith in the power of her ring, and had prepared a little greeting for him beforehand that took that weak youth by storm, and made Jack more very jealous and miserable than ever.

Ottoman was not troubled with sharply-defined ideas; but he thought Violet a very pretty girl, and that Captain Velours would not scout ill-appetite. He entertained a notion also that in some way young men made themselves indispensable to pretty girls whom they liked, and whom many sounded well with theirs. Violet and he owned few points in common, to be sure, but then she was friends! He had seen them walking, riding, white, puffed arrangements of hers, and he had just now the loveliest set! Violet listened graciously, as she would have done had he simply gibbered. The Professor of human nature, perched on his knee, and hard at work with his note-book, did indeed look up occasionally in utter benevolence and stupefaction; but she was all animation, for Jack was lingering unusually near them. Presently he turned away and joined Belle Leighton. Violet flagged at once.

"I wish I knew what they are talking about," she thought.

The Professor came up with a jerk from his notebook, and handed her an ear-trumpet about the size of a pea—a small one which she hid away in her little pocket.

"What is the matter?" she heard Belle ask. "You and Violet have scarcely spoken, and see how she is flirting with Ottoman Velours!"

"I see."

"Have you quarreled?"

"She has."

"An impossibility. You know the old proverb."

"I was certainly wrong also; but I wished for reconciliation, and she is inexorable."

"What will you do?"

"Nothing."

"Oh yes, you will."

"No, I am not on that point. Change the subject. You are looking singularly well."

"That is nothing to you."

"Yes, I set operations in the hottest of breathless days, when the young men drove through the Ormsted avenue of elms, and fastened the horses under the shade, when the road they had been slowly following lay behind them, a white, dazzling line. It was high noon, and as for Jack, he was fast asleep, as sailors, and Nature held her breath for fear of waking him. Oglethorpe followed his friend to the trysting-place. There was female figure in it, pink or odd attire, sprang for flight like startled kittens. But Ormsted made a successful foray and captured one.

"It's of no use, Kate; you may rs well give us a full view of that costume."

"Why didn't you let us know you were coming, you disagreeable!" cried Kate, laughing and shrinking. She was sure her lover would think her pretty in any thing; but that fastidious Mr. Oglethorpe! How could Agnes Sebastian take it so coolly?

"I sent at least six dispatches in all, but they cried, "and then be rid of this hateful ring forever."

That very moment she was going down stairs, and making straight for the reading-room, though she knew that Jack was there and alone. He looked at her sternly enough, but she came up to him, holding out both hands, and saying,

"Oh, Jack! please forgive me. I am sorry that I have been disagreeable, and I do love you; and Jack—I will—I will wear my hair any way that you please."

That was the point in dispute; hence all this woe and nonsense.

When the Professor heard that, "Lord what fools these mortals be!" he cried, shutting up his book with a bang, and disappearing in company with the ring from sight.

Jack took her to his heart at once. Little pleading and pretty tearful faces are hard things to withstand; yet trust me, even too entirely, fair enslavers. It is not every one that has a fairy godmother to teach her wholesome lessons in time.

JONATHAN TU JOHN.

"Ha, ha, ha! good-by, John."

Good-by, John! you and I have parted—

Ya've too lectle calmin', and too much pride;
When thare's trubble ahead ya air too faint-hearted
To stan' by.

Too apt ta pass by on the uther side.
Fur mensy a year we hev stood together,
Back ta back on the banner ov "Right" unfurled;
Now, in a lectle threatning weather,
Ya've pulled yourn down before awl the world.

Good-by, John! I've given you warnin'
And fetch'd ya back many a time too much pat;
If ya didn't take care, thet you'd wake some morning
And findy'd forgotten tu save yureself!
I hev told you thet honor alone was wuth keepin',
And how awl treashures ov silver and gold;
But 'twar in vain, fur ya would git tu sleepin'
An' dreamin', ez fokes will; you've let go your hold.

Good-by, John, ez this bull crushes,
Cool fool me ez say ez some fool you—
Whoever will cry up the British nashun,
And jine in the mensy, ya thinkt'll do.
So deown on yure knees in the dust you'll waller,
And riggle yureself awl reound like an eel,
But 'twon't be much ov a path ya can follow
Hawk quick when yare skin is tutched ya feel.

Good-by, John! Ya've showed yure hypockracy
A lectle too soon this time, I guess!
Ya've set too much store by "aristockracy,"
And got yureself in an awful bad mess.
Yure British Lion, ya've bragged and blustered
Ez ef he could whip awl the world, ef he hookt 'n;
Sort ov kurls down his tail, and looks dreffful flustered
When he sees the flag ov Freedom go by.

Good-by, John! Once fur awl, we're strangers—
I sha'n't bow low tu ya in the street.
My present way leads thru sum small dangers,
But I'm used tu the trade, tu the wust fee to meet.
Tu the Stars and Stripes I've sworn devotion,
I'm pushing forrard by Freedom's side—
It won't be a grate while, I've a notion,
When the time'll come tu pull deown yure pride.

CHARITY GRIMES.

AGNES SEBASTIAN.

ORDSTEN banged together the ledger covers, and looked solemnly out of the broad piazza at his left into a small bricked yard three stories below him. His eyes wandered over the tin roof of the next old brick block; then above to the crowd of chimneys; finally to a square yard of white, blinding sky. Then he turned to his friend, who sat in the American attitude, reading the newspaper.

"Did you say you were going to stay in town all through August, Thorp?"

"What else can I do? I've no heart for pleasuring; as little for fighting, which latter I ought in all propriety to do, for the other. Ormsted, I wish I could see my way as clearly as you do."

"So much for my sound political training. You are an idealist, Thorp. I believe, in the Democratic. But the trouble now is, you are trying too hard to be convinced. Just put it all out of your head till next fall. Dancroft will see me. You'll come out right."

"Well, I hope so."

"You see, there's father to talk big Senator, and mother and Kate sewing soldiers' shirts—"

"Unanswerable argument!"

"And you can lie on your back all day under a tree, and get quiet, which seems to be the first point."

"I agree. I dread staying here in this pile of brick and fighting devils."

Angels I'd operated in the hottest of breathless days, when the young men drove through the Ormsted avenue of elms, and fastened the horses under the shade, when the road they had been slowly following lay behind them, a white, dazzling line. It was high noon, and as for Jack, he was fast asleep, as sailors, and Nature held her breath for fear of waking him. Oglethorpe followed his friend to the trysting-place. There was female figure in it, pink or odd attire, sprang for flight like startled kittens. But Ormsted made a successful foray and captured one.

"It's of no use, Kate; you may rs well give us a full view of that costume."

"Why didn't you let us know you were coming, you disagreeable!" cried Kate, laughing and shrinking. She was sure her lover would think her pretty in any thing; but that fastidious Mr. Oglethorpe! How could Agnes Sebastian take it so coolly?

"I sent at least six dispatches in all, but they all in your useful post-office, I suppose; or father has got 'em in his pocket, perhaps. Never mind, I'm glad. I should never have seen your longcome-about. Upon my word, it's not a bad getup."

The girls, fancying themselves safe from witnesses, had donned light sacks, with short skirts, and had combed their hair behind their ears, fastening it as the Medicean Venus wears hers. Kate was protesque, but Agnes superb. After a quiet glance Oglethorpe held out his hand.

"Don't say you have forgotten me, Miss Sebastian."

"How do you do, Mr. Oglethorpe?" yielding hers.

"You remember me, then?"

"Perfectly."

"Oh, you know each other!" Kate exclaimed. "That's splendid."

"Not by any means since I have seen you," resumed Oglethorpe. "How is the arm? I still wear a scar in memory of that night."

Agnes pushed up her wide sleeve and showed a white mark. "It will always last me," said she.

"What in the world—" began Kate, with wonder-stricken eyes, but was interrupted for the moment by the entrance of the father and mother, under cover of their welcoming the two girls made Kate. Agnes then began to take out her dresses and lay them out in order for choice.

"Now, Agnes Sebastian, you never told me you knew Oglethorpe."

"I don't think I do."

"Don't! You were telling you all sorts of nonsense about him, and you such friends. It's too bad! Don't you ever tell him what I've said."

"Is it worth while, even if I do, to warn him but once in my life?"

"You must have got on fast. Where was it?"

"At one of Mrs. Livingstone's concerts."

"But about the scar?"

"Mercy! I was introduced early in the evening, and after the music (we had Coro's band, Kate—suck music!) we went in to supper. There was a great lunt, and he took me to get me a berry to drink coffee. The room was highly decorated—old arrangements made with glass shades and waxlights. One of them fell on me. I was burned and cut, and went home."

"What did Oglethorpe do?"

"He tied me up, and bleeding arm."

"And what else?"

"That's all."

"Yes, I suppose so. The play of Hamlet, with the part of Hamlet left out. I know Will Oglethorpe, and you, Agnes, and believe there was something more."

After tea Oglethorpe endeavored to gather up the lost threads, but found some reserve even with Miss Sebastian. He had never forgotten the prettiest figure in the room, with the dress of rose-colored tarlatan, the hair dressed with a silken swish as she walked. The whole evening had been one of those unaccountable, delicious pauses, making flower scents, picturesque dressing, and just enough of love approximation to render it piquant. It all flashed back upon him as he spoke to her first.

"A pretty woman unsteadies the brain like wine," thought he. "What wonderful eyes she has, and what a very dark brown!"

In a little while she rose, drawing a feathery shawl over her arm.

"I must say good-night."

"Don't go. It's very early. I want to ask you about Miss Hussing and other friends."

"There is plenty of time. I made a promise to go to bed at nine every night."

"And when does your moonlight? I never saw any thing to surpass this. The river is like a burnished shield."

"I see it from my window, and the belated schooners coming up as noiseless as genii."

"You can't sleep if you try."

"I can dream then."

"Then I shall. If you go I shall become that intolerable third person singular. See how obliging they are to-day."

"They behave very prettily. Good-night."

"Which is the nearest door?"

On the southwest corner, overlooking the garden."

"I have a mind to serenade you."

"That will be good employment for you; only it is apt to spoil the voice."

"Miss Sebastian, I have become of Bouverie," the young man said to himself, as he strolled toward the river and left the lovers alone to their further end of the piazza. Ormsted started him off.

"Agnes's engagement still continues, I suppose?"

"Dear me, yes. And will for the next ten years I'm afraid."

"What are they waiting for?"

"Oh, for Bouverie to make his fortune! He has been in Italy three years now. Any thing but a genius for a husband, by Jo!"

"Where are you going?" demanded Oglethorpe with Yankee abruptness, following Miss Sebastian after a moment's talk. "May I have a cigar?"

"I am going to see the mowing-machine. You may come."

They crossed freshly-mown lots. The air was full of the indefinite deliciousness of cut grass, odorous sunlight.

"I thought the haying season was over before this?" remarked her companion.

"I mean to have had one, by mercy to say. It has been one of my chief amusements. I've been in the fields almost as much as the hay-makers."

"I must say the old implements were the most picturesque. The mower and his scythe will soon belong to the past. Maud Muller would have no use for her rake."

"She must ride the machine."

"Wouldn't this scene make a pretty picture? The sky is full of opalescent grays, and just at the edge of those hills is that vivid carmine, with shadowy meads, this undulating pasture crossed with shadows, and the busy figures in the foreground. The great cart loaded with hay, oxen of burnt sienna, and John, conspicuous in his bright blue overalls. With the perfect coloring threw over all the luxury of August and the melancholy of sunset."

"The prettiest pictures are unpainted," said Agnes.

"The sweetest songs unsung."

"The noblest poems unwritten."

"All the best things are undone," added Oglethorpe, with a half sigh. "My opinion is," speaking with sudden sincerity, "that it is not the amount of evil we do, but the good we leave undone, that will be our condemnation. I'm afraid it will go hard with me. I never was inclined to neutral territory in my life. Now when indecision is a crime, I hesitate. Every dear association, every habit of life and education, all questions of apparent expediency pulling me one way, and a sort of innate loyalty impelling the other."

"Are you thinking of the war?" Agnes timidly questioned.

"Yes," he answered shortly, meeting her soft gaze. "Can Maine advise Georgia?"

"I can't advise; I can see but one side, and can not talk reasonably on that. Why don't you talk with Mr. Ormstead?"

"The senior? So I do. Every night after you leave me I have long arguments with him."

"He is said to be clear and convincing."

"Yes, he talks of war and policy in the abstract, and I wish it was no longer. He convicts me, Miss Sebastian, but—" He stopped.

"How fast it grows dim!" said Agnes, willing to turn the conversation. Such a mind as his must work alone, she knew.

"Agnes," said Kate, during one of their curtain consultations, "I'm going to tell the gorgeous Georgian about Gus Bouverie."

"He is about him long enough," Agnes replied.

"But you may make assurance doubly sure."

"If he wasn't such a secessionist I declare I should be very alarmed about you. Such devotion I never saw equaled. Don't you waver?"

"Don't talk so, Kate. I wish a man and a woman could once honestly like each other without the outsiders giving the alarm and crying love or flirtation."

"If I can read men's faces he is head over heels."

"What an expression! Mr. Ormstead should teach you purposes of language, Kate."

The merry blonde laughed.

"It's true, nevertheless. He looks anxious and has grown quite haughty and sarcastic. What a further taking down there will be may I live to see."

And she ran down stairs.

After tea, when, as usual, all turned to the broad piazza, Agnes seated herself on the lowest step and called the dog. Presently Oglethorpe came along the walk. He coolly ordered Figaro to change sides, and threw himself on the green embankment beside her.

"The pears are turning," remarked Ormsted. "I have got to whittle a bits at one."

"And I, too," echoed Oglethorpe, with a glance at the composed face near him.

"I am going to see if there is a yellow one to be found," said Kate. "The trees in the south orchard ought to furnish something." And off she ran, and Ormsted after her.

Miss Sebastian stroked Figaro's ears as he leaned his brown head on her lap. Oglethorpe watched the white fingers. What would he not give to be caressed by them! Senseless old dog! Figaro appreciated the gentle attention, however, and looked up at Agnes, solemnly winking his soft, yellow eyes. Oglethorpe took up the book she had left on the step. She had carried it about with her all summer trying to read; but books did not seem to interest her now. It was a volume of a broad ribbon, of the red, white, and blue, marked the page.

"The ninety-seventh page still. You don't let your interest hurry you." Then winding the ribbon round his finger: "I have adopted these colors, and vow to fight under them, Miss Sebastian."

Her face was not pale or composed now.

"Have you really?"

"Yes, really."

She took the ribbon to pin it on his coat. He saw tears in her eyes while she smiled. The pin would not go in. He put up his hand to help her, and touched her knuckles. He held the little treasuring hand still, close to his breast.

"Agnes!—in those delicious tones—"I am your soldier!"

"Not mine. Your country's," gently trying to withdraw her hand.

"You will not let me be yours?"

"I can not. Oh, Mr. Oglethorpe, let me go!"

"Not till you understand me. I must tell you how—"

"Don't tell me any thing."

She would so violently she could scarcely command her voice. Oglethorpe saw the shame and grief in her face.

"I can hide. You are not bound by any past; you do not love any one?"

"I have been engaged these five years. I thought you knew that."

"To Augustus Bouverie?"

"Yes."

He let her hand drop. She covered her face and began to cry silently. He did not speak for a moment. Then said, very gently,

"I thought that was broken."

"It was broken; but only for a week. I was hard set then, and yielded to the stronger power."

"We shall neither of us feel more sorely if we are frank. As I have spoken, let me say a little more. A week ago I wrote to your aunt, asking if there was any reason why I should not try to win you. Here is her answer. You see she tells me nothing, only gives me her warmest wishes for my success."

Agnes's tears were now dried. She scarcely glanced at the letter, but rose.

"She knew I was to marry Mr. Bouverie. You will never be able to forgive this."

Oglethorpe caught hold of her muslin flounce.

"Don't leave me. The only thing, and the least is, to do nothing. Sit down here again, Miss Sebastian. I am going to-morrow."

As if that made the matter better!

She obeyed him, however.

"You don't think I blame you? The shade of reserve in your manner, meant to distance, only attracted me. The mischief was done before I came to your aunt. The only thing I wished to prevent was annoyance to you; and now you are feeling more than it is all worth."

She could not answer, and not another word was spoken until Ormsted appeared, his pockets stuffed out with fruit, and the lower half of his face obscured by a great yellow disk.

"My pear is ripe," quoth he. When he saw the national badge he took in the significance of its position at once.

"Oh, Jemima!" (his favorite saint) "he's been and gone and done it!" And, giving his pear a toss over the fence, he jumped about three feet into the air, and swooped down on Oglethorpe.

"Now let me congratulate you, my dear son. "I draw my sword against her."

There followed a vigorous hand-shaking.

"You and Gus have had the best fellow in the world, and now you're perfect," declared Ormsted.

"Good Grand Panjandrum!" Oglethorpe, the little round button at top," suggested his friend.

Ormsted made such an uproar that his mother came out of the drawing-room, where she was matching the milk-pans, and the senior laid down his pipe and came and stood in the doorway.

Kate told them all, and then didn't chase when we drew lots. Now, Thorpe, we shall be the double O's no more!"

In the confusion of good-bys Oglethorpe, as he held Agnes's hand, asked,

"May I come and see you in town?"

"If you please."

"Good-by, then, till October."

"Good-by."

Ormsted came with his friend the first night they heard of Agnes's return. He brought him in the uniform of a private, and looking at it during the whole of their call. "Begging your pardon, Miss Agnes, he is as well fitted to hold a commission as Bouverie, or any captain in Lancy's horse."

"Wouldn't you go yourself as a private?" asked Agnes.

"Of course I would; but I'm not worth as much as he. All he had to do was let people know he was going to fight, and honors would have been thrust on him."

Oglethorpe laughed.

"I hope to be promoted from the ranks," said he. As they left the young lady's presence a side-door opened, and Mrs. Crass, with a distant bow to Ormsted, beckoned to Oglethorpe.

"Wait a minute," said he to his companion, and joined her. She closed the door. "You have not succeeded, I suppose," her unexpressive face a mark, made in that half-contemptuous tone in which Mrs. Crass always spoke of the deeds of her fellow-mortals.

"Did you suppose I would?"

"I did. I'm glad you've got sense. If Bouverie had not appeared so suddenly, I might have done something."

"Mrs. Crass, your niece will break no promise for me. I showed her your letter, and she forgave me for speaking. Good-evening." And he bowed himself out.

"Where has Bouverie been all this while?" he asked of Ormsted on their homeward walk. "Has he, too, just waked up?"

"They say he's been in a fume ever since he heard of Bull Run. He's one of your tearing Abolitionists. Wants to have the whole shoved South Carolina into the sea. He was making Roman sussers when the news reached him. He might do to settle his affairs, I believe, to sell his pictures, to get money to come, and made tracks for America. Now he's in a devil of a stew, Thorpe. I feel inclined to put a little ambition into you with my fists."

Oglethorpe went again his regiment was in daily expectation of marching-orders. Agnes was sitting at her embroidery. As the servant announced him she rose, and the bright work in her lap tumbling on the floor. The gentleman in the arm-chair picked them up, and Agnes introduced Miss Bouverie.

"One of our captains," said Oglethorpe, as the soldiers shook hands.

"Ah, you are in the —st," and he sank again into the purple depths of the arm-chair. He was a slight man, with a great head of flaxen tresses and whisker; light but vivid eyes, a scornful turn to his lip; but altogether a face not displeasing. He plays well with the browns and scarlets he held, listening as Agnes talked.

"I think I have heard our Colonel speak of you, Mr. Oglethorpe," he interposed. "Are you not a Southerner?"

"Georgian born. Colonel —— and I were schoolmates."

"He was always at the foot of his class, they say. We are well shuffled now, and the most unlooked-for card turns up a trump. How is it you are unconscionized?"

"I know nothing of war."

"Pshaw! Go into camp and study Hardee. The Colonel spoke of your uncommon talent for modesty. Bad trait that, Agnie," rising; "I shall not come to dinner. It takes your set too long to get through the courses. I'll see you to-morrow."

Agnes nodded as she pulled a thread through the eye of her needle; and with a careless oddio he flung himself out. That very morrow their orders came. Oglethorpe elbowing his way through the crowd about Bouverie, who stopped.

"Will you do me a great favor?"

"Willingly, if I can."

"I have a packet for Miss Sebastian. I have just left her, and forgot it. You see how it is. I haven't the courage to go through another parting. Will you take it to her?"

The question he had been weighing was now decided. He took the envelope, and in the confusion more Oglethorpe stood in Agnes's presence. He thought her ruder than usual. She was standing near the window, listening to the regimental bustle, and turned toward him with eyes in which there were no tears, but the fire of excitement.

"You too?" said she.

He laid Bouverie's charge on the table with the necessary words.

"I should have come if he had not sent me. Won't you give me something of yours to carry away with me?"

A little prayer-book, bearing on its red cover her monogram in white and gold, lay on the table. She held it toward him. As he put it into the inner pocket of his coat he turned to her view a strip of Union ribbon she remembered. Neither looked at the other. He held her hand a moment, dropped it, and silently went out.

If there would only be a battle, at least a forward movement, something to break the horrible monotony of camp life! The still service of this campaign so preyed on the fortitude of which Oglethorpe had believed himself possessed, that he welcomed his call to duty almost a heart-sickness. It had been a long dark day, and about four o'clock began to snow. A great sudden storm it was. The crystals powdered his hair, and lay in silvery folds on his over-coat, as he slowly paced up and down. Very lonely and soldier thought it in the first half hour, when the flakes lighted tender as rose-petals. But the fairness gained a gloom. An appalling stillness fell on the forest. Then the night grew too cold to know the wistful rose, and assailing the whiteness on the boughs blew it off with giant breath in stinging remembrance. Oglethorpe, sub-Reuben, shivered. He felt the intensity of the bitter change to the very marrow of his bones. His strength seemed slowly to drain away. He walked on, treading for himself a path beneath the pine-trees, whose shadow lay distinct on the now smooth snow. He stopped, and leaning on his musket, looked up at the sky. The very air seemed full of icy glittering particles. Strange, sweet thoughts came into his mind. He seemed to see the Ormsted orchard, where he had seen the sheep cropping the short grass. He thought of the great pine mimes of Georgia, that used to be crowded into the marble vases in the wide halls of his home. How long it was since he had been one! Then he could think of nothing but pain, leaning against a stout young pine and clasping his musket. He believed he knew what he was going to him, but there was nothing to be done, and he was soon too deliciously weary to care much for pain. Presently a little book, he tried to think of a prayer, but his mind wandered.

"I believe in God the Father Almighty, and in Jesus Christ.... suffered under Pontius Pilate; was crucified, dead and buried—" An angel may have said Amen.

There was the whiteness in the east foretelling sunrise when the relief came up. Two horsemen rode through the lines. Bouverie and Captain Bouverie.

"Halloa," said the guard, as his challenge rang unanswered, "here's the picket asleep."

"Give him a rap with the gun," suggested Bouverie.

The man stopped. "He is frozen, Sir," in a great-fallen tone. They turned him over. The first light that the sun sent was red and white. It seemed a thing of stone. Capt. Bouverie shivered.

"Take hold," said he. "Lay him on my horse. Ride on, Gus, and tell the men." And he laid his burden toward camp.

Many months after this Captain Bouverie was sitting by Agnes Sebastian. He had been giving her the details of Oglethorpe's unnoted doom, and summed it up with "Picket frozen." She had not cried as he feared she would, but had been charmingly quiet, her head on her hand.

"You are not angry that I told you. I couldn't leave him for any body to knock about, so I buried him myself. I sent his things to Ormsted, and little—by your leave?—I was in his pocket when we found him."

He laid the prayer-book on her knees. She took it up mechanically and tumbled over the leaves, but was speechless. Captain Bouverie waited.

"Agnes," he said at length, "I can not leave you without a word or two on my own behalf. This is not the time to speak; but—I am selfish. God knows how much I love you, and perhaps a long separation has gone against me. I can not blame you, even had I the wish. There is not a man living I would give you to but I. Tell me you love me."

"Oh, Augustus," she answered, "that was said long ago."

"Have I outlived it? You believe me to be your warmest, tenderest friend?"

"Oh yes."

"And you will marry me, Agnes?"

She hesitated only a second, then gave him her hand.

And Captain Bouverie was satisfied.

"KING COTTON" CAPTURED.

THE quiet little town of BRASHEAR, on Berwick's BAY—or "Brasher City," as it has been christened by courtesy—which we illustrate on page 380, has suddenly become the scene of vast commercial doings. It was people very much astaken the fall scope of Major-General Banks's recent brilliant operations in the Attakapas region of Western Louisiana who look upon them merely as among the most successful military events of the war. It is in their material results that they are about to gratify the country and startle the world.

General Banks, aided by the gallant Farragut, has not only disorganized and put to flight the whole rebel army west of the Mississippi River, from New Orleans to Alexandria, on Red River, but opened up untold mines of wealth to the treasury of the United States. Almost hourly vessels are to be seen coming down the bay freighted with mountain loads of the precious materials of the regions just regained by our arms—cotton, hogsheads of sugar, and countless herds of mules and cattle.

The treasures already exchanged upon the landing of Brashear City up to this date (June 11) would amount to many hundred thousands of dollars; while this is but an installment of what remains behind, and which can only be counted by millions of dollars.

One significant fact has also been laid bare to the outer world by the prising process of our bayonets; and that is, that the planters in the newly-captured regions had not the amount of "patriotism" which the rebel leaders either supposed or pretended they had—and which too many people in the North and abroad believe—and did not quite see the necessity of consigning to flames all the wealth they possessed in the world, merely for the sake of proving their devotion to the cause of Jeff Davis & Co.

Wherever armies have penetrated they have found cotton and sugar carefully concealed in all sorts of remote corners; and as they seize these costly products, they make a receipt in the owners, upon a fair valuation, in case they should hereafter be able to prove themselves of loyal antecedents, in the empty-handed long-eared days of the war.

If any thing more were wanted to utterly overthrow the vain hopes of the Confederate credit, and to prove to the gulled people of Europe that they have been making a bad bargain with traitors in this country, it will be found in Uncle Sam's so unceremoniously holding the very materials upon which the lenders have been staking their money. What Confederate credit will remain after this new and irreparable inroad upon it may be gleaned from the fact that our soldiers, in parley with rebel pickets, could at any time have the full value of Confederate trash for one dollar of Uncle Sam's good, honest greenbacks!

SINKING TORPEDOES AT CHARLESTON.

WE are indebted to the artist correspondent of a London illustrated paper for the picture on page 380, representing THE SINKING OF TORPEDOES BY CONFEDERATES IN THE HARBOR OF CHARLESTON. It seems that before the recent attack by Admiral Du Pont the rebel General Ripley spent several nights in filling the channels of the bay of harbor with all manner of torpedoes and infernal machines, and on one of his expeditions the sympathizing Englishman was allowed to accompany him. Hence the picture.

UNION PRISONERS AT THE SOUTH.

We publish on page 373 an illustration of a group of captives lately released and conveyed through a rebel town. The mingled curiosity and hatred with which they are regarded by some of the spectators, and the kindly sympathy and sympathy shown them by others, especially the negroes, are well portrayed in the picture. We append here, not as much by explanation of the picture as for the general interest felt in the subject, a few extracts from the diary of Mr. COLLINS, a World correspondent, who was taken at Vicksburg and released from Richmond. After leaving Jackson, he says:

"We here made the acquaintance of some of the rebel ineligibles, and we traveled with about ninety others, officers, privates, and the indefinite unknown who are or gentlemen have, we hear, been offered, but not in our case, the privilege of exchange if we renounced our flag; those who had knowledge of our story or our relation to it. Some few renounced their oath of allegiance to the ultimate success of the North.

"As we approached Mobile Bird's Landing and Demopolis on the Tombigbee, the people began to be at once more insolent and threatening. Here was the greatest body of great-heart disinfluent freed and bread indiscriminately among us—meat and their rebel scorn.

"On reaching Atlanta, however, all this was changed. The officers and men of Streight and the Indianola had been fed and well treated by the people, and the kind attention place into messes. The individuality of our party of four was merged into No. 4, and we fared well all the purposes of ration, discipline, or duty, we being only No. 4. Each one cooked and prepared his food, which, in our case, was a veritable "mess" in a "mess." We can not but admire the ingenuity of these rebel cooks and provision in an indignity. Such a thing may do well enough for an army in a well-appointed country, or even in the tented field, but which such implements as are afforded at the Libby it is an outright torture. We had no beds—this Australia was one we were feared to by camp life; but little bedding. We had to clean our own rooms and vessels, and were not permitted so much as to stick a knife into the window on penalty of being fired.

The ration is large enough, larger than we could eat, but to the Confederate of that region it is. He can not but think it a punishment that persons are obliged to cook their own rations, implements their own food. Imagine a soldier of Lee's army cooking his beans in the dainty staff-officer detailed to clean pots and kettles, or the delicate 37-thou correspondent, brown in hand, set to scrubbing floors!

CHAPTER XII.

AMONG the curiosities of human reasoning is this: one forms a judgment on certain statements; they turn out incorrect, yet the judgment stands.

This occurs oftenest, when, to divine what any knows, we will do a one whom we know beforboldly by his character, his habits, or his interest: for these are great forces, toward which men gravitate through various and even contrary circumstances.

Now women, sitting at home out of actuality way, are sometimes forced, as well as naturally inclined, to rely on their insight into character; and, by the book, often pass through false or discolored data to a sound conclusion.

Thus it was Mrs. Dodd applied her native sagacity to Clive: by Richard Hardie and Julia for his son's wife, and how to make him withdraw that dissent: and the fair diviner was much mistaken in detail, but right in the conclusion; for Richard Hardie was at that moment the unlikeliest man in Barkington to decline Julia Dodd—with hard cash in five figures —for his daughter-in-law.

I am now about to make a revelation to the reader, that will incidentally lead him to Mrs. Dodd's conclusion, but by a different path.

The outline she gave her daughter and my reader of Richard Hardie's cold and prudent youth was substantially correct; but something had occurred since, unknown to me, and unknown to all Barkington. The centuries had blown a respectable bubble. About two hundred and fifty years ago, a private genius, well known as the inventor of the lathe, laid the first wooden tramroad, to enable a horse to draw forty-two cwt. of coals commodiously. The coal owners soon used it largely. In 1738, iron rails were invented to lay this road upon, stronger than metal, kept them down, and the wooden ones in vogue, for some thirty years. Then iron prevailed.

Meantime, a much greater invention had been creeping on to join the metal way: I mean the locomotive power of steam; whose history we needed here. Enough that in 1804 took place as promising a wedding as civilization ever saw: for then an iron tram, built by Trevethick, a great genius fettered for want of pluck, drew carriages, laden with ten tons of iron, from Penydarran to a Welsh railway. Then stout Stephenson came on the scene, and insisted on benefiting mankind in spite of themselves, and of shallow legislators, à priori reasoners, and a heavy Review, whose political motto was "Stemus super antiquas vias:" which the may be rendered, "Better stand still on turnpikes than move on rails."

His torments and triumph are history.

Two of his opponents seem neat: 1. To Lord Noodle, or Lord Doodle, who was it? objecting haughtily, "and suppose a cow should get in the way?" Stephenson, Sir? Why, then it would be bad—for the cow."

The objector found he had underrated the obstructive power of his honored parent.

2. To the à priori reasoners, who sat in their studies and demonstrated with complete mastery that uncogged wheels would revolve on a smooth rail, but leave the carriage in statu quo, he replied by putting an engine with Trevethick's wonderful nose aid, hooking on eight carriages, and setting off up an incline. "A Solitur ambulando," quoth Stephenson the unlearned to Messrs. A. Priori.

Next a word about the Stockton and Darlington rail. Next the Liverpool and Manchester line was projected. Oh then what bitter opposition to the national benefactors, and the good of man.

Awake from the trash recries of dead Cant!

"The revolving wheels might move the engine on a rail; but what would that avail if they could not move the train in the closet, and on a mathematical paper. Railways would be but canals, bad for morals, bad for highwaymen, bad for road-side inns. The smoke would kill the cattle bridges ('Aha! thou has touched us nearly,' said the country gentlemen), the travelers would go slowly to their destination, and lose with to destruction."

And the Heavy Review, whose motto was "Stemus super turnpikes," offered "to the old Father Thames against the Wcolwich railway for ayr sum."

But the Great Black Will, who dreed the next heaviest ephemeral in the island, told a school-boy, who now writes these pages, "there's nothing can ever be safe at twenty miles an hour, without 'tis a bird in the air!" and confirmed it with an oath. Briefly, buzz! buzz! buzz!

Gray was crushed, Trevethick driven out of the country, stout Stevvie thwarted, badgered, taunted, and even insulted, and bespattered with dirt, I might say with dung; since his opponents discharged their own brains at him by speech and writing. At last, when after the manner of men they had manured their benefactor well, they consented to reap him. Railways prevailed, and increased, till to and behold a prime minister with a spade delving one in the valley of the Trent. The tide turned; great working railways from city to city became an approved investment of genuine capital; notwithstanding the frightful frauds and extortion to which the projectors were exposed in a parliament, which, under a new temptation, showed itself as corrupt and greedy as any nation or age can parallel.

When this sober state of things had endured some time, there came a year that money was loose, and a speculative fever due in the whirlidig of time. Then railways boomed.

New ones were advertised, fifty a month, and sprung to a premium. High and low scrambled for the shares, even when the projected line was to run from the town of Nought to the village of Nothing strong ground, and grooved, and sickered by turns, beneath that steady modulator exterior. And so for months and months he secretly battled with industrious resolution: a theatened in the distance, sometimes at hand, but never caught him unawares: he provided for each coming danger, he encountered each immediate attack.

But not unscathed in morals. Just as matters looked brightest, a concentration of liabilities he could not meet without emptying his tills, and so incurring the most frightful danger of all. He had provided for its coming, but a decline, greater than he had reckoned on, in the value of his good securities, made that provision inadequate. Then it was he committed a faux pas. He was one of his own children's trustees, and the other two signed after him like mutton. He said to himself: "My honor is my children's; my position is worth thousands to them. I have sacrificed a fortune to preserve it: it would be madness to reveal now."

He borrowed three thousand pounds of the trust money, and, soon after, two thousand more: it kept him above water; but the peril, and the escape on each terms, left him gasping inwardly.

At last, when even his granite nature was almost worn away with care, anxiety, and struggling all alone without a word of comfort—for the price of one grain of sympathy would have been "Devon"—he was gratified of his own burden, and breathed again.

One day he said, quietly: "that must be regulated." He added, graciously, as if conferring a great favor, "I'll look into the books myself, Skinner."

He did more; he sat up all night over the books; and then he knew all within him. Bankruptcy seemed coming toward him, slow perhaps, but sure. And meantime to live with the world hanging over his head!

Soon matters approached a crisis; several large drafts were drawn, which would have exhausted the whole of the yearly rents of a wealthy nobleman had for some days past been flowing in.

This nobleman had gone to explore Syria and Assyria. He was a great traveler, who contrived to leave his money at home, but could never been able to spend a quarter of it abroad, for want of enemies and masters—better known to the friends and foes of his bank. Sir Hugh Dale was safe for some months, unless there should be an extraordinary run on him, and that was not likely then. The panic had subsided, and, nota bene, his credit had never stood higher.

The reason was, he had been double-faced: had always patronized Railways: and his wise words were public, whereas his fatal acts had been done in the dark.

And now came a change, a bitter revulsion, over this tossed mind; hope and patience failed at last, and left behind only a thing of habit and traditions, rather than of the soul, wore out; nay, more, this man who had sacrificed so nobly to conscientious duty, filled with hate of his idol and contempt of himself. "Idiot!" said he, "to throw away a fortune fighting for honor with a greater fortune at his feet which has ruined me—instead of breaking like a man, with a golden name, and starting fair again, as sensible traders do."

No honest man in the country that year resented of his own honesty as Richard Hardie loathed his virtue. And he did not confine his penitence to sentiment; he began to spend his days at the bank poring over the books, and to lay out his arithmetical genius in a subtle process, that should enable him by degrees to withdraw a few thousands from human eyes for his future use, despite the feeble safeguards of the existing law. But, as he proceeded in this trade, like thousands before him, was fabricating and maturing a false balance-sheet.

One man in the town plays many animals. Hardie, at this period, turned mole. He burrowed darkling into as alienum. There is often one of these sable workers in a Bank; it is a section of human zoology the journals have lately enlarged on, and drawn the painstaking creature forth from his mining away to brief opulence; and briefer penal servitude than one could wish. But the very reader having read these really able sketches of my contemporaries; and spare him minute details, that possess scarcely a new feature, except one: in that Bank was not only a mole, but a mole-catcher: and, contrary to custom, the mole was the master, the mole-catcher the servant. The latter had no hostile views; far from it: he was rather attached to his master: but his attention was roused by the youngest clerk, a boy of sixteen, being so often sent for into the Bank parlor, to jump into the books and arithmetical gyves without its process. Attention soon became suspicion; and suspicion found many little things to feed on, till it grew to certainty. But the outer world was none the wiser: the mole-catcher was no chatter-box; he was a solitary man: no wife nor mistress about him; and he revered the mole, and liked him better than any thing in the world—except money.

Thus the great Banker stood, a colossus of wealth and stability to the eye, though ready to crumble at a touch; and indeed self-doomed; for bankruptcy was now his game.

This was a miserable man; far more miserable than his son was when he was hugging a bankruptcy. But his face was furrowed and his hair thinned by secret struggle: and of all the things that gnawed him, that, like the fox, burrowed his bosom nobe, none was more bitter than to have borrowed five thousand pounds of his children, and sunk it.

His wife's father, a keen man of business, who saw more than little affection on his side, had settled his daughter's money on her for life, and, in case of her death, on the children when coming of age. The marriage of Alfred or Jane would be sure to expose him; settlements would be proposed; lawyers engaged to peer into the trust, etc. No; they must remain single for the present, or else marry wealth.

So, when Julia manifested such an attachment to a young lady living in a suburban villa, it was a terrible blow, though he took it with outward calm, as usual. But he lavished a morning about beauty, virtue, and breeding, Alfred had told him had cash in five figures could be settled by the time the family on the young couple, he would have welcomed the wedding with great external indifference, but a secret gush of joy; for then he could throw himself on Alfred's generosity, and be released from that one remaining debt: it was always about to go on drawing the interest of the remainder.

Thus, in reality, all the interests, with which this story chiefly converged in one point, the fourteen thousand pounds. Richard Hardie's opposition was a mere misunderstanding; and, if he had been told of the Cash, and to what purpose Mrs. Dodd destined It, and then put on board the Agra in the Straits of Gaspar, he would have cheerfully taken off his coat, and helped defend the bearer of It against all assailants as stoutly, and, in outward appearance, imperturbably, as he had fought that other letter battle at home. For there was something heroic in this strong man. though his rectitude depended on circumstances.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE way the pirate dropped the mask, showed his face, and his mode in which to chase, was terrible: so dilates and bounds the sudden tiger in his unwary prey. There were stout hearts among the officers of the peaceful ship; but danger in a new form shakes the brave; and this was their first pirate: their ship had been out in ejaculations not loud but deep. "Hush!" said Dodd, doggedly: "the lady!"

Mrs. Beresford had just come on deck to enjoy the balmy morning.

"Sharpe," said Dodd, in a tone that conveyed a new sensation to the new comer, "set the royals, and flying jib—Port!"

"Port it is," cried the man at the helm.

"Steer due South!" And, with these words in his mouth, Dodd dived to the gun deck.

By this time Mrs. Beresford had recovered the first shock; and the order to crowd sail on the ship galled his pride and his manhood; he muttered, indignantly, "Is the ship mine or his?" This eased his mind, and he obeyed orders briskly as ever. While he and his hands were setting every rag that could carry a rag, the other officers, having unluckily no orders to execute, stood gloomy and helpless, with their eyes glued, by a sort of sombre fascination, on that coming fate: and they literally jumped and started when Mrs. Beresford, who had observed by the lovely day, broke in on their nerves with her light treble.

"Why, it's worst morning, gentlemen. After all a voyage is a delightful thing: oh, what a splendid sea! and the very breeze is warm. Why, you look as if a little ship sailing along here, Freddy, Freddy darling, leave off beating the sailors' legs, and come here and see this pretty sight. What, Freddy, why it is so fat. Ah! ah! what is that dreadful noise?"

For her boy had uttered talk, that grated on those anxious souls like the mockery of some infantine fiend, was cut short by pondrous blows and tremendous exertion. The ship was the captain staving in water-casks: the water poured out at the scuppers.

"Mamma, what be guns," said a middy, off his guard.

Harold Kenealy pricked up his ears, drew his cigar from his mouth, and smelt powder. "What, for action?" said he, briskly. "Where's the enemy?"

Fullalove made him a signal and they went below.

Mrs. Beresford had not heard, or not appreciated the remark: she prattled on till she made the mates and midshipmen shudder.

Meantime, the operation, and the strange incongruity between the senses and the mind in these poor fellows' [illegible] and ripped up the beauty beneath a purple heaven shone, sparkled, and laughed, a blue sea, in whose waves the tropical sun seemed to have shed a thousand flame bores on them with a crew of human tigers; and a lady babble babble babble babble babble babble babbled in their quivering ears.

But now the captain came bustling on deck, eyed the fullest pirate sails, saw them drawing well, appointed four midshipmen a staff to con-very his orders; gave Bayliss charge of the carronades, Grey of the cutlasses, and directed Mr. Tickell to break the bad news gently to Mrs. Beresford, and to take her below to the orlop deck; ordered the purser to serve out beef, biscuit, and grog to all hands, saying, "Men can't work on an empty stomach: and fighting is hard work;" then beckoned the officers to come round him. "Gentlemen," said he, confidentially, "it's crowding sail on this ship I look to more of escaping that follow on this tack, but I was, and am, most anxious to gain the open sea where I can muster my yards and run for it, if I see a chance. At present I shall carry on till he comes up within range: and then, to keep the Company's servants from being shot to rags, I shall shorten sail; and to save ship and cargo and all our lives, I shall fight with a patch of her sworn. Better be killed in hot blood than walk the plank in cold."

The officers cheered faintly; the captain's dogged resolution stirred up theirs.

The pirate had gained another quarter of a mile and more. The ship's crew were hard at their beef and grog, and agreed among themselves it was a comfortable ship; they guessed what was coming, and woe to the ship in that hour if the captain had not won their regard. Strange to say, there were two gentlemen in the Agra to whom the pirate's approach was not altogether unwelcome. Colonel Kenealy and Mr. Fullalove were rival sportsmen; and rival theorists. Kenealy stood out for a smooth bore, and a four-ounce ball: Fullalove for a rifle of his own construction. Many a doughty argument they had, and many a bragging match; neither could convince the other. At last Fullalove hinted that by going ashore at the Cape, and getting each behind a tree at one hundred yards, and popping at one another, one or other would be convinced.

"Well, but," said Kenealy, "if he is dead, he will be no wiser; besides to a fellow like me, who has had the luxury of popping at his enemies, spared for a friend is poor sport, you know."

"That is true," said the other, regretfully. "But I reckon we shall never settle it by argument."

Theorists are amazing creatures: and it was plain, by the alacrity with which these good creatures laid hold of the rival instruments, that to them the pirate came not so much as a pirate as a solution. Indeed, Kenealy, in the act of charging his piece, was heard to mutter, "Now, this is lucky." However, these theorists were no sooner loaded than something occurred to make them more serious. They were sent for in haste to Dodd's cabin; they found him giving Sharpe a new order.

"Shorten sail to the tauntsles and jib, get the colors ready on the halliards, and then send the men aft."

Sharpe ran out full of zeal, and trumpeted over Ramsgate, who was stooping emphatically near the keyhole. Dodd hastily bolted the cabin door, and looked with trembling lip and piteous earnestness at Kenealy's fowling-piece and Fullalove's. They were mute with surprise at a gaze so eloquent yet mysterious.

He manned himself, and opened his mind to them with deep emotion, yet not without a certain simple dignity.

"Colonel," said he, "you are an old friend; you, Sir, are a new one; but I esteem you highly, and was a proud young gentleman of you about, you calling all men brothers, and making that poor negro love you, instead of fear you, that should never have been a great trade. My dear friends, I have been unlucky enough to bring my children's fortune on board this ship: here it is, upon my shirt. Fourteen thousand pounds! This weighs me down. Oh, if they should lose it after all! Do pray give me a hand across, and pledge your honors words to take it home safe to my wife at Backington, if you, or either of you, should see this bright sun set to-day, and I should not."

"Why Dodd, old fellow," said Kenealy, cheerfully, "that is the way to go down, not to fight."

"Colonel," replied Dodd, "to save this ship and cargo, I must be wherever the bullets are; and I will, too."

Fullalove more sagacious than the worthy colonel, said earnestly: "Captain Dodd, may I never see Bishop again, and never see Hiram on at the end of my time, if I fail you! There's my hand."

"And mine," said Kenealy, warmly.

They all three joined hands, and Dodd seemed to cling to them.

"God bless you both! God bless you! Oh, what a weight your true hands have pulled off my heart. Good-by for a few minutes. The time is short. I'll just offer a prayer to the Almighty Watcher, and then I'll come up and say a word to the men, and fight the ship according to my lights."

Sail was no sooner shortened, and the crew ranged, than the captain came briskly on deck, saluted, jumped on a carronade, and stood erect. He was not the man to show the crew his foreboding.

"Ship!" "Silence fore and aft."

"My men, the schooner coming up on our weather quarter is a Portuguese pirate. By her character is known; he scuttles all the ships he boards, dishonors the women, and murders the crew. We cracked on to get out of the narrows, and now we have shortened sail to fight this blackguard, and teach him to molest a British ship. I promise, in the Company's name, twenty pounds prize-money to every man before the mast if we beat him off or outmaneuvre him; thirty if we sink him; and forty if we tow him astern into a friendly port. Eight guns are clear below, three on the weather deck, five on the lee; for, if he knows his business, he will come up on the lee quarter; if he doesn't, that is no fault of yours or mine. The muskets are all loaded, the cutlasses ground like razors—"

"Hurrah!"

"We have got women to defend—"

"Hurrah!"

"A good ship under our feet, the God of justice overhead, British hearts in our bosoms, and British colors flying—are we'en up! or are our heads?"

"Hurrah!" (The ship's colors flew up to the fore, and the Union Jack to the mizen peak.)

"Now, lads, I mean to fight this ship while a plank of her (stamping on the deck) swims beneath my foot, and—WHAT DO YOU SAY?"

The reply was a fierce shout from a hundred throats, so loud, so deep, so full of volume, it made the ship vibrate, and rang in the escaping air long after it could not rival, battling, he saw mischief in those shortened sails, and that when fired chains shot a her masts, as ordered, and began to play the mischief with her shrouds and rigging. Meantime Fullalove and Kenealy, aided by Ramsgate, who loaded, were busily butchering the pirate crew two a minute, and popped to settle the question they were fighting for; meanwhile the Agra but unluckily replied fired once without killing; so "there was nothing proven."

The pirate, bold as he was, got sick of fair fighting first; he hoisted his mainsail and drew rapidly ahead, with a slight heeling to starboard, and commanded a tremendous and stove in the ship's quarter-boat, by way of a parting present.

The men hurled a contemptuous cheer after him; they thought they had beaten him off. Dodd did not think so. He was but relieving a little way to make a more deadly attack than ever: he would soon wear, and cross the Agra's defenceless bow, rake her fore and aft, and by sol-shot distance; or grapple and board the enfeebled ship two hundred strong.

Dodd flew to the helm, and with his own hands put it hard a-weather, to give the deck guns one more chance, if sinking or disabling the Portuguese the Destroyer. As the ship obeyed, and a deck gun bellowed below him, he saw a vessel running out from Penang Island, and coming swiftly up on his lee quarter.

It was a schooner. Was she coming to his aid? Horror! A black flag floated from her foremast head.

While Dodd's eyes were staring almost out of his head at the dreadful sight, a hope, blank, yet again; and just then a pale face came close to Dodd's, and solemn voice whispered in his ear, "Is assassins?" it said. It was the first mate.

Dodd seized his hand convulsively, and pointed to the pirate's mainsail, and then to them: and said, with the calm of a brave man's despair, "Cutlasses! and die hard!"

At that moment the pirate gunner fired his last gun. It sent a chain-shot on board the retiring pirate, took off a Portuguese head and arm in the act of firing, flew so far to windward, and cut the schooner's foremast so nearly through that it trembled and nodded, and presently fell overboard with a crack, and came down like a broken tree, with the yard and sail; the latter overboard like a deck and burying itself black flag and all in the sea; and there, in one moment, lay the Destroyer buffeting and wriggling—like a wounded fish, the water with his long wing broken—an utter cripple.

The victorious crew raised a stunning cheer.

"Silence!" roared Dodd, with his trumpet. "All hands make sail!"

He set his courses, bent a new jib, and stood east to windward on the port tack, with as much a good offing, and then put his ship dead before the wind, which was now playing in a stiff breeze. In doing this he crossed the crippled pirate's stern, within eighty yards; and sore was the temptation to the gunners at his mizzenmast being short, and his danger being imminent from the other pirate, he had the self-command to resist the provocation. The pirates, in the meantime, in great confusion, and expecting a broadside, trained a gun dead aft.

Dodd saw it, hailed the mizen top: "Can you two hinder them from firing that gun?"

"I rather think we can," said Fullalove, "eh, colonel? I reckon we can do long rifle.

The ship's bows no sooner crossed the schooner's stern than the gun was fired with a shriek. Pop went the colonel's ready carbine, and the Malay fell over dead, and the linstock flew out of his hand. The Portuguese, with a movement of rage, snatched it up, and darted to the gun: the Yankee rifle cracked, but a moment too late. Bang! went the pirate's gun, and crashed into the Agra's side, and passed nearly through her.

"I missed him! Ye missed him!" cried the rival theorist, joyfully. He was mistaken: the smoke cleared away, and the Portuguese was leaning wounded against the mainmast with a Yankee bullet in his shoulder, and his crew upon the poop deck cheered stoutly and vengeance. They jumped, and raged, and brandished their knives, and made horrid gesticulations of revenge; and the white eyeballs of the Malays and Papuans glittered fiendishly; and the wounded captain raised his left arm and had a signal knife ready in his consort, and she bore up in chase, and jamming her fore tauns sail as a board, lay for nearer the stern of the Agra could, and sent three feet to her two besides. On this superiority being made clear, the situation of the Merchant vessel, though not so utterly desperate as before Monk fired his lucky shot, became pitiable enough. If she ran before the wind, the fresh pirate would cut her off; if she lay to windward, she might postpone the inevitable and fatal collision with a foe as strong as that she had only escaped by a rare piece of luck; but this would give the crippled pirate time to refit and unite to destroy her, and to make the falling ammunition, and the thinned crew!

Dodd cast his eyes all round the horizon for help.

The sea was blank.

The bright sun was hidden now; drops of rain fell, and the wind was beginning to sing; and the sea to rise a little.

"Gentlemen," he said he, "let us kneel down and pray for wisdom, in this sore strait."

He and his officers kneeled on the quarter-deck. When they rose, Dodd stood rapt about a minute; his great thoughtful eye saw no more the enemy, the sea, nor any thing external; it was turned inward. His officers looked at him in silence.

"Sharpe," said he, at last, "there must be a way out of them with such a breeze as this is now; if we could but see it."

"Ay, Ay, Sir," said Sharpe.

Dodd mused again.

"About ship!" said he, softly, like an afterthought.

"Ay, ay, Sir."

"Steer due north!" said he, still like one whose mind was elsewhere.

While the ship was coming about, he gave minute orders to the mates and the gunner, to insure co-operation in the first part of a delicate and dangerous manœuvre he had resolved to try.

The wind was N.W.: it was standing north: one pirate lay on his lee beam stopping back between wind and water, and backing the deck clear of his broken masts and yards. The other fresh, and thirsting for the easy prey, came up from the S.E., to weather on him and hang on his quarter, pirate fashion.

When they were distant about a cable's length, the fresh pirate, to meet the new disposition of tactics, changed his own, put his helm up a little, and gave the ship a broadside, well aimed but not destructive, as the guns being loaded with ball.

Dodd, instead of replying, as was expected, took advantage of the smoke and put his ship before the wind. By this unexpected stroke the vessels engaged ran swiftly at right angles toward one end of the ocean: and the pirate menaced with two serious perils; a collision, which might send him to the bottom of the sea in a minute, and a broadside delivered at pistol-shot distance, and with no possibility of his making a return. He must either put his helm up or down. He chose the bolder course, put his helm hard a lee, and stood ready to give broadside for broadside. But ere he could bring his lee guns to bear, he must offer his bow for one moment to the ship's broadside: and in that moment, which would had proved fatal, Dodd and his mates raked him fore and aft at short distance with all the five guns that were clear on that side; the carronades fortunately were shot off like a carrot and the sail struggling; his foresail looked lace, lanes of dead and wounded lay still or writhed on his deck, and his lee quarter ran blood into the sea.

The ship rushed down the wind, leaving the schooner staggered and all shroud. But not for long; the pirate fired his broadside after all, at the now flying Agra, spilt one of the carronades in two, and killed a Lascar, and made a hole in the foresail; this done, he hoisted his mainsail again in a trice, sent his wounded below, flung his dead overboard, to the horror of their foes, and came after the flying ship, yawing and firing his bow chasers, like a fiend in chase. She had no shot to throw away. Not only did she take those strokes like a coward, but signs of life disappeared on her, except two men at the wheel, and the captain on the main gangway.

Dodd had ordered the men out of the rigging, armed them with cutlasses, and laid them flat on the forecastle. He also compelled Kenealy and Fullalove to come down from the barn's way, no wiser on the smooth bore question than they went up.

The pirate patient ship ran environed by her foes; one destroyer right in her course, another in her wake, fifteen miles off on her lee quarter, and pounding away at her—but no reply.

Suddenly the yells of the pirates on both sides ceased, and there was a moment of dead silence on the sea.

Yet nothing fresh had happened.

Yes, this had happened: the pirates to windward, and the pirates to leeward, of the Agra, had come near each other, and some manœuvres had found out, at one and the same moment, that the enemy's captain they had lashed, and bullied, and tortured, was a patient but tremendous man. He was not only to be shot at—their schooner he had put his ship before the wind, but also by a double, daring, master-stroke to hurt his consort by doing so at the same time. Without a foresail she could never get out of his way. Her crew had stopped the leak, and cut away and overboard the shrouded jib-boom, and were stepping a new one, when they saw the huge ship bearing down in full sail. Nothing easier than to slip out of her way could they get the foresail to draw; but the time was gained, the intention manifest, the coming destruction swift.

After that solemn silence came a storm of shouts and curses, as each consort went to work to fit the yard and raise the sail; while their fighting men seized their matchlocks and trusted the gun. They were well commanded by a heroic able villain. Astern the consort thundered; but the Agra's response was a dead silence more awful than broadsides.

For then was seen with what majesty the enduring Anglo-Saxon fights.

One of that indomitable race on the gangway, one at the foremast, two at the wheel, conned and steered the great ship on a line of hundred matchlocks and a grinning broadside, just as they would have conned and steered her into a British harbor.

"Starboard!" said Dodd, in a deep calm voice, with a motion of his hand.

"Starboard it is."

The pirate wriggled ahead a little. The man forward made a silent signal to Dodd.

"Port!" said Dodd, quietly.

"Port it is."

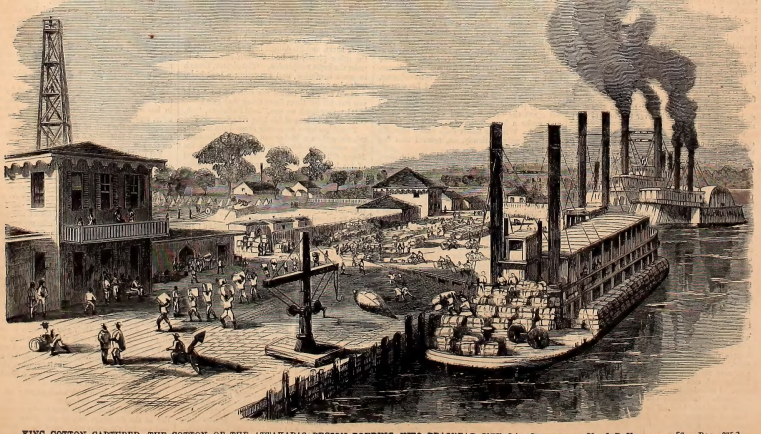
But at this critical moment the pirate astern sent a mischievous shot and knocked one of the men to atoms at the helm.

Dodd waved his hand without a word, and another man rose from the deck and took his place in silence, and laid his unshaking hand on the wheel stained with that man's warm blood whose place he took.

The high ship was now scarce sixty yards distant; she seemed to know: she reared her lofty figure-head with great awful shoots into the air.

But now the panting pirates got their new foresail hoisted with a joyful shout; it drew, the schooner gathered way, and their furious consort close on the Agra's heels just then scourged her deck with grape.

"Port!" said Dodd, calmly.



"Port it is."

The giant prow darted at the escaping pirate. That acre of coming canvas took the wind out of the swift schooner's foresail; it flapped: oh, then she was doomed! That awful moment parted the races on board her; the Papuans and Soolous, their black faces livid and blue with horror, leaped yelling into the sea, or crouched and whimpered; the yellow Malays and brown Portuguese, though blanched to one color now, turned on death like dying panthers, fired two cannon slap into the ship's bows, and snapped their muskets and matchlocks at their solitary executioner on the ship's gangway, and out flew their knives like crushed wasp's stings.

CRASH! the Tedmouth's cut-water in thick smoke beat in the schooner's broadside: down went her masts to leeward like fishing-rods whipping the water; there was a horrible shrieking yell; wild forms leaped off on the Agra and were hacked to pieces almost ere they reached the deck—a surge, a chasm in the sea, filled with an instant rush of ingulfing waves, a long, awful, grating, grinding noise, never to be forgotten in this world, all along under the ship's keel—and the fearful majestic monster passed on over the blank she had made, with a pale crew standing silent and awe-struck on her deck; a cluster of wild heads and staring eyeballs bobbing like corks in her foaming wake, sole relic of the blotted-out destroyer; and a wounded man staggering on the gangway, with hands uplifted and staring eyes.

Shot in two places, the head and the breast!

With a loud cry of pity and dismay, Sharpe, Pallalieu, Kenealy, and others rushed to catch him; but, ere they got near, the captain of the triumphant ship fell down on his hands and knees, his head sunk over the gangway, and his blood ran fast and pattered in the midst of them, on the deck he had defended so bravely.

Cure of Gravel in Two Weeks.

DR. J. BRANDRETH, Jun., Oneida Co., N. Y., Jan. 27, 1863.

Dr. S. Brandreth:

My Dear Sir: I received your letter acknowledging the receipt of one hundred Boxes for thirty days of Brandreth's Pills, which have been largely sold in this town for the last thirty years.

I have made one of the most respectable of our citizens was sorely afflicted with gravel; no less than eight medical men were called in with a view to giving relief to the severe pain, which could be relieved with water piercing cries, which were heard a block. The doctors exerted their skill in vain; as a last resort Brandreth's Pills were recommended from me. The first dose did give ease, and two boxes effected a perfect cure within two weeks. In our town, there are persons who have been cured of almost every disease by the use of them. Be sure and use my name supply are fresh Pills and new style.

Your Friend and Agent, of many years standing.

ASA FILLINGIM.

In all cases, be sure and get NEW STYLE BRANDRETH'S PILLS, and be put off with no other. You thus secure fresh Pills, and the genuine.

STRENGTH FOR THE EXHAUSTED.—Thousands die, as it were, inch by inch, of bodily weakness; for debility will kill as surely, though not so quickly, as a raging fever. It is asked how the weak shall be made strong; the debilitated healed and restored: the exhausted re-filled with vital energy? We aver that of all preventing agencies given by science to man, from the institution of the art of healing to the present hour, not one has wrought such wonders in the way of restoration as HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS. This is indeed the sublime secret of a real, lasting, strength-supporting, life-prolonging agent, the like of it is not to be found in the catalogue of medicines. Among the various articles used to arouse the dormant powers of nature, the Bitters possess the great awakener of the paralyzed physician. It not only awakens the physical power from a state of inaction and inertia, but it imparts permanent vigor to the muscular and nervous systems—circulating, by its aid, both the stronghold and the outworks of vitality. The aged, the decrepid, the nervous, the broken-down of both sexes, are recommended to try it. They will assuredly find it a present help in time of need.

CAPILLARY DISEASES.

Dr. B. C. PERRY,

The Celebrated Dermatologist,

FROM No. 29 WINTER STREET, BOSTON,

And the only man in this country who has ever made the treatment of Diseased Scalps

AND

Loss of Hair, and Blanching

a specialty, has established himself at

No. 49 Bond Street New York, where he can be consulted by all who are afflicted with any disease of the scalp, loss of hair, or premature blanching.

Dr. Perry has had a very extensive practice in this city, that having decided the greater portion of his life career nearly years—to the investigation, theoretically and practically, of his specialty, the treatment of all diseases of the Scalp, Loss of Hair, and Premature Blanching, and having practiced for the past eight years in the principal cities of New England (for the last two years in Boston) with the most flattering success, he confidently offers his services to all who are afflicted with any disease of the Scalp that indicate loss of hair or blanching; also motheatches, tetters, and other discolorations of the head and face—his success in other cities where he has practiced, as the annexed voluntary testimonials prove, certifying not only to the general efficacy of his system of treatment, but to the special curves he has effected where hitherto the best known medical skill had failed. The following list of references (Boston, Providence, Portland, and elsewhere are those of the best citizens of said places. They include all classes and professions—physicians, lawyers, merchants, mechanics, clergymen, and professors. The visitors must be aware that the satisfactory result attending the most skeptical that no man could obtain their names as unless permission to do so had been granted.

Any person wishing to consult the Doctor at his office, No. 49 Bond Street, can do so free of charge. People living at a distance, and wishing for particulars, should address Dr. B. C. PERRY (inclosing stamp), No. 49 Bond Street, New York.

BOSTON, April, 1862.

DR. B. C. PERRY.—Dear Sir: In reply to the many inquiries addressed to me in the course of years of treating Diseases of the Scalp and Loss of Hair, we present you with the written assurance of the satisfactory result attending your treatment of capillary difficulties. Acknowledging your entire confidence in our own cases, we cheerfully recommend you to the confidence of the public.

The following unsolicited Testimonial, from some of the most Prominent and oldest citizens, will speak for itself:

We, the undersigned, citizens of Providence and vicinity, certify to the efficacy of Dr. Perry's Diseases of the Hair and Scalp, as practiced by Dr. Perry upon us and in our families, and believe it to be a most gratifying results, and it affords us much pleasure to be able from personal experience to recommend it to the public. We have no hesitation in saying it is one of the most scientific and successful practitioners in his specialty in the Diseases of the Hair and Scalp.

AYER'S

Cherry Pectoral

For the Rapid Cure of

and for the relief of consumptive patients in advanced stages of the disease.

We need not speak to the public of its virtues. Throughout the length and breadth of every hamlet of the American States, its wonderful cures of pulmonary complaints have made it universally known. Say, few are the families in any civilized country on this continent without some personal experience of its efficacy, and fewer yet the communities anywhere which have not among them some living trophy of its victory over the subtle and dangerous diseases of the throat and lungs. While it is the most powerful antidote yet known to man for the formidable and dangerous diseases of the pulmonary organs, it is also the pleasantest and safest remedy that can be employed for children and young persons. Parents should have it in store against the insidious enemy that steals upon them unprepared. We have abundant grounds to believe the Cherry Pectoral counts its cures by its consumers in the thousands from whom it comes, by the year, and save your cable while they are curable, our high reputation for skill and knowledge in the incurable cases that tender the trials, cuts your life away. All know the dreadful fatality of lung disorders, and as they know, too, the relative of this remedy, we need not do more than to assure them it is still made the best it can be. We spare no cost, no care, no toil to produce it the most perfect possible, and those afflicted ones who rely on it in the last agon which our skill can furnish for their cure.

Prepared by Dr. J. C. AYER,
Practical and Analytical Chemist,
Lowell, Mass.

Just Tribute to Merit.

AT INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION, LONDON, July 11th, 1862,

Duryea's Maizena

Was the only "preparation for food from Indian Corn" that received a medal and honorable mention from the Royal Commissioners, for the benefit of all prominent manufacturers of "Corn Starch" and "Corn Flour" throughout the entire countries notwithstanding. The food and luxury of the day, without a single fault. One trial will convince the most sceptical. Makes Puddings, Cakes, Custards, Blanc Mange, &c., without lemon, spice, or eggs, and with eggs, at a cost astonishing the most economical. A slight addition to Duryea's Maizena Flour greatly improves Bread and Cake. It is also excellent for thickening sweet sauces, gravies for fish and meat, soups, &c. For Ice Cream nothing can compare with it. A little boiled in milk will produce rich Cream for coffee, chocolate, tea, &c. Put up in 1 pound packages, under the trademark "Maizena," with directions. A most delicious article of food for children and invalids of all ages. For sale by Grocers and Druggists everywhere.

HUBBARD BRO'S
IMPORTERS OF WATCHES
NEW YORK.

Have the pleasure of announcing to their numerous friends and patrons in the Army, that they are prepared to fill orders and transmit parcels by MAIL, with the utmost safety and promptitude. Watches so forwarded are registered; we take upon ourselves all risks of transportation, and guarantee a safe delivery. Just received, by European steamers, several large importations of that despairingly popular article, the

Railway Timekeepers,

WITH HEAVY STERLING SILVER CASES,

ESPECIALLY ADAPTED FOR ARMY SALES.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper of Feb. 21, 1863, says: "HUBBARD'S TIMEKEEPERS are becoming proverbial for fidelity accuracy and reliability. They are particularly valuable for officers in the army and travelers."

The Army and Navy Gazette, of Philadelphia, in its Number of May 9, reviewing this watch, says: "We are pleased to see that this importation of the Hubbard Bros. is meeting the enormous sale that such extraordinary merit can alone so justly merit. These watches are novelties produced by no other House, far exceeding other manufactures in point of accuracy and elegance. Fidelity and promptness to their patrons render the House a valuable medium for traders in the Army."

THE RAILWAY TIMEKEEPER has HEAVY SOLID STERLING SILVER cases, beautiful chased dial, handsome gold hands, with superior regulated movement, warranted to run and keep accurate time for one year in case of half dozen, $54. By mail, $1 65 additional for postage. Small retail profit will range from $50 to $60. Not sold in quantities of less than six. Also the celebrated

Magic Time Observers.

THE PERFECTION OF MECHANISM!
BEING A HUNTING OR OPEN FACE, OR LADY'S OR GENTLEMAN'S WATCH COMBINED, WITH RECENT SELF-WINDING IMPROVEMENT.

The N. Y. Illustrated News, in its issue of Jan. 10th, 1863, on the Magic Observatory says: "We have before shown a most pleasing novelty, which the Hubbard Bros., of New York, are the sole agents for, and which is the MAGIC TIME OBSERVER, and is a Hunting and Open Face Watch combined. One of the finished, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepiece ever produced, and reliable to one of the finest in and connected with its machinery, for winding the backwards, forwards, or key could be dispensed with. In cases of this watch we have examined the movement, which is a full size 16 carat one. It has the improved ruby action lever escapement, and is warranted a perfect timepiece." Prices superbly engraved, per case of half dozen, $108. Sample Watches, in neat morocco cases, for those proposing to buy at wholesale, $35. If sent by mail the postage is 26 cents.

THESE LOTS ARE REQUIRED IN ADVANCE IN ALL INSTANCES! Remittances may be made in United States money or draft payable to our order; if sent by express or mail, in a Registered Letter at our risk.

No Circulars or Agents.

American Watches
For Soldiers
AT REDUCED PRICES.

American Watches for Americans!

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately made large additions to their Watch, especially designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being refuse manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and sold here only for peddling and scrambling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of the BEST PRACTICAL MANUFACTURE, AS ACCURATE AND DURABLE THEIR ARTISTIC CONSTRUCTION WILL PERMIT, and guarantee, at nearly as low a price as is asked for the flimsy-named Ancres and Lepines of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, WM. ELLERY, Boston, Mass., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal States.

THE IRON-CLAD CINCINNATI.

On this page we publish a picture of the iron-clad gun-boat Cincinnati, as she appeared before she went into the recent fight at Vicksburg, where she was sunk. Our picture is from a photograph by Lieut. Julius H. Krohl, who writes, under date of 27th May:

"This morning the so-called iron-clad Cincinnati, Lieut. Bache commanding, went down the river to silence a battery on the top of a bluff just above Vicksburg, which could not be silenced by Sherman's artillery.

"She went gallantly into action, rounded the point, and blazed away at the rebel batteries, but the latter were not idle, and all the guns that could be brought to bear—rifled and smooth-bore—opened on her. Her filler-ropes were shot away, and she got some heavy shot into her sides. The pilot was killed at the wheel, and her commander took his place. All the men at the wheel were wounded, but Lieut. Bache escaped unharmed.

"She started up the river, as she made a great deal of water, rounded again the point of the peninsula opposite Vicksburg, and was struck by a plunging 10-inch smooth-bore or 7-inch rifled shot; she then commenced to sink, and her captain ran her inshore, where she sank to her hammock netting. The officers and crew saved nothing.

"According to the captain the Cincinnati lost about thirty men in killed and wounded, and 15 to 20 drowned.

"The Cincinnati was one of the Western river-built boats. She had 2½-inch iron plating forward, extending aft to about amidships; the after-part was entirely unprotected. The photograph I send I took yesterday before her after-part was covered with bales of hay. The Cincinnati only returned last Sunday from Cairo, where she had been repaired and had a tower for riflemen."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 20, 1863.

TO ADVERTISERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY has a circulation of OVER ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND COPIES, which are scattered over the whole country. Every number is probably read by eight or ten persons, so that advertisements in its pages reach the eye of more individuals than advertisements in any other periodical. It is essentially a home paper, and is found in every country house where intimate take an interest in the thrilling events of the day. It is not destroyed after being read, as daily papers are, but is kept, and bound in cases bought, placed in a library, and referred to from time to time. Advertisers who wish to bring their business to the notice of the public at large, and especially of the householding class, can find no medium so suitable for their purpose as Harper's Weekly.

Advertisements on the last page of Harper's Weekly are CHARGED AT THE RATE OF TWENTY CENTS PER LINE. The space allotted to advertisements is limited, and an early application is advisable to secure a place.

NEGRO TROOPS.

THE magnificent behavior of the Second Louisiana colored regiment at Port Hudson recalls the fact that it is just two years since a meeting, uttered in the columns of this journal, that if this war lasted we should arm the negroes, and use them to fight the rebels, was received with shrieks of indignation, not only in the South, but in such semi-neutral States as Maryland and Kentucky, but throughout the loyal North and even in the heart of New England. At that time the bulk of the people of the United States entertained a notion that it was unworthy of a civilized or a Christian people to use in war allies whose skin was not white. How so singular a notion could have originated, and how men should have clung to it in the face of the example of foreign nations and in view experience in the wars of 1776 and 1812, can only be explained by referring to the extraordinary manner in which for forty years slavery had been warping the heart and mind of the American people. A generation of men had grown up in awe of slavery, and in unbounded contempt of the blacks. And that generation declared that it would not have negro soldiers.

It is very cheering to believers in human progress, and to men who honestly think that the world moves, to perceive that the short period of two years has sufficed to cure an evil of so long standing, and has extended even the hunkerest Democrat of 1861 into a willingness to arm the blacks. In the abstract, of course, it is a matter of small consequence that we should at last be doing a thing in itself so obviously sensible and proper that we were clearly fools not to have done it at first. But those who remember how deep the antipathy was, even among anti-slavery men, to any thing which seemed to involve the remotest risk of negro insurrection; how even the most liberal minds among us shrank from any course of policy which seemed capable of entangling us, under any circumstances, in an admission of negro equality, will feel no common sense of joy at our emancipation from so narrow and mean a prejudice.

We have from time to time recorded the slow progress of negro enlistments, and the constant obstacles which have been encountered by the fur-seeing men who have desired to raise an army of blacks. When General Banks raised among fugitive slaves the First South Carolina black regiment at Hilton Head, the officers of his corps could not understand why he should have refused to associate with the few brave men who took command of the negroes; and Secretary Stanton—still busily summarizing over the A B C of the work—declined to pay them wages because their skins were too dark. Under the iron rule of Butler at New Orleans a black brigade was organized, and so long as that grim soldier held sway dissent at the measure was prudently silent. But when Banks succeeded in mustering the white troops who served the General that his Northern men were not yet sufficiently educated to the times to march side by side with negroes. He virtually solved the problem by sending the blacks into garrison, and keeping the whites in the field. One regiment, it seems, he marched against the enemy, and they, we may be sure, will not, after Port Hudson, be again exposed to sneers or insult. At the Southwest negro troops began to pour into our lines when Columbus fell, and the rush has never ceased. Yet, until within a few weeks, no use has been made of them. They came in droves, begging as a favor to be employed as soldiers—as any thing. But our generals, slow to learn that they were excellent fighting material, and that the lesson of the hour was to arm them, treated them as a nuisance; sometimes fed them in idleness, sometimes set them back to their masters, in a few cases used them as laborers, but never, until recently, put muskets into their hands. It was not till the month of March last, when Adjutant-General Thomas (who two years ago was no "sound"—as the phrase was—on the slavery question that he was even suspected of rebel sympathies) went West at the pressing invitation of General Blair and others, that the necessity was discerned of making soldiers of these fugitives. Since then ten full regiments of negroes have been formed, and are being drilled and equipped. It is now stated that ten more regiments will shortly be organized. Indeed there is no limit to the supply of troops which may be drawn from this source. The valley of the Mississippi and its tributaries could furnish, in the course of time, an army of 100,000 men—enough to hold the country after we have taken it.

At the North, the work of negro enlistments progresses slowly, partly in consequence of the sparse negro population, and, partly owing to obstacles created by politicians. In this State no regiment has been formed; it is said to be hard work enough to obtain the sanction of the State authorities to the formation of new white regiments. But Massachusetts has already sent off one full regiment, commanded by Colonel Shaw, and another is in process of formation. And the troops of the District of Columbia will shortly constitute a brigade, and will apply for active service.

Uneasiness is felt in some quarters lest the rebels should execute their wanton threats of hanging the officers of black regiments and selling the privates into slavery. But no apprehension need be entertained on this score. The act of the Rebel Congress on this subject is so ingeniously framed that while appearing to menace our blacks and their officers with dire penalties, it really remits the whole subject of their treatment to Jeff Davis; who, of course, will realize that indignities offered to them would at once be followed by retaliation upon rebel prisoners in our hands. The 5400 prisoners taken by General Grant at Vicksburg are a pretty fair security for our negro troops.

CARRYING THE WAR INTO THE NORTH.

THE prediction of the Richmond papers that the summer campaign would be fought on Northern soil was no idle threat. For some time past General Stuart has been massing the advance-guards of the rebel army—Hampton, and on 9th a bloody fight took place between that body and a picked detachment of the Army of the Potomac. Of the result of that encounter we know nothing as yet. But unless Stuart has been utterly overwhelmed and scattered, we may take for granted that even if our side has been successful the object of the Richmond papers has only been deferred for a time. The rebels are determined to make us feel "the horrors of war" in our own land. Their cavalry will depredate; the recent cavalry raids into Virginia and Mississippi show how much may be effected by a band of resolute men; there is every reason to expect, and no reason to doubt, that the soil of Pennsylvania and Maryland will be invaded within the month.

It may be asked, as it was asked when Lee invaded Maryland, last fall, cui bono? What can the rebels gain by invading the North? They can gain much. They can feed their army, our people feel the horrors of war, and give a practical point to the Copperhead cry for peace. They will inflict terrible suffering, vengeance and supply the citizens of Maryland and Pennsylvania with pretty substantial grounds for desiring the war to be ended. These ends, in the opinion of the Richmond press, amply justify the enterprise.

What are the prospects of success. The answer to this depends upon the Government at Washington. Because a brigade of swift cavalry was able to ride through the thinly-peopled States of Mississippi and Alabama at their rebel force, while another brigade contrived, by hard riding and dextrous management, to dash across from Culpepper to Gloucester Court House, that is no reason why Stuart's corps d'armee should succeed in making good a foothold in the thickly-peopled States of Pennsylvania—unless we are to suppose that the Government neglects the most obvious precautions for the protection of the North.

But it is the mere indifference of a rebel purpose to cross the Potomac, the entire militia of Pennsylvania and 50,000 men from the adjacent States are called out; if proper measures are adopted to prevent any of the invaders from points of danger, or to protect adequately all depôts of supplies; if the splendid but somehow amazingly inactive force at Harper's Ferry can be manœuvred so as to fall upon the rear of the invaders, and cut off effectually their retreat to their base; in this case the invasion of the North would probably prove the end of the South as a pretended nation. If, however, matters are allowed to drift along, the rebel commander decides itself into a belief that the rebels are not energetic enough or desperate enough to try to carry the war into Pennsylvania; or that, being in that State, they will not prove most formidable intruders, then it will be well for loyal people to prepare themselves for another season of heart-breaking disaster and disappointment.

It is a very simple matter, and one which should admit of no debate. If we can not keep the rebels out of Pennsylvania, there must be no more talk of foreign wars, for neither could we prevent the English from landing on our coast.

THE LOUNGER.

WHETHER WE ARE WHIPPED.

IT seems that there are some people who think that we are whipped. If we are so, we are all like General Taylor, who never knew when he was beaten. It must be a peculiarity of the American mind, and heart, and black that when they are discomfited they can not see it, and push on until they succeed. In one of Thackeray's stories Major O'Gahagan explains that somebody was killed most shockingly out of rule. By all the established precedents it was the adversary who ought to have died, but in the manner our gallant O'Gahagan informs us that we are the party which ought to perceive that it is dead; and that our perversity in insisting that it survives to be still alive is unpardonable. It is precisely the strain in which John Bull has addressed us from the beginning. "Kicking's no use," sneers honest John; "you are dead as a door-nail, if you only knew it."

But we don't know it, and we can not insist into our dull brains. Here we have been fighting for two years. We began without an army, without a navy, with scarcely a dollar, and with no expectation of a fight. The enemy, on the other hand, had been carefully preparing for many years. We suddenly found that we must fight, whether we are ready or not, and we plunge in pell-mell. We are rebuffed, defeated, and victorious; we win and lose battles during two years of fluctuating fortune; but meanwhile we steadily push on. We drive the lines of our enemy further and further into our territory. We lose no advantage we once secure; and we prevent their own successes in the field from being fruitful. The battle won by us is an enormous benefit to our cause; a battle won by them is of no practical advantage. Take the late Rappahannock campaign as a specimen. Hooker was defeated; and what have the rebels gained by it? Take the attack on Vicksburg. Suppose Grant retires. We have occupied and destroyed the position at Haines's Bluff, and at Yazoo City we have inflicted a blow upon that very interesting rat to rams and boats, while we hold the Yazoo River itself, flanking the city. We played for a ten-strike indeed, but seven eight counts secure the game. Observe, then, with all our reverses, how steadily we have proceeded in the work of opening the Mississippi River. The work has been an unvarying, but it has been a persistent and accumulating success for the people against the oligarchy of the rebel army.

There is but one thing necessary to the complete success of the people, and that is, that their faith shall be steadily maintained. They have taken a great work in hand—a work which by its very nature requires time for its complete accomplishment. The gain of its success is incalculable. The shame and ruin of its failure are inconceivable. The work can only be done by the victory of the people or of the oligarchy. To make terms with the rebels is to concede that we are wholly driven by intelligent men to a work which we know that we can steadily advanced upon the rebellion from the first. To consent to their separation from us is to condemn ourselves to final ruin—to fall from a first-rate sovereign power to the wretched condition of a loose group of small states, each one of which will be more despised because it was once part of a great nation.

TO THE FOREIGN OBSERVER.

THAT foreigners, who neither understand the character of our government nor of the war for its maintenance, should think it all a farce as a folly and the last as a crime—who can see nothing in the sharp fight but cunckles, meaningless, infamous fratricidal carnage—should be disposed to regard Mr. Fernando Wood's meeting as a sign of returning reason is not impossible. But they ought to endeavor to be more intelligent than much importance to that event, and before they salute the Lord Mayor as the avenger of the millennial dawn, exactly the character and scope of the meeting.

Its central figure was Fernando Wood. He is a person who has long filled the country, and especially in this State and city, as having escaped legal punishment for swindling through the fortunate operation of the statute of limitations. He is further known as the Mayor of the city who refused to obey the laws of the State in regard to the police; who, when the State was collecting and planting its guns against the lawless and loyal citizens, supposed to be about to attack the city, had the impudence to open fire upon the State arsenal from its steps in New York of cannon intended for them; and who, before those cannon had begun their labors, proposed to the city of New York to secede from the State. He is still further known as the man who, after the attack upon Sumter, insisted that the Union must be forcibly preserved, and that the executive power should be provided with every means to maintain the popular will. He is the person who at the same time declared that he threw himself entirely into the contest against rebels with all his power and all his might.

Mr. Wood is not a person whose moral or political character gives weight to his words or importance to his actions. Singularly calm and guarded, if he chooses, in his expressions, his antecedents infallibly destroy confidence in the purity of his motives. Of a restless ambition, and, by universal reputation, an unscrupulous political manager, he is yet regarded by the party with which he acts, and fails in every effort to control it. His argument, however apparently calm and cool, is always an appeal to the basest and most malignant passions, and his sole dependence is upon the most ignorant and degraded class of the community, which he flatters and befools. He represents no other body of citizens than the brutal mob of a great city. His name, whether with more or less justice, is synonymous with political corruption. Its general estimation by saints every cause he espouses; and if the zealous seeker should try to find in all the free States the most obsequious and servile tool of the radical, prolonged, and perilous effort of the slaveholding faction to ruin this Government, to break every bond of social order, to debauch the national conscience, to extirpate the very instinct of nationality, and destroy the natural love of liberty in the human heart, he would cry Eureka! when he found Fernando Wood.

His meeting has only the importance which he gives it. No other person of the least cognizance of any influence or consideration whatever was concerned in it. Mr. Wood's speech was calm in tone and formal in defiant in phrase—a characteristic of the plantation school of politics in which he was bred. He is reported to use with relish in Virginia or Mississippi, but he is perfectly ready and willing for war in New York, and he invited the Government to try how when General Hunnicutts arrive in his Department. His speech was a plainer and compacter statement of the address and resolutions, and when he had spoken every thing was said.

That Mr. Fernando Wood, being the man that we have described in terms which few, whether of his own party or not, would characterize as unfair, representing the present or future success or policy of the American people is a proposition which few but Mr. Wood himself would maintain. To suppose it possible is to suppose that the nation agrees that it is not a nation; that the Union is a form more unsubstantial than a cloud; that there is no national government possible; and that civil order can rightfully have no guarantee.

Foreign observers may think the war foolish and fratricidal, but they can hardly suppose it possible that such a war could be waged for two years by a nation which, under any conceivable circumstances, would accept such propositions as these for political principles. That nation may be conquered, and the government overthrown. But that it should be so absolutely conquered as to concede that it never had a right to be a nation, is incredible to any body who does not suppose that human nature itself has deteriorated upon this continent. The day in which this nation accepts Fernando Wood as its leader, and declares as its faith, is the day which seals the destruction of free popular institutions, and inaugurates as the "splendid despotism" for which he frankly pronounces, but a despotism which rivals that of Dahomey in its grandeur, and that of the pirates of Madagascar in dignity and enlightenment. Such an ignominious fall would be without historical parallel.

JOURNAL OF A RESIDENCE ON A GEORGIAN PLANTATION.

THE Journal of MRS. FRANCES ANNE KEMBLE during her residence upon a plantation in Georgia at the wife of the proprietor is in press, and will be immediately issued by Harper & Brothers. It is the most thrilling and remarkable picture of the interior social life of the slaveholding section in this country that has ever been published. Our readers acquainted with the life have been drawn from outside observers, either sagacious and philosophic travelers and students like Olmsted, or from the English and other foreign visitors. They were made to see only what the slaveholders chose; or, again, from the rosy stories told by slaveholders themselves, or "Southside" Agriculturists.

But this Journal of MRS. KEMBLE was jotted down from day to day as she lived upon the plantation of which she was mistress. There is no excuse, no palliation of facts, but the whole system is laid bare and spread before the eye. A faithful and fatal witness we have not had. Even Uncle Tom's Cabin is only founded upon fact. The Journal of MRS. KEMBLE is the fact itself. And thus day by day, from the most unexpected quarters and the most impartial witnesses, the terrible truth is told of this rebellion. To secure and perpetuate slavery, is an insurrection against human nature itself.

The book will be published at the earliest possible moment, and will be as savagely denounced and denied by the rebels and their friends as it will be heartily welcomed by every intelligent, humane, and loyal man in the land and the world.

MR. KINGLAKE.

THE unqualified applause which greeted Mr. Kinglake's history, and which—however justified by the picturesque movement and interest of the work—was somewhat surprising to the friends of a people who were represented in the book as hoodwinked by their own Government and controlled by that of France, is at last interrupted. Not only have the ponderous Quarterlies opened upon him, but the pamphleteers have thrown themselves out as skirmishers, and are picking off his weak points. There threatens to be a Kinglake literature.

Colonel Chesney, in a little work upon the Crimean campaign, introduces the historian in the most ludicrous light. Kinglake, it seems, in telling Lord Raglan was on the morning of the battle of the Alma, when seeing a gentleman in extreme difficulties upon the back of a pony, he said, "I never heard a pony make such a row!" and asked, "Does any one know who the gentleman is?" The Colonel answered, "It is Mr. Kinglake, the author of 'Eothen.'" "Oh!" said his Lordship, in a most obliging manner." Thereupon, Kinglake very fairs, as the Colonel relates, the most charming man was incontinently run away with, and tossed over the pony's head. To ridicule the absurdity, the historian, through a friend, actually explains that he got a tumble because the saddle was too large for the pony, who shot saddle and rider over his neck!

If he is once put into the pillory of ridicule it will go hard with the historian. An author so severely satirical can not complain of satire; and a man so fierce-witted ought to know that the only way safely to treat such a story was to laugh at it. Sir Francis Head, about as vulnerable an author as could be named, has also attacked Mr. Kinglake, declaring that "the honor" of soldiers and of all who confide in the historian is unsafe in his keeping! This is a tolerably emphatic statement. But it is not at all supported by the extracts we have seen from Mr. Francis's pamphlet, the moral of which seems to be, that Mr. Kinglake is a foolish writer of no importance, who ought, therefore, to be prohibited from writing lest England should be involved in war! There may be a great deal of foolish writing in Mr. Kinglake's history, but such a consummate ass equator as that is impossible outside the brains and the books of Sir Francis Head.

Meanwhile the corrections which the author has been constrained to make in his work are few and unimportant; which, under the circumstances of a contemporary history, must be admitted as the most convincing testimony to its general veracity.

CARLYLE.

The Rev. M. D. Conway, in a letter to the Boston Commonwealth, draws the following portrait of Carlyle:

"While he engaged Mr. P. in conversation, I had a good opportunity for studying the characteristics of this remarkable man. Tall and almost slender, solitary by my expectations, with a lengthy head, bent forward from somewhat stooping shoulders, with a magnificent brow overhanging a blue eye that suggests a tenderness which nowhere else appears in his manner or conversation, but which one can imagine were in the unconscious hour in the Life of Sterling was written; with a short beard and massive gray as impressive of gruffness on the lower face with a light and ruddy color which overspread the face with deep flushes during conversation; with a voice which began and gently rose in a moment to a tornado; with a habit of bursting out into loud and almost convulsive laughter, which often ended in a fit of coughing; with nervous movements of fingers and shoulders, hinting strength of overcoat; with a terrible vehemence of phrase—most of all to the laughter—of pain and grief, Carlyle seemed to me one of the most beautiful embodiments of all the men I have ever seen; and while in his presence I remembered the weird impressions of his mighty beauty and awe which I had when journeying through the Mammoth Cave."

THE SANITARY COMMISSION.

The Western Department of the United States Sanitary Commission have commenced the publication of a small neat double quarto sheet devoted to the sanitary interests of the army. It is full of interest and encouragement.

The war has developed nothing finer than the spirit which originated and which has maintained this Commission. Naturally viewed with jealousy by some military traditions, its triumph has been irresistible in proportion as its usefulness became universal. Plunged into a tremendous war without soldiers, we had to improvise an army. The whole practical wisdom of the country was called to conspire for mutual assistance; and the one thing which outside enterprise, sagacity, and benevolence could do, was to undertake, in hearty, generous alliance with the military authority, the care of the health of the army. The Commission was organized at once. Its management was intrusted to the most skillful hands; and it appealed directly to the sympathy suggested by voluntary contributions.

Such was the generous and magnificent response that it has expended more than three hundred thousand dollars in cash, and has distributed hospital stores of the value of millions. At the present time more than three-fourths of all the contributions made by the people for the benefit of the sick and wounded in the army pass through its hands, amounting to more than a thousand dollars in each and two thousand bales of clothing and stores suspended and issued each day. Of this aggregate about a third of the money and more than half of the stores are distributed in the Western Department; the other two-thirds being expended in the East, in the central office and among the armies of the East.

The agents of the Commission are First, General Inspectors, who are medical men, charged with the army, watching camps and hospitals, and looking out for the sick and wounded, and superviising the whole system. Second, Special Agents, who are medical men making temporary rounds of observation. Third, Store-keepers, in charge of Sanitary stores at various points. Fourth, Special relief agents, distributing stores, procuring discharges and pay, transportation and furloughs, with a general look-out for suffering and want. Fifth, Canvassing agents, exploring the home field and procuring and forwarding supplies. Sixth, Clerks, keeping accounts, records, etc. Seventh, Messengers, accompanying shipment of stores to prevent loss or waste. In this class there are also corps of earnest, indefatigable, and effective volunteers.

Such is the scope of this great, practical charity. Every where in the land busy feet and fingers, telling brains and hearts' beating pulses, are at work for it. The mother, the wife, the sister, the daughter, the sweet-heart, can all do their part in the grand labor that exalts while it saves a people. It is the boast of the Commission not only that it has relieved such countless cases of suffering, but that it has shown how the outgoing heart and energy of every home in the country can bring themselves to bear upon the welfare of the soldiers who are fighting for them.

A FRIENDLY VOICE.

Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper is the journal of much the largest circulation in Great Britain. Its issue is 500,000 weekly, and, being sold at a penny, it is the oracle of the working class in England. It is perfectly faithful to the cause of the Government in this country, because it knows that the Government here is the people, and that the success of the rebellion either in compelling us to recognize the Independence of the Slave empire, or concede to slavery new privileges as the condition of restoring the Union, would be a fatal blow to the working classes, who are the great mass of the people in every country in the world. It understood perfectly the cry for independence at the South and for peace at the North. It knows that they mean exactly the same thing. And therefore, while so many of the leading London papers seem to suppose that Hooker's defeat secures the overthrow of the Government and the dissolution of this nation, Lloyd's paper says quietly:

"It is true, he has to face the entire Confederate army; that, he is driven into intrenchments; that his communications are threatened: but he is not annihilated, nor is his fortunes desperate. We will not for one moment question the exaggeration of the position; but we mention the regard the independence of the South as a fait accompli, even after these recent Confederate successes. The struggle has been awful; the land has been softened with human blood, the sky has been with mans hosts of armed men, all of one race, shedding each other's blood like water; but the South is not with the Federals: it was not they who provoked the wicked conflict."

THE LAST BRITISH MUDDLE.

That exceedingly silly gentleman, Mr. Roebuck, has been telling the people in Sheffield, England, precisely what Mr. Fernando Wood told the people in New York—that the Government of the United States was well whipped, and that the gallant, slaveholding rebels, the direct descendants of gallant, slave-loving Britons, had established their independence.

The speech of the excellent Roebuck, whose face has the complete stamp of the idiot, the imbecile and common sense, has as many absurd falsehoods and blunders as it has statements. One only we shall notice, and that is the statement repeated by a certain kind of John Bull in this country. He says that "by the Declaration of Paris, that in our Revolution we established the great principle that a people may break up a government whenever it does not suit them, and set up another, if the good Roebuck would but take the trouble to know what he is talking about, is not the right to refuse to obey the laws, but to overthrow the statesman, philosopher, or man of common capacity ever assert such a doctrine.

The right to abolish, as defined and exercised by the American people, is the right of any people "to alter locally oppressive laws of government which, after patient effort, there is no legal redress, to right themselves by force. And this right is to be exercised under the most solemn forms from which no man and no people are ever free.

In the case of the present conspiracy to extend slavery the North has exhausted every effort and a shadow of pretense that any such right of revolution is exercised. The whole movement proceeds upon the assumption that it is not a revolutionary act, but an act of secession constitutionally competent for every State to exercise.

Then as to the plea which the perceptive Roebuck makes for the rebels, that somehow or other the laws are to be changed, and slavery only succeed, slavery will be abolished, he is sufficiently answered—since he is beyond the reach of common sense—by Jefferson Davis's own words:—"Liberty, Equality, Fraternity, we have deliberately substituted Slavery, Subordination, and Government."

The muddle of Roebuck and his class will conclude upon our affairs into which John Bull has yet tumbled.

THE SOURCES OF THE NILE.]

The reported discovery by Captains Speke and Grant of the sources of the Nile is the result of one of the most famous geographical problems. The question required only this final step of solution, for previous investigation had ascertained the river near to its source: and to Professor Beke's work upon the Nile and in exploration, published last year, a compact manual of the most interesting information, the probable course of the river is laid down as the recent discoveries have proved it to be.

Thus within a very few years two more of the secrets of the globe have been revealed by human patience and heroism. Nothing seems easier than to find the source of a river. The simple direction would appear to be, go to it. But the physical dangers with which the old geographers covered this terra incognita, and the natural hostility hypothetical of the many and various dangers which threatened explorers. Thus of this last expedition, of another year's toil, of the journey across the Arabian Gulf, to strike inland to the probable course of the river and descend its current to Khartoum, seventeen only are recorded as the results of the final party. The climate, the savage tribes, the deserts, the marshes, the beasts, starvation, fever, exposure, fatigue—these were some of the enemies with which the explorer has to contend.

One of the most interesting accounts of a journey to discover the source of the Nile is that of Frederick Werne, a German, who went with an expedition sent by Mehemet Ali, the Viceroy of Egypt. But the Pacha's object was less scientific than political and commercial. The expedition reached the true Sobat and there returned. More recently Dr. Knoblecher, Romish Vicar-General at Khartoum, projected a voyage which was told but not successful. Richard Thornton, a traveller of fame, who has some remarkable qualities as an explorer, and who has written a compendious book upon the Bogos country and their life, undertook the Nile exploration in company, we think, with Speke, but their full story has not been published but with meeting at his companion's discoveries. But none of all the explorers, except the late and Burton's expedition, took the African shore of the Arabian Gulf as their base of operations. Yet by Dr. Beke's map of four years ago this was clearly the true point of departure.

In the letter announcing the discovery upon the authority of Captain Speke himself, Sir Roderick J. Murchison says: "The discovery of Speke and Grant, by which the southernmost limit of the basin of the Nile is determined to be three degrees south of the equator, is the most remarkable geographical feat of our age; and is, indeed, an achievement of which all our countrymen may well be proud."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A Scotch minister was once busy catechising his young parishioners before the congregation, when he put the usual first question to a stout girl whose father kept a public house. "What is your name?" No reply. The question having been repeated, the girl replied, "Now if your fun, Mr. Minister, ye ken my name well enough. D'ye no ken, when ye come to our house on a night, 'Kate, bring me some ale!'" The congregation, forgetting the sacredness of the place, were in a broad grin, and the parson looked daggers.

The lady who fell back on her dignity came near breaking it; and the man who couldn't stand it any longer, has taken a seat, and is now quite comfortable.

Lord Cockburn, when at the bar, was pleading in a triumphant cadence, when his case turned on the fact of one of the vessels carrying so lights, which was the cause of the accident. "Lights!" exclaimed he, rising, and in the argument with this remark, "In fact, gentlemen, had there been more lights there would have been more lives."

"Porter," asked an old lady at an Irish railway station, "when does the next ticket train leave?" "Sixty minutes past eight, ma'am," was Mike's reply.

Diggs saw a note lying on the ground, but knew that it was a counterfeit, and was of no use to anybody but a rogue. He told Smithers the story, when the latter said, "Do you know, Diggs, you have missed your vocation in life?" "Why, what have I done?" "You have passed a counterfeit note, and ought to be such," said Smithers, with quite a smile, and fled.

Why is the letter "c" the most charitable letter?—Because it is forever giving aid to those in any other letter.

A romantic young lady fell into a river, and was likely to be drowned; but a preserver accidentally appeared, and at once commenced the work of resuscitating to her life. When she came to herself she declared she would marry the saver of her life. "Why, Miss," said he, "I am a married man." "Oh, that's no matter," she replied, "I'll be content to be your wife in one neighborhood!" "No; it is a Newfoundland dog."

A horse-dealer in a provincial town was once elected alderman. He was a thrifty man—close-fisted and shrewd, and doctored and sold all the horses for twenty miles round. He was hereby made liable for a year or two to look to hard drinking and become poor. Finally, he determined to be a drunkard in hard work or else to hit drinking habits. One day a man brought a horse to him to be doctored. "Can you cure him, my friend," said the man, "but you see he won't drink." "If that's all you want," said the alderman, "you have only to make him constable—he'll drink fast enough then. I've tried it, and you see, and know."

A few days ago a little urchin in Westminster saw a shilling lying on the footway. He had no sooner picked it up than it was claimed by a bystander. "I've shilling hadn't got a hole in it." "Yes, it had," said the rogue as he pocketed it, "but I've got it, sir, safe," coolly replied the boy, and walked off triumphantly.

"Pat, do you love your country?" "Yes, yer honor." "What's the best thing you remember about Ireland, Pat?" "A whisky, yer honor." "Ah, I see, Pat, with all her faults you love her still."

LEARNING AND LEISURE.—A chap being asked to explain the paradox of how it was possible for so lazy a man as Ishain to attain so much learning, replied—"I didn't get it—I just leant it—here and—there—and—was too lazy to forget it."

Suwarrow, even in peace, always slept fully armed, boots and all. "When I was boy," he said, "and wanted to enjoy a comfortable sleep, I usually took off one spur."

There is a grocer up town who is said to be so mean that he was seen on a cold day to eat his candy, hold him up by the hind legs, and lock in the cracks of his feet to see if he hadn't been short-weighted by the candy-man.

Dr. Whewell, walking in Mr. Hamilton's garden at Cobham, expressed his surprise at the prodigious growth of the trees. "Yes," replied Mr. Hamilton, "remember they have nothing else to do."

What is the best thing to prevent a maid from despairing?—Twilight.

Man's happiness is said to hang upon a thread. This must be the thread that is never at hand to sew on the three-button-hole coat.

"Man," says Adam Smith, "is an animal that makes bargains. No other animal does this: no dog exchanges bone with another."

A politician was boasting, in a public speech, that he could bring an argument to a grist as quick as any other man. "Yes," said a voice, "and to a pint a good deal quicker," replied an acquaintance.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE SIEGE OF VICKSBURG.

Dates from Vicksburg to 9d describe the siege as being steadily prosecuted by General Grant. No further assaults have been made, but a heavy artillery fire has been opened on the place. One story says that as many as 5,000 shells were thrown into the city in an hour. While the gun-boats under Porter are said to have silenced the water batteries, the land forces have been busy with the erection of one. Nothing has been heard of the expedition under Sherman. Dates of 3d from Memphis say that General Grierson is marching for Johnston's railroad, and will probably, with his entire division, be met on the line by Sherman. Grierson's command, ready to intercept Sherman, will attempt to cut off the rebel force which pressed himself with a strong force near the bridge on the line of the road, but fell back again to avoid a battle and escaping the fire of our troops.

Jackson on evening reports the return of General Bish's expedition through fifty-six miles of country, with the capture of the Yazoo, and eleven miles below Yazoo City. Bales and barges and a number of grist-mills and cotton-gins, used to grind corn, were destroyed; also a large quantity of cotton belonging to the rebels. The country around the line of march was teeming with provisions of riches. Cattle, sheep, and hogs abound in all directions. Flourishing crops of corn and cotton were seen on every side. Hundreds of negroes fled from their masters at the approach of our troops, and followed them into our lines.

THE SIEGE OF PORT HUDSON.

General Banks, on 20th ult., had completely invested Port Hudson, and our gun-boats were keeping the rebel fortifications from the river, while the troops at the same time were using their artillery on the land side.

On 27th an assault was made which was unsuccessful. The Second Louisiana (colored) regiment fought with extraordinary gallantry, losing in killed and wounded one-fifth of its number.

The latest accounts state that Banks, like Grant, was proceeding slowly, reducing the place by regular approaches; the soldiers were confident of success.

GENERAL BANKS'S LOSSES.

General Banks' official report to the War Department to the 30th ult. to be nearly 1900, including some of his best officers. He speaks very highly of the conduct of the negro troops.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC IN MOTION.

General Hooker's bridge and pontoon train made a daring reconnaissance across the Rappahannock just below Fredericksburg. Heavy artillery on the Heights above was selected for the duty, and executed in the most thorough and effective manner. The first crossing was made in pontoon boats, in the face of a murderous fire from the rebel pickets. The first party under New Jersey troops did this important service in the most gallant style. They were followed closely by several Vermont regiments, and a charge on the rifle-pits resulted in the capture of some 70 or 80 rebel sharpshooters. Then came the work of the engineers, and the remainder of the division was crossed over. This was effectually done by seven in the morning, where it remained for the night, and on Saturday morning the entire command was combined. Our skirmishers had driven some thirty other prisoners, during Friday night, making the number captured about one hundred. Our forces are still on the other side of the river.

VIRGINIA.

The plans of the enemy for the summer campaign, of which we have recently received considerable news from the Richmond papers, have been pretty fully unmasked by General Hooker. The movement against Washington, as is now pretty well understood, is an invasion of the North, and is to be made by the rebel army under Lee, by a counter-movement. The leading cavalry commander of the rebels, J. E. B. Stuart, since the battle of Chancellorsville has been massing, drilling, and supplying a large force of rebel cavalry at or near Brandy Station, five miles south of Culpepper—probably the largest cavalry force ever raised by the rebels, numbering from 15 to 20,000 thousand. This force was understood to be about ready to move, with the combination of guerrillas in Maryland and Pennsylvania, and perhaps other Northern States, carrying devastation and terror before them. This movement, conducted so effectually interferes with the arrangements, and has broken up the rebels before they could move. Our view we base to the vicinity a force of cavalry and artillery equal to meet the rebels with every prospect of wicked infantry, and it is supposed that this force reached Brandy Station on Friday night. We have a report that a severe fight took place that day, but no particulars are given.

ANOTHER UNION RAID.

A late raid of our troops, with the substance of three gun-boats, up the Mattapony River into King William county, Virginia, under the command of Commodore Rowan, has resulted in a decided success. After destroying a small force of rebel cavalry, the main body of troops destroyed a rebel foundry at Aylette, together with several mills, manufactories, and a large amount of the government warehouses laden with grain. The expedition was accompanied by Lieutenant-Governor Pierpont, who returned to Yorktown on the 5th inst., after accomplishing a very successful mission of the expedition.

A JOURNAL OF FORT SUPERSEDED.

Admiral Foote has been ordered to supercede Admiral Du Pont in command of the South Atlantic blockading fleet. The change may indicate another move on that city, as it is said that the Navy Department was dissatisfied that Du Pont did not renew the attack after the last unsuccessful attempt.

THE CASE OF THE CHICAGO "TIMES."

The military order of General Burnside, suppressing the issue of the Chicago "Times," and the arrest by the army officer in consequence of the revoking of the same by the President. The publication of the paper in the office of the Times have been withdrawn by General Burnside, and the circulation of the paper resumed. It is also issued elsewhere in handsome pamphlet.

THE EXCHANGE WITH THE SOUTH.

An order has been issued permitting ladies and children to go to the South on flags of truce. Both sides are very desirous. Those going South can not return until the close of the war. Those coming North can only subscribe to the oath of allegiance to the National Government.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

ANOTHER GROWL FROM ROEBUCK.

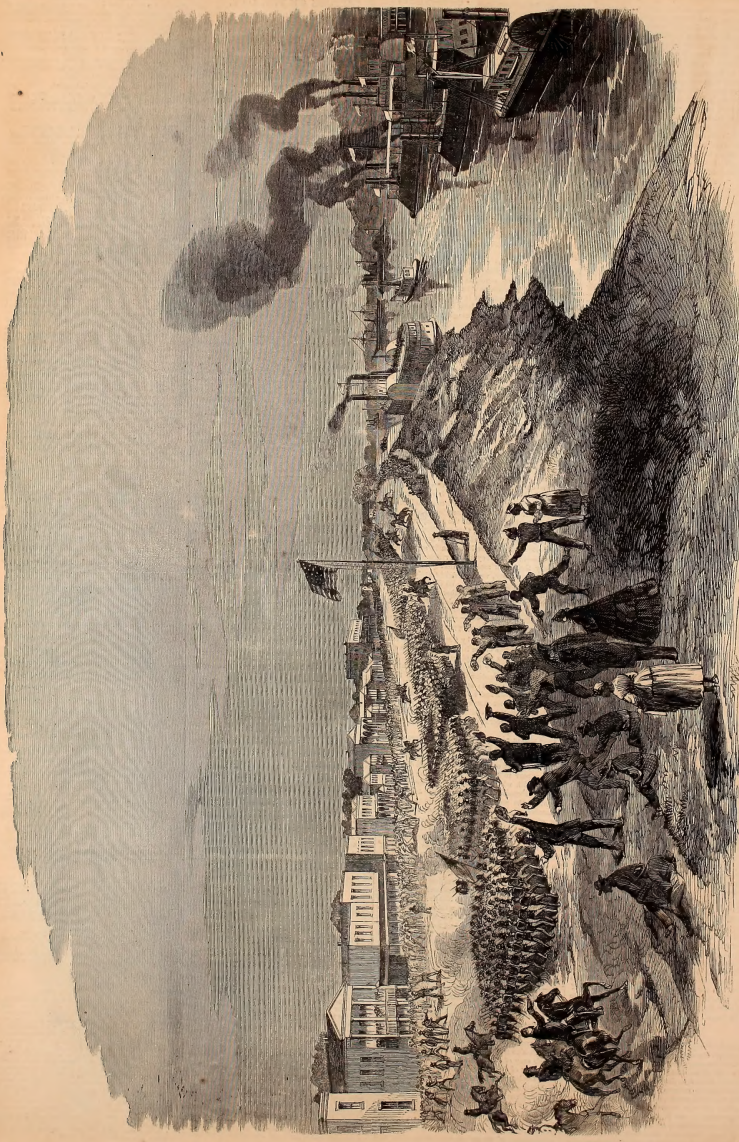
Mr. Roebuck, M.P., addressed a large assemblage at Sheffield, England, in support of Russia's course of intervention in America. The meeting was convened with the object of giving the prosperity of which was to the Cabinet in London. There were about ten thousand persons present, and the Mayor of the town presided. Mr. Roebuck delivered a lengthy oration, not however, withstanding the length of the speech, which was the evidently quiet-cast his statements. Rev. Mr. Hogge moved a resolution to the effect of interference, and it was carried by a majority of votes over an amendment recommending a continuance of neutrality.

HONORS TO STONEWALL JACKSON.

A public meeting was to be held in Liverpool on the 8d of June to offer a tribute to the memory of Stonewall Jackson.

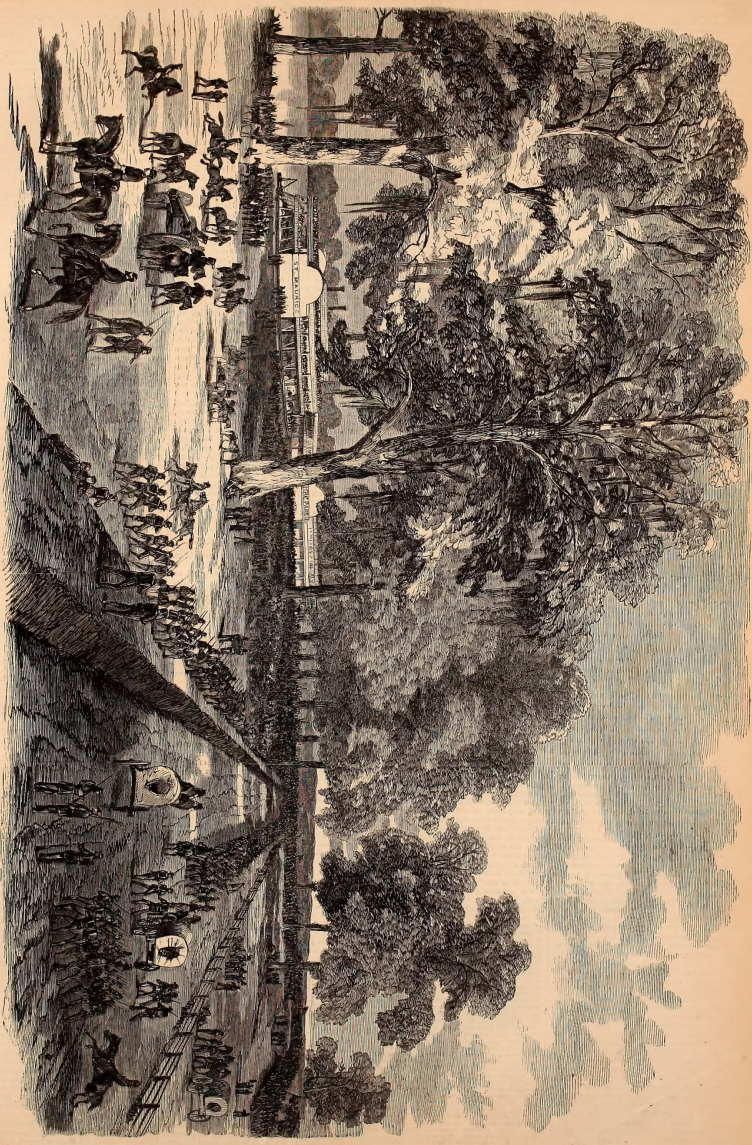
POLAND.

THE REBELLION.



The fighting still continues in Poland, with victory one day on the side of the insurgents and the next in favor of the Russians. It is said that Earl Russell had taken a very bold diplomatic step in relation to the Northern Affairs of England, on the Polish question, having proposed to the Cabinet to become combining intervention for Poland. The proposal is thus stated:

1. The immediate offer of an armistice for one year.
2. The Polish fortresses to continue to be garrisoned by the Russian troops.
3. The immediate institution of a Polish administration.
4. The whole to be stipulated in the rebellion to be armistice or brought to trial.



MEXICO.

THE FALL OF PUEBLA.

The report of the capture of Puebla by the French and the surrender of General Ortegas army is confirmed by the facts which establish the result also bear testimony to the undaunted bravery, indomitable courage and energy of the Mexicans. They only surrendered when starvation confronted them, and even then many of the officers and privates refuse their honor prisoners to the invaders. On the 17th inst. General Forey received a letter from the General Ortegas, offering to allow the Mexican officers and soldiers to march out, the officers with their side-arms, providing they would give a parole not to serve against the French again. This offer was refused by Gen. Ortega, who meanwhile ripked his cannon, burned his gun-carriages, destroyed the arms of his infantry and then surrendered his forces as prisoners of war. The advance of the French army on the 19th was five miles beyond Puebla, on the way to the capital. The Mexicans are making preparations for a desperate resistance to the entry of the Monicomans to the utmost of their ability, and it is probable that the fighting will have to be bloody route to Forey before they reach the Grand Plaza.

CHAPTER XIV.

IN the narrative of home events I skipped a little business, not quite colorless, but irrelevant to the love-passages then on hand. It has, however, a connection with the curious events now converging to a point: so, with the reader's permission, I will place it in logical sequence, disregarding the order of time. The day Dr. Sampson splashed among the ducks, and one of them hid till dinner, the rest were seated in luncheon, when two patients were announced as waiting—Mr. and Mrs. Maxley. Sampson refused to see them, on this ground: "I will not feed and heal." But Mrs. Dodd interceded, and he yielded. "Well, then, show them in here; they are better orators than pushers." On this, a stout fresh-colored woman, the picture of health, was ushered in, and courtesied all round.

"Well, what is the matter now?" inquired Sampson, rather roughly.

"Be seated, Mrs. Maxley," said Mrs. Dodd, benignly.

"I thank ye kindly, ma'am;" and she sat down. "I'm not sick, but I'm in pain."

"Well, don't say 'that pain.' Describe it. Now listen, all of ye; you're goen to get a clinical lecture."

"If you please, ma'am," said the patient, "it takes me here under my left breast, and runs right to my elbow, it do: and bitter bad, 'tis while it do last; chokes me, mostly; and I feel as I used die: and if I was to move hand or fut, I think I should die, that I do."

"Poor woman," said Mrs. Dodd.

"Oh, she has not said yet," cried Sampson, cheerfully. "She'll tell addle eggs over all our tombstones; that is to say, if she minds what I bid her. Now you've had your say, mum."

"No longer agone than yesterem, ma'am; and so I said to my master, 'The doctor he is dee-tenerous Sally up at Albion tells me;' and—"

"Whisht! whisht! who cares what you said to Jack, and Jill said to you? What was his cause?"

"The cause! What, of my pain? He says, 'what was the cause?'"

"Ay, the cause. Just observe, jintlemen," said Sampson, addressing imaginary auditors, "how startled they all are at a docker deviates from professional habits into science, and takes the right end of the stick for once b' asking for the cause."

"The cause was the will of God, I do suppose," said Mrs. Maxley.

"Stuff!" shouted Sampson, angrily. "Then why come to mortal me to cure you?"

Alfred put in his oar. "Here not mean the 'final cause;' he means the 'proximate cause.'"

"My poor dear creature, I baint no Latiner," objected the patient.

Sampson's keen eyes sternly on the slippery dame. "What I want to know is, had you been running up stairs? or eating fust? or drinking fust? or grilling over temperance or quarreling with your husband? Come now, which was it?"

"Me quarrel with my man! We haven't never been disagreeable, not once, since we went to church a pair and came back a couple. I don't say but what we mayn't have had a word or two at odd times, as married folk will."

"And she says she has had a word or two—y' infarnal quibbler—was it just before your last spasm, eh?"

"Well, it might; I am not gainsaying that: but you said quarrel, says you; 'quarrel' it were your word; and I defy all Barkton, gentle and simple, to say as how me and my master—"

"Whisht! whisht! Now, jintlemen, ye see what the great coming science—the science of Healing—has to contend with. The docs are the fools; but one: and the pash ats are lyres, ivry man Jack. 'Hi! hum me; y' have got a pain that you can't eradicate; but you may muzzle it for years, and die of something quite different when your time's up.'

"Like enough, Sir. If you please, ma'am, Dr. Stephenson do blame my indigestion for it."

"Dr. Stephenson's an ass."

"Dear heart, how cantankerous you be. To be sure Dr. Osmond he says no: it's muscular, says he."

"Dr. Osmond's an ijit! List me! You munn't quarrel—not money! you munn't gobble, nor drink your beer too fast.

"You are wrong, doctor; I never drink no beer: it costs money."

"Your catlap, then. And, above all, no grizzling! Go to church whenever you can without losing a business. It's medicinal: soothes the brain, and takes it off worldly cares. And have no words with your husband: ye be'll destroy you; it's his only chance of getting the last word. Cure killed a cat, a mammal with eight lives more than a chatter-box. If you worry or excite your brain, little Maxley, you will cook your own goose—by a quick fire."

"Dear heart, these be naked sayings. Won't ye give me nothing to make me better, Sir?"

"No; I never dinker; I go to the root: you may buy a vile ol' chlorofm, and take a puff if ye feel premonitory symps; but a quite brain is your only real chance. Now slope! and send the male screw."

"Anna?"

"Your husband."

"That I will, Sir. Your servant, doctor; your servant, ma'am; servant all the company."

Mrs. Dodd hoped the poor woman had nothing very serious the matter.

"Oh, it is a mortal disease," cried Sampson, as cool as a cucumber. "She has got angina pectoris, or brisk-pang, a disorder that admirably exemplifies the pretensions of midicine t' a science." And with this he dashed into monologue, as per margin.*

Maxley's tall gaunt form came slouching in, and traversed the floor, pounding it with heavy hand blows. He looked very gravely at Mrs. Dodd's invitation, took a handkerchief out of his hat, wiped his face, and surveyed the company, grand and calm. In James Maxley's large nervous; his head was huge; his mouth, when it fairly opened, revealed a mouth so large that it used a voice naturally stentorian by its volume and native vigor. But when the owner of this incarnate bellows had a mind to say something augacious, he sank at once from his habitual roar to a sound scarce above a whisper; a contrast very perplexing to those who knew not the man.

"Well, what is it, Maxley? Rheumatism again?"

"No, that it ain't," bellowed Maxley, defiantly.

"What then? Come, look sharp."

"Well, then, doctor, I'll tell you. I'm sore troubled—with—indigestion."

This malady, announced in the tone of a proclamation, and coming after a long mental preparation, amused the party considerably, although parturient mountains had ere then produced muscipula of less pretension.

"A mouse!" inquired Sampson, disdainfully.

"Where? up your sleeve? Don't come to me: go t' a seedsman and have your corn cut off. I've seen 'em mutilate a psalmist for as little."

Maxley said it was not up his sleeve, worse luck. On his, doctor's, head hand it was gone. Might it not have gone down his throat?

"Took his potato-trap for the pantry-door. Ha! ha! ha!" laughing at his own wit, and causing the others, a laughing at your own sport," said Maxley, winking his eye: but 'twixt you and me, doctor, you're not quite most: you sits yander fit to bust: but" (with a roar like a lion) "ye never offers me none on't, neither nay nor nowt."

At this sudden turn of Mr. Maxley's wit, light and playful as a tap of the old English quarter-staff, they were a little disconcerted. But Edward, who laughed and supplied him zealously with sandwiches.

"You're a gentleman, you are," said Maxley, looking full at Sampson and Alfred to point the contradistinction.

Having thus disposed of his satirists, he contemplated the sandwiches with an inquiring and indulgent eye. "Well, you're right, Sir," said the thoughtful inspection, "you gentlefolks won't die of hard work; your savants must cut the very enamel to fit your mouths. I'll be bound the brain behind the gentry in a great and useful department of intelligence, he made precisely one mouthful of each sandwich.

Mrs. Dodd was secretly amazed, and taking care not to be noticed by Maxley, said, confidentially, "Physician can't interrupt: he cannot a passe par là."

The plate cleared, and washed down with a tumbler of port, Maxley resumed, and informed the doctor that the mouse was at this moment in the garden drawing his breath. He'd be content here to put an end to her, if I've any luck at all."

Sampson told him he needn't trouble. "Nature has put an end to her as long as her body."

Mr. Maxley was puzzled for a moment; then spread his mouth from ear to ear at the notion that made the glasses ring. His humor was perverse: he was wit-proof and fun-proof; but at the feeble jest which accompanied it he was tickled with laughing gas. Laughed he ever so loud, he felt he was not laughing at himself, and without gradation; his laugh was a clean spasmodic fug out of Merriment. He resumed his gravity and his thread at command. "Where's the panic she won't look at, for I've tried her; but they tell me there's another sweetmeat come up: which they will it quicker, Sir?"

"Hets! let the poor beasty alone. Life's as sweet tit as tus."

"If you was a gardener, you'd feel for the bulbs, not for the varmin," remonstrated Maxley, rather arrogantly.

* Sampson (edit.). Is the Sternalgia at Baumea, the Diaphragmodynia of Dorvin, the Stenocardia Pectoris of Schmidt, the Syncope Anginosa of Parry, the Cardialgia non-senile stasitica of Heberden, the Angina Pectoris of Cullen, the Stenodynia Syncopalis of Sluis, and the Pungitobia of some other unpiqued philosophers, as Bull, Wilson Philip, Hivin, I forget.

"Mind, Sir, not one of these Arcadian Greeks ever cured a case of Brist-pang. But that is secondary. Scholastic midicine is the remotest thing in nature, and altogether a science; and of not curing 'em, a glorious one.

"Listen a minute, boy: and be as calm you can. In, when a disease defeats the Art, the Art is to blame, and not it, and they in five parishes near their cooperage, and many busy cities, are to blame for their fatalities! Glimmers there one ray of Causation amid all that shallow and partial observation of mere symptoms. In every department of thought there are ninety-nine litle thinkers to one big one: and the few big ones, differing from each other in many things, all agree in one; they are Causationists. They call effects effects, and look deeper for the cause, and are uncomp till they find it. Now, there's the nine hundred and ninety-nine thinkers swallow effect for cause; and, as in Disease effects are numerous, and causes very few, so, in Midicine, believe it, Midicine has found twenty names for Brist-pang, and not a single friend.

"But bein' a man of science, I feel for th' higher organization: Mice are a part of Nature; as much as market-gardeners."

"So he stands; and alders; and doctors."

Sampson appealed: "Jintlemen, here's a pretty pashian: reflects on our hairned profession, and is never content him a guinea for the dog never pays."

"Dow's bet my chaff choke ye, doctor! That wasn't meant for you altogether. So if ye have got a little bit of the cat about you—"

"I'm not a cat-aleptic, my man: I don't go with dith in my pocket, like the surgeons that carry a lancet. And if I had Murder in both pockets, you shouldn't get any. Here's a greedy dog! got a thousand pounds in the bank; and grudges his Healer a guinea, and his mossa a stand-up fight."

"Now, who have been a telling you lies?" inquired Maxley, severely. "My missus, for a farthing. I'm not a thousand pound man: I'm a nine hundred pound man: and it's all safe at Hardie's." Here he went from his roar to his whisper, "I don't hold with Lunnon banks; they be like my missus's eggs: all one outside, and the rotten ones only known by breaking. Well (loud) I be pretty cries, I don't deny it; but (confidentially) my missus beats me. I look her in the eye, and she looks twice at both sides of a halfpenny before she will let him go: and it's her being so close have raised all this here fuss about me. I told her; says I, 'Mistress.—If you would but lean an end of a dip, or a paring of cheese, about your cupboard, she will be thinking that you hungers her so, you drives her afield right on atop o' my roots.' Ah, Sir, you munn't be hard on a poor woman: fat as you be, where should we be, some Christmas-day? Every tub on its own bottom,' says she; 'and you and I ought to keep themselves to themselves, she to the house, and I to the garden;' so be it, says I, 'and by the same token, I'll be off to watch them.' 'Ye' in my garden again, or I'll spoil their chucking and scratching,' says I, 'for I'll twist their dalled necks: ye're not to be trusted.' 'Then,' says she, 'and likewise a turnpike, you and your poultry: be bide in the house, I will, and don't come a scratching o' me!' and with that we had a deposit; and she took one of her pangs; and then I discovered by accident; and that is and the only way if ye quarrel with women folk: they are sworn to get the better of ye by hook or by crook, and sometimes, on a bit of that ere, to quiet this here, as eats me up by the roots and sets my missus and me by the ears."

"Jintlemen, a common pnigotic virum," whispered Alfred to Edward.

Sampson told him angrily to go to a certain great personage.

"Not afore my betters," whispered Mr. Maxley, amit with a sudden respect for etiquette. "Which be now?"

"I'll see ye hanged first, ye miserly old assassin."

"Then I have nothing to thank you for," roared Maxley, and made his adieux, ignoring Edith murderer with the false physician who declined to doctor the foe of his domestic peace and crosses.

"Quite a passage of arms," said Edward.

"Yes," said Mrs. Dodd, "and of bludgeons and things, rather than the polished rapier. What experience I shall from two high practitioned gentlemen! Slops—Potato trap—Sawdust—Dog's meat—Hairsia pas."

She then let them know that she meditated a "dictionary of jargon;" in hopes that its bulk, judged either from the honest citizens, and excite an antijargon league to save the English language, now on the verge of dissolution.

Sampson was pleased with this threat. "Now, that is odd," said he. "What I'm compil'n a vocabulary myself. I call't th' ass-ass-in's bible—dictionary showing by the use of words mouthed and d'exotic phrases, knaves can lead fools b' th' ear t' a silent dith. F'r instance; if I was to th' ear Bull, 'Now Bull, you've had great gash in your arm and let your blood run all in a great pewter dish: you're going with speed my, 'Call another time!' So the professional ass-ass-in words it thus; 'I'll bleed you from a large orifice till symptoms of syncope.' All right, sis John: he's bled from a lar'orifice and dies three days after of th' assassin's knife hid in the sheath d'pewter dish. But I'll blow the gaff with my dickithnary."

"Meantime there is another contribution to make," said Mrs. Dodd.

And they agreed in the gayety of their hearts to compare their rival Lexicons.

CHAPTER XV.

THEY got to the wounded captain, and raised him: he revived a little: and, the moment he recognized Mrs. Dodd, he clutched him, and cried, "Stunsels!"

"Oh, captain," said Sharpe, "let the ship go: it is you we are anxious for now."

At this Dodd lifted up his hands and beat the air impatiently, and cried again in the thin, querulous, voice of a wounded man, but eagerly, "STUNSELS! STUNSELS!"

On this, Sharpe gave the command. "Set top-gallant stunsels! All hands set stunsels 'low and aloft!"

While the unwounded hands swarmed into the rigging, the surgeon came aft in all haste: but Dodd declined him till all his men should have been looked to: meantime he had himself carried to the poop and laid on a mattress, his bleeding head bound tight with a wet camric handkerchief, and his pale face turned toward the hostile schooner astern. She had hove to, and was picking up the survivors of her blotted-out consort. The group on the Agra's quarter-deck watched her to see what she would do next: flushed with immediate success the younger officers crowed their fears she would not be game to attack them again; Dodd's fears ran the other way: he said, in the weak voice to which he was now reduced, "they are taking a wet blanket aboard; that crew of blackguards we swamped won't want any more of us: it all depends on the pirate captain: if he is not drowned, then blow wind, fine sea: or there's trouble ahead for us."

As soon as the schooner had picked up the last swimmer, she hoisted foresail, mainsail, and jib, with admirable rapidity, and bore down in chase.

The Agra had, meantime, got a start of more than a mile, and was now running before a stiff breeze with studding sails alow and aloft.

In an hour the vessels ran nearly twelve miles, and the pirate gained hand over hand.

At the end of the next hour they were out of sight of land; wind and sea rising; and the pirate only a quarter of a mile astern.

The schooner was now rising and falling on the waves; the ship only nodding, and fim as a rock.

"Blow wind, rise sea!" faltered Dodd.

Another hour passed without perceptibly altering the position of the vessels. Then, suddenly the wounded captain laid aside his glass, gave a long sweet exhalation, and rose unaided, to his feet in great excitement, and found his manly voice for a moment; he shook his fist at the now gaining schooner, and roared, "Dead ay! ye Portuguese lubber: outfought—outmanoeuvred—AND OUTSAILED!"

Such a burst of exultation was rare for him; he paid for it by sinking faint and helpless into his friend's arms, and the surgeon, returning soon after, insisted on his being taken to his berth, and kept quite quiet.

As they were carrying him below the pirate captain made the same discovery; that the ship was gaining on him: he bore up directly, and abandoned the chase.

CHAPTER XVI.

WHEN the more receding pirate was nearly hull down, the men began to eat. Alfred looked at him, and said, "Hallo! old fellow, what are you about? Why don't you turn to?"

"Because you're hungry, Sir," answered Edward, for a moment, that oth was mistaken and would keep himself—contented himself—with—however, the widdy proved to be wrong, and the sun right to a minute: Time flies fast, fighting.

Rolleaux came on deck with a pot and a poodle: Fred, a destructive child, clapped his hands with glee at the holes in the canvas: Snap bobbed about among the wheels of the dinn, and nagging his tail by halves: perplexed. "Well, gentlemen," said Mrs. Beresford, "I hope you have got enough to eat, enough over and to spare, and what a time you did take to beat that little bit of a thing: Freddy, be quiet; you were to; when is your bearer? will any body oblige me by finding Hamgalom?"

"Here, Sir," said Mr. Tickell, hastily, and ran off for the purpose; but he returned after some time with a long face. No Hamgalom to be found.

Fullalove referred her—with humor-twinkling eye—to Vespasian. "I have a friend here who says he can explain you something about him."

"Can you, my good man?" inquired the lady, turning haughtily toward the negro.

"Lor, Missis," said Vespasian, showing his white teeth in a broad grin, "dis child knows dat Hamgalom is de nigger, widout him been and shqustalised since."

"Then go and fetch him directly."

Vespasian went off with a consultant start.

This annoyed Fullalove; interfered with his system: "Madam," said he, gravely, "would you oblige me by attending to my friend on a portion of that courtesy with which you favor me, and which becomes you so gracefully?"

"Certainly," replied Mrs. Beresford. "Mr. Fullalove, I am out of patience with you: the idea of a sensible intelligent gentleman, like you, allowing that ridiculous spiritualist and an American; where they do nothing but whip them into mountain high, and make a fortune by making friends with a black? Now what is the meaning of this? I detest practical jokes." For the unabated temper had remained, lighted a tall bread bag in his arms: he now set it up before her, remarking, "Da yar bag white outside, but plain nation black inside." And, with this note, he drew off the bag, and revealed Hamgalom, his black skin powdered with meal. "A good-looking man, that," said Mr. Tickell, aside.

Hamgalom had taken the day off his head, and with it his dignity, while the African one dusted him; but, being dusted, he put on his obsequiousness, stepped forward, and bowed his acknowledgments to Mrs. Beresford—like medieval knights and modern children at their devotions—and addressed her thus:

"Daughter of light, he who basks se your beam, shall not be devoured," (The pirates are not as those children of blood, whom Sheitan their master, blast for ever! They will ravish the beam of Sheitan and his angels, and throw the ashibs and sailors into the sea; but, bread being the staff of existence, these foxes of the water will not have it; but keep it for their native appetites; therefore Hamgalom, Son of Chittroo, Son of Seemaraun, will put the finger of silence on the lip of discretion, and be bread in the day of adversity: the sons of Sheitan will perdeventure return to day land, and close the eye of watchfulness; then will I emerge like the sun from a cloud; and depart in peace.'"

"Oh, very well!" said Mrs. Beresford, "then you are an abominable egotist, that is all: and a coward: and thank Heaven Freddy and I were defended by English: and Americans, and—hem!—their friends; and not by Hindoos." She added, charmingly, "This shows me my first words on coming here ought to have been to offer my warmest thanks to the brave men who have defended me and my child!" and swept them so queenly a courtesy, that the men's hats and caps flew off in an instant. "Mr. Black," said she, turning with a voice of honey to Vespasian, but aiming obliquely at Fullalove's heart, "would you oblige me by kicking that dog a little? he is always smelling what does not belong to him; why it is blood; oh!" and she turned pale in a moment.

Sharpe thought some excuse necessary. "You see, ma'am, we haven't had time to clean the decks since."

"It is the blood of men; of the poor fellows who have defended us so nobly!" faltered the lady, trembling visibly.

"Well, ma'am," said Sharpe, still half apologetically, "you know a ship can't fight all day long without an accident or two." He added with nautical simplicity, and love of cleanliness, "However, the deck will be cleaned, and holystoned, to-morrow, long before you turn out."

Mrs. Bernsford was too much overcome to explain how much rather her emotion was than a dislike to stained floors. She turned faint, and on getting the better of that, went down to her cabin crying. Theresa issued a spirited order that the wounded were to have wine and every luxury they could fancy, without limit or stint; at her expense.

The next day a deep gloom reigned in the ship: the crew were ranged in their divisions, clothes, and bare-headed; a grating was rigged; Sharpe read the burial-service; and the dead, each man sewed up in his hammock with a round shot, glided off the grating into the sea with a sullen plunge; while their shipmates cried or, that is, mean-looked on the deck.

With these regrets for the slain, too violent to last, were mingled a gloomy fear that Death had a better prey in store. The surgeon in the port of Captain Dold was most alarming; he had become delirious about midnight; and so continued.

Sharpe commanded the ship; and the rough sailors respect the man over that part of the deck, beneath which their unconscious captain lay. If two men met on the quarter-deck, a look of anxiety, but not hopeful, inquiry, was sure to pass between them.

Among the constant inquirers was Rongalan. The grave Italian from waylaid the surgeon on the captain's door, to get the first intelligence. This marked sympathy with a hero in extremity was highly gratifying from a negro, who at the first note of war's trumpet had vanished in a mud-fog. Rongalan, a rival in love to Sharpe! He exploded in one of those droll rages darkeys seem liable to: "Massa caunel," said he, "what for dat yer nigger always jaw'ing about de cap'n's door? What for he ask, so many stupid questions? Dat ole fox arter no good; him heart no bigger as um skin: dam old pig-nigger!"

Fullalove suggested slyly that a person with a dark skin might have a grateful feeling for the colonel, who dealt little in innuendo, said, "Come, don't you be so hard on jet; you shouy!"

"Bery well, gemmun," replied Vespasian, ceremoniously, and with seeming acquiescence. Then, with sudden fury, "Because Gineral wants to make you white, you think you bery wise without any more trouble. Dat an nigger as an abomunable egotist."

"Pray what does that mean?" inquired Kenealy, mildly.

"What him mean? what him mean? Yah! yah!"

"Yes. What does it mean?"

"What him mean? Yah! What, dinna you hear Missy Bedford miscall him an abommable egotist?"

"Yes," said Fullalove, winking to Kenealy; "but we don't know what it means. Do you, Sir?"

"Iss, Sat. Dat ar expression he signify a darned old cuss dat says to die child," My lord Vespasian, who benevolence on your insidious slave, and invest me in a bread bag, instead of fighting for de white like a freemunbodied citizen. Now you two go fast asleep, dis child he shut one eye and open de oder bery wide open on dat ar signal." And with the mysterious threat he stalked away.

His contempt for a black skin, his abolitions of unexpressed hate, his turgid pomposity, and love of long terms, may make the reader smile; but they could hardly amuse the fellow-sufferers in every thing that touched upon Dodd was too serious now. The surgeon sat up with him nearly all night, and by day time these men could not eat for hours in his cabin, watching sadly, and silently moistening his burning brow and his parched lips.

At length, one afternoon, there came a crisis, which took an unfavorable turn. Then the surgeon, speaking confidentially to these two staunch friends, inquired if they had asked themselves what should be done with the body?

"Why I ask," said he, "we are in a very hot latitude; and, if you wish to convey it to Harlington, the measures ought to be taken at once; in fact, within an hour or two after death."

The poor friends were shocked and sickened by this horrible piece of foresight. But Colonel Kenealy said, with tears in his eyes, that his old friend should never be buried like a kitten.

"Then you had better ask Sharpe to give me an order for a barrel of spirits," said the surgeon.

"Yes, yes, for two if you like. Oh don't die, Dodd, my poor old fellow. How shall I ever face his wife—I remember her, the loveliest girl you ever saw—with such a tale as this? She will think it a cruel thing I should come out of it without a scratch, and a ten times better man to be dead: and so it is; it is cruel, it is unjust, it is monstrous; him to be lying there, all we muffs to be sitting croaking over him and watching for his last breath like three old women at a wake." And the stout colonel groaned aloud.

When the surgeon left them they felt natural rigb upon another topic: the pledge they had given Dodd about the £14,000. They ascertained it was upon him: next his skin: but it seemed an awful matter to come between him and remove it from his living person. They agreed, however, that instantly on his decease they would take possession of it, seal the packet, and put it up, and carry it to Mrs. Dodd, with such comfort as they could offer her. Then, after relating the gallant act in which his precious life was lost.

At nine P.M. the surgeon took his place by Dodd's bedside; and the pair, whom one thing after another had drawn so close together, retired to Kenealy's cabin.

Many a merry chat they had had there: and many a guacamole; being rival hunters: but now they were together for spiritual companionship in sorrow, rather than for conversation. They smoked their cigars in moody silence; and at midnight the latter handed a pipe and patted. That sigh meant to say that in the morning all would be over.

They turned in, but, ere either of them was asleep, suddenly the captain's cabin seemed to be filled with wild words, and wilder cries, that made the whole ship ring in the silent night. The savage cries were answered on deck by shouts of dismay and many a hollow groan, and instantly the companion ladder: but the nearest persons to the cabin, and the first to reach it, were Kenealy and Fullalove, who burst in, the former with a drawn sword, the latter with a revolver, both in their night gowns; and there saw a sight that took their breath away.

The surgeon was not there: and two black men, one with a knife, one with a pair of saws, were fighting, and struggling, and trampling all over the cabin at once, and the dying man sitting up in his cot, pale, and glaring at them.

HAXA BELL.

SOMETIMES I take from the post-office a scanty news-sheet sent from New England to Illinois. It keeps me the many and many years of life in the rough little town where lives its sender, my cousin. This cousin (he is much my senior) once was a country boy, and remembers me as a little boy by impressive declamation concerning "schoolhouses, and books, and writing-paper in grit, patterns to set by." Which meant by writing-paper, paper to write on.

And this is how I come to know my cousin, and why he sends me the paper, and I read it, particularly the deaths and marriage record, and so write what is coming; for last night I read this:

"In Hookburn, on the 6th inst. Haxa Bell, aged 98."

It is a fact long since I learned that my Haxa was the oldest girl in school. She had such a bleak time of it in life, and doubtless left behind her cold scarcely a warm friend, that I thought it would be a kind thing to heap a little mound for her, warm from this pitying retrospect which I have had power to form. And I begin with the starry hopes I would plant there for June's sweet and tearful grass.

We go to see fretted, harassed creatures in the stenched circle of the menagerie—the worn tiger, the demented lioness—and go flinging away to forget the forlorn craving of eye, the begging droop of body. In the street every day we pass caged, ripped souls, with stonily stare from cross parched eyes, and we rarely take note. But at least one such soul I have noted and remembered. The human world you have known, with its many thoughtless, proud as I. If some dumb animal, caged for your pleasure, should be condemned for food, and you had none to give, a pity deep as the creature's need would etch the action on your memory. Haxa Bell was the human creature I noted—asked me, in the masked beseeching I came at last to recognize, to then her life. There I see in the smoking fire, all gay company gone to bed, the words of old vintage smack, forsooth, too thick with meaning for jovial youth. Begone! No jeers at this hearth! Here the tartan cannot be told at.

Of the thirty indigenous woolen bundles found by me, in a rough and ready count of chilled lives over a green wood fire, on that raw December morning when I first entered my twelve-by-twelve educational kingdom, I was the only possessor by any softening of heart on the part of the master. All were well-jointed specimens, well fed, warmly clad, tough as the rocks, and the hillsides of their thievous fun as those same rocks bubbled merry streams.

The seethe and simmer of school-room study was well ageing when the door opened for tardy comers whose entrance was announced by the long walk and snow-drift struggles. They were two, Haxa Bell and her little brother Wip. She placed the boy on a bench by the door, to dry and bestuff chose a seat without stopping for the stove's warmth. She folded a thin red shawl somewhat closer about her at the wind's keen thrust from a sheathing crack in the wall, put her reader and speller on the desk before her, and sat waiting and looking at me. I assigned her lessons with finger pointing to the page over which she drooped, but with eye seaming close a face older in its lines than her stunted form warranted. Seemingly to prevent my mistaken estimate of her knowledge, she said, in reply to my question concerning her classes, "I'm nothin' quick, Suh, at my book; mebbe you'll put me with Betsy Jones, but she's higher'n me. I reads with Wip."

I further studied my late comers in leisure moments that day. "Umph! poverty sprouts, usual town-beggars necessary to keep home-charity alive," I thought, and glanced from the shrunken look of the girl to the less nipped boy by the fire. "So far he has fared better than she; some of childhood's yoke left in him yet, thanks to her, no doubt." Then I looked at the girl again. Hair coarse and crisp crept low on a forehead nearly distended with thought. Even in the morning west-eyes mongrel gray, retreating in parrying glances, till the more observant eyes stopped them, caught and left them concealed in their bleared burrows; bloodless cheeks, and lips gnarled and withered by pain, and by the cold and hunger-nipped looks of tree-roots, violet-forsaken by dried water-courses. I detected nothing uncommon, one of the ordinary weeds of humanity fated to soil unusually sterile. She did not even excite my interest by any noteworthy diligence; indeed, was rather listless, watching Wip braid his tipped fringe, eying the dusty whirls of snow at the window, or staring vacantly at the newcomers in the class. The cold torpor of her manner was disturbed that day but by a single action. A sudden broadside of the mountain wind shook the windows of the little house, and loosened the stove-pipe from its wire supports. The soot sifted out, and no large boys being present to aid me, I was obliged to use my hands up to refit the joint. She started up with the words, "Master, yer hands are white!" and before I understood her movement, had caught my left wrist, and had forced the blackened parts together. In some confusion of mind I felt that from her eye alone of the whole class was I not escaped, and resume her seat.

I believe as the winter passed on I tried to be kinder to Haxa, and that she did take pity at last slow progress. I never inquired concerning her home affairs, but in my hearing remarks were dropped about her father's drunken habits; her younger brother and sister, cold, rags, and hunger. So for all these ills I would fain have given the weak scintilla of help, a new hope or emotion. I did not believe the child was wholly numb to her situation. I saw only hopeless and passive. And as hope lifts many a wretch from Hades, that arc did habituate I would be to aid her. Had she given evidence of improvement, any signs of mental germination, I should never have dropped such frequent kind words. But a stolidity so permanent was too painful to see in any human being.

One mid-winter's night of clear moon and spicular air, the wind was still, and the trees transparent stinging every nerve into acute but pleasurable sensations, my cousin's family and myself were at a concert and lecture lecture in the village. We had passed the school-house, the strip of level at the foot of the hill, and were, said our loud began to creak up the long hill while the sleigh-bells settled themselves to a slower jangle and I once more thought of Haxa, when I wanted the sleigh with a leap and the words, "The hill is long, I'll walk up." The cause of this movement was the appearance of a little figure dragging a load of scraggy fagots through a field that bordered the road—I recognized Haxa Bell. She was not far from the hill, and halted under the lee of a scathed pine pollard. I knew she lived just ahead, at the top of the hill, and hilarity would as soon have let me pass unaided the daintiest lady alive. I went to her. She looked up startled by my voice: "Haxa, child, why never makes this hard for you?" and I took a strong hold of the rope which she now hastily began to pull.

"Yis, Suh," she said, and missed the old track. Yet right kind, master, but ye needn't 'a come. Nobody ever helped me afore."

We were in the hill now. She looked up the hill and said, "They've gained on ye; ye'd been leave me and run on."

She looked pleased at my answer. "No, I'll help you up the hill. They will wait for me at the top."

At school Haxa never spoke to me but when occasion required. Now she seemed anxious to show me her sense of kindness by talk of some sort. She began immediately.

"Father's bad to-night, and couldn't go for wood, and we was all out, and cr I'd a wouldn't 'a mornin'. The children has colds, too, and mebbe'll need a fire to-night."

She looked up at me, straining her thin arm in its hold upon the load, and something of my deep compassion must have saturated my voice, for she said, "It's a hard life you lead, Haxa; I wish things might take a better turn."

Her answer was a sigh. "But I'm used to't. Mebbe father'll do better bimeby, and Wip is growin' big—he'll help a lot. The neighbors say he'll have a good farm. I'll come to more'n ye in the world." The sister's hopes and meagre dreams were all for the boy Wip.

"Are you coming to-night at school, Haxa," I said. She looked up with a broken, fleeting expression, a shattered smile which I did not expect to produce: "No, I can't. I'm tired." The baby's bed was but I'll try an' come soon."

We had reached the summit of the hill and was waiting for me. I hurried on to the shanty whose comforters she manifested a pressing desire to get to, and which proceeded. I took her chill hand, "Good-night, Haxa!"

"Good-night, master!"

What did I do? Was this poor, forlorn soul so unaccustomed to kind words that her affections sprung up like hepatica in the snow if it did but reflect no rays. The more shame to him who plays with hearts brazen-doowered with sweet bud-bait by their very nature open to fragrant blossoms at the first fancied call.

The last day of my school approached. On the night before I covered the coals in the cracked, rheumatic stove, locked the door, put the key on the entry shelf, and stood for a moment on the door-step to stealthily forecash the spirit of freedom that blew at me from out the south. My winter's work had been marrow-destroying drudgery. I determined to wash my hands of such forever. A thaw of several days had seamed the river's ice, now a roughened pavement that stretched through the valley, under the bridge, and past the schoolhouse. The snow was sunken and discolored. The winter looked wan. Sky and wind were very indeterminate, moody, out of sorts. Finally, it decided to be cold. Fringes of mist netted my face like cobwebs as I picked my way through the slush to my cousin's. A slip-shod, debilitated drizzle set in with the night, and I, and its peevish murmur one of the night through.

It still rained in the morning. "There's a smart chance of your finding the river broken up and the meadows full this side of the bridge," said my cousin as I started for school. So I thought; and as the river now lay between me and the school-house it was possible my winter's work was even now finished. In passing Haxa's house I saw no stir but the sickly wriggle of a slender smoke-wreath from the chimney. Presently I came to a bight of the meadows, the river, the bridge, and, beyond, a little pile of blackened, huddled ruins, the chimney rose, rocking with no safe steam, of my old school-house! Good Yankee grit the decrepit shell evinced, if burn it must, to burn in spite of sodden weather and rain falling. There was no stir about. The nearest houses were behind the hills, half a mile away. Evidently nobody but witnessed the death-agony of the lonely, used-up idea-mill, the faithful, rough old friend of tow-heads innumerable. With much difficulty and some labor I slid, climbed, and jumped my way over the jostling ice cakes which crowded in the swollen flood the road, and leaned hard against the bridge. With wet cheek and a brain or two I reached the other side and the schoolground. I had been mistaken; the place was not wholly deserted. A bedraggled, sooty spectre crouched among the steaming brands—the visible species of Haxa. I pursued an eclectic course through the hissing, gasping ashes, and approached the embodiment of desolation.

"Haxa Bell!" I said, "what does this mean? Did you set it on fire?"

The spectre did not move, but answered with the familiar shimmer of a smile:

"Most like ye'd think so, but I loved it too well, master! I only rubbed a stool of some pain."

"Yes, indeed; and so rainy too. How came you here?"

Then, still sifting there in the ashes, she told me. She could not sleep for fear the ice would break, and the river would flood the road, and stop her from school. She had risen at the past midnight she got up and came down to see. The light of the burning house flared up through the fog, and she watched the last sparks and the smoky flames were crawling over it all. She determined to get to it in the ice, and she had. She ventured inside the flames once, but cleared only one desk of its contents. Then she dried herself by the lessening fire, and afterward found a warm place to sit in the ashes.

"What do you keep so cheerfully wrapped under your shawl?" I inquired.

She slowly unfolded the thin garment, safely shielding what was under from the rain. My pot-folio, my books, and maps, Haxa! my! this was my desk she had visited!

"Nothin' else is saved, master."

I did not take up the things at once; I was too touched by her deed for me. I must have spoken tenderly—"Haxa, you kind girl, I have no words to thank you."

"No need, Suh. Ye know now that I've sensed yer kindness, an' leastwise ain't forgettin'."

We talked a little while. I gave her a book, and buttoned the rest of my saved property under my over-coat. Then I said,

"You'd better go home now, Haxa. If you wait perhaps you can not come to the ice. I will go over the hill the other way to Mr. Bland's."

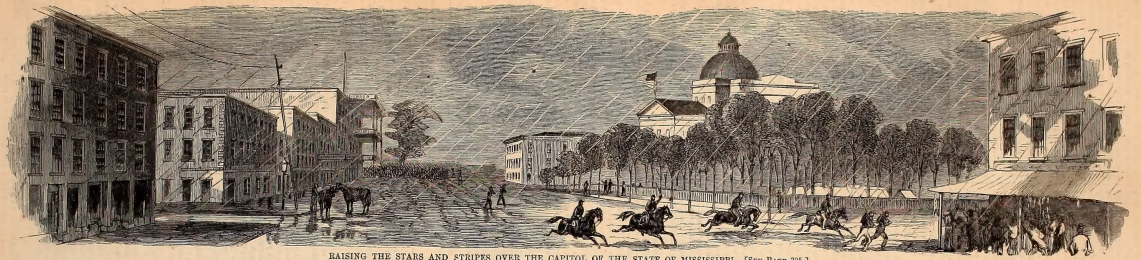
She slowly stood up, and put her hand heavily in the one I offered.

"Mebbe ye'll never come this way again, master?"

"Very likely not. I shall remember you, Haxa."

"Folks is more like yerself down there, ain't they?" she asked, nodding southward.

"Perhaps. Would you like to see them?"



Her eyelids were heavy; I could not see under them. All the weight was set now in a white, lifeless fixity. She muttered "It's no use," and said good-by without looking at me again. I watched her all the way across the ice, and out of sight. She never looked back.

Thank God that somewhere and sometime all hunger shall be satisfied, all craving met by perfect supply! And as the last starvation shrunk and faint life yields, and God's kiss be the balmy benediction upon mated love.

THE GREAT CANAL CONVENTION.

On page 385 we reproduce a sketch—kindly sent us from Chicago—representing the MONSTER TENT erected for the accommodation of the GREAT CANAL CONVENTION, which assembled in that city last week to consider the needs of the Northwest in the shape of big canals. The reporter of the Chicago Tribune, writing before the Convention met, thus described the tent:

The tent is now in thorough readiness for the purpose of the Convention, and it is believed will comfortably accommodate all who attend. It is octagonal in form, 90 x 90 feet in extent, and will seat about 4000 people. The speakers' platform, 32x40 in size, occupies the centre of the east side, the floor for the press sittings a raised platform immediately in front of the speaker's, and accommodating twenty reporters. There are five rows of seats running north and south, so arranged as to bring all within good hearing distance of the stand.

LAWRENCE'S ENLISTMENT.

I.

THERE was a war-meeting in Mooreville. Bill Ran had been fought and lost, and the old Anglican spirit had been roused into that enthusiasm which seems more easily excited by a defeat than by a victory. With a sense of the wrong done to their own manliness, the men of the North sprang to arms to set things right; and each man felt an individual interest in the rescue of the nation from the disgrace brought upon her arms. So in this little town man after man came forward this evening, and registered his name upon the roll of the recruiting officer, among the cheers of his companions, and the approving smiles which struggled through the eyes of women. It were unfair to scrutinize the under-current of motives which combined to produce that great swell of patriotic emotion; but with imperfect creatures like men we can give due credit for the set, and yet acknowledge other elements in the impure residue the one single sentiment which all professed, and probably at the time honestly felt. So, when Lawrence Moore dashed down his name as a recruit, it may, without putting him outside the pale of honorable young men, be confessed that he was cherishing several secret fancies. There was a little personal vanity seeking to appropriate some of the applause lavished upon others. There was the notion that a man of his manly instincts rose to that military distinction which to young men appears the highest peak of earthly honor. There was a little weariness of the humdrum routine of ordinary business, and the desire to try a new life, which from a distance seemed full of excitement and pleasurable adventure. And there was especially the consciousness that many bright eyes were looking on, to which this act would appear purely noble and self-sacrificing. All these feelings mingled themselves with the impulse to do something for the nation which was stirring in his heart, frivolous and volatile as may appear the surrounding elements. Finally, there was also a genuine patriotic sympathy which is experienced in all large assemblies, to the influence of which he was constitutionally very open, and which in facts may be traced in many of the incidents hereafter to be narrated.

He went home to his seat with a proud look upon his face, which brightened still more as it saw the kindling flash upon the cheek of a young girl, whose light eyes met his for a moment as she made room for him beside her. Thus he sat down with a particular direction given to his emotions, a feeling of personal sympathy with Ellen Kate. As the meeting dissolved, and they by degrees got disentangled from the multitude, he was glad to find that the way to her home was almost solitary, a few persons already far in advance being all that stirred the air. Thinking of her timid look and of momentary tenderness, Lawrence's arm drew the little hand that rested on it closer to his side; and in response to the pressure it came upon a slight answering pressure. He looked down, but could only see the soft rounding of her cheek emerging faintly from a mass of delicate ringlets which her head was covered. What need is there of further detail on such an oft-told story? Lawrence had ever before felt more than that natural fancy for one another which springs up between most nice commonplace young people; but here was present both very impressionable, both thinking and feeling together under the influence of the evening's incidents and that quiet starlit atmosphere. So they felt that they were in love, and told each other so, producing something of the reality of affection by the very declaration. Thus they drew closer and closer together in youth's dream, of what futurity seems even such solemn scenes, the pledged union of two hearts for this life and that to come! How many men and women have stolen their happiness in just such careless youthful hours!

Lawrence went home full of happy, boyish visions. Thoughts of glorious achievements mixed with pictures of a charming home with a most little inmate enlivening the passing hours, where he would sit with an admiring company around listening to the modest recital of the manner in which he was to have borne so great a part. In this glow of imagination, with sparkling eye and lofty tread, he entered into the quiet room where sat his parents and a distant relative who had grown up as his cousin. He did not feel that it was such a task as he had fancied it would be to tell them of the step that he had taken; and his enthusiasm sank several degrees as he noticed the grave expression on his father's face, the sudden paleness of his mother's cheek, the quick start of his gentle cousin. It was going to feel like that to a rejected suitor, "why they had not been informed of the design?" was but just and proper; and it diminished the dignity of the action to have to confess that it was done on the impulse of the moment. The task still lower in its scale of merit when his father began to display to him the inconvenience which would result from his sudden withdrawal from the business upon which he had entered; and though there was comfort in the words with which the woman rejoined, acknowledging the obligation to serve the country as before all others, yet even his father's acquiescence in their truth could not prevent him from seeing that there was something selfishly inconsiderate in his hasty conduct. So not a word was breathed as to his love engagement, even to his cousin, who had often been his confidante. Indeed, now that the excitement was over, he began to feel a vague doubt as to the wisdom of that engagement, and his thought of his cousin even made him question the depth of his love for Kate. He was getting into that depressed condition of mind when every thing appears in its darkest hues; so he went quickly to bed, only to toss about sleeplessly, disturbed by the constant mental iteration of all the annoying motions that had taken advantage of the reaction of his spirits to seize upon his thoughts.

By the next morning, however, the buoyancy of his spirits had returned, and he felt ready to let things take their course. Still it was not with all the alacrity of a lover that he started to pay a visit to Kate. She, too, may have had her misgivings the night before; for though at their meeting both lost all other considerations in the sweet novelty of their new relation, it appeared that she had kept the secret of their mutual vows as closely as he had himself. So it in some way became tacitly understood that there was to be no announcement of the fact at all for the present; and that the future should be allowed to take care of itself. Perhaps Kate was not sorry for this reticence when Lawrence came in uniform to bid her farewell; for though while talking to him he was out of any dignity to the attire, yet when he entered, and as he departed, the coarse cavalry jacket and light blue trowsers seemed to invest him with a halo both in the eyes of this amiable but shallow girl. So Lawrence Moore went to Washington, and became one among a thousand private in the same regiment, on the same level with them all in the eyes of every one but himself.

II.

VERY different was soldiering in practice from what it had seemed to his imagination. He did not find that riding a horse and wearing a sword were his principal duties. He was more than all Prussian disciplinarian who commanded them the responsibility of keeping arms and horse in proper condition was a burdensome toil to these young men, and even the officers led any thing but an easy life. The first two or three months of Lawrence's enlistment were passed in a perfect thunder-storm of curses; and though, after the initiation was over, there was more room for enjoyment in doing well what had grown into a habit, still there was no romance in being a sort of military scullery-boy. Then came the monotony of drill did him and all of them far more good than harm. They became manly, hardy, ready with their hands and arms. Their spirits began to rise on them with a different air, and to show to advantage their well-developed, active frames. The consequence was that the mood affected Lawrence most disagreeably. His companions were so very different from that to which he was used, their manners, talk, were so strangely coarse and repulsive. Brought to within the influences of home refinement and intelligence, the oaths, the obscene and profane ribaldry which amused the others jarred upon his nerves. If he had been a different man, a hero in no telling how severe a school, he would improved those with whom he was immediately connected; but, being of a disposition rather to catch the tone of others than to impress his own, he slowly began to imbibe their characteristics and to assume them. Then there was but a commonplace character, a little more quick than others to catch the prevailing influences around him; and the same thing will be true of every person who as a soldier caused his thoughts to degenerate as a man.

So things went on until one day when his company was out scouring the country on the left of the fortifications around Washington. It was a dreary region of bad roads, uncultivated fields, and thick, tangled woods. What houses there had been were deserted, and many of them had been burnt down by the reckless soldiery of both parties, who divided the country between them. Here and there were certain passes notorious for bloody skirmishes and sudden surprises, and the inexperienced troopers were very nervous and apprehensive about secret ambushes. All at once, at one of the most unpleasant defiles, there came an alarm. Horsemen were seen riding toward them, and the advance party appeared upon the flank. There was a pause among the men. One caught the contagion from another, and, with a fainting heart, Lawrence felt the most of the troop turned and galloped to the rear. There was not even opportunity to resist. Experience had painted to himself in the imagination of his military career; but the reality affected him very differently from what he had fancied. It was any intention of doing well, without any special sense of fear, he found himself drifting along with the rest, bearing the panic with the rest, and with them to support the assault. A feeling of shame seized him and some of the others simultaneously. They formed back and began to rally their steps, but much more slowly than they had retreated. They were all ashamed of it when they heard hearty laughter, and they only rejoined the expedition to see BEN, reddened with mortification, escorted by a party bearing the prisoners and all their own regiment. The story was too good to keep quiet. The two lieutenants who had joined the flight were obliged to tell it, and the men, although Lawrence's return served to save him some of his self-respect, it did not obviate the necessity of his sustaining his word as a man of honor. A mild but stood firm, not unable him to escape the rails opens of some of the more malicious. Yet the first shock did him good. His eyes began to open to the great defect of his character, and Private Moore became more of a man and more of a soldier than he had been as citizen or sergeant.

All this time the engagement kept its secret life, now and then brightened by a letter. And now Kate Clare came to Washington to enjoy a little of the gayety brought there by the army, while her father was seeking a share in the contracts given by the same cause. The city was full of officers and soldiers, and a number of shoulder-straps throwing private soldiers far into the back-ground. Kate heard on every side talk of Generals, Colonels, Captains, while the men in ranks were spoken of generally as rather social nuisances than otherwise. Thus the idea of Lawrence Moore began to lose its lustre, and soon faded from her thoughts, except when accidentally presented to her. Still more was this the case after the introduction to Captain Graham, the commander of the Mooreville troop. He was a dashing young fellow, brave, without very great strength of head or depth of heart, but with sufficient of both to set off to advantage a neat uniform. By degrees he and she drifted into a flirtation. They found pleasure in each other's society, and filled up in fancy all the deficiencies that might exist in either when viewed by disenchanted eyes. One day as they were sitting together, neither desiring interruption, the door opened and Lawrence Moore walked in. There was a blush upon Kate's face, and an awkwardness in her manner which seemed to be overlooked; and Lawrence was equally embarrassed and ill at ease in the presence of his commander. He could scarcely summon up resolution to sit down, and did not venture to engage in the conversation beyond the first commonplace inquiries. The Captain did not help him. He was in any special humor, and he rather resented the intrusion of one of his men into the society which he frequented, and quickly perceived in the man the talk that Lawrence was so much disregarded as if he were not in the room. So as soon as he could recover presence of mind, Moore did the only thing possible; rising to take leave. His adieux were received with an effort at politeness on the part of Kate, which was more chilling than rudeness itself; while the Captain did nothing beyond giving a military recognition to the military salute. So Lawrence Moore went away, his vanity and self-respect both wounded, and certain that he had lost her to whom he had offered love, and that he was surprising how little he felt the last. At first he carried the pain of the blow deeply into that account, as being the most dignified; but as the days went by he began to feel rather relieved than otherwise. He sent back her letters and those of which she was the end of the engagement. After he had taken them from his pocket, inclosed and mailed them, he joined some of his comrades in a "spree," treating the fellows as soldiers do, and rejoiced at getting back to camp in time for roll-call, and without any difficulty with the officer on guard.

Then he began to think, a habit which he had first formed when he had been reduced to the ranks, and which now he rapidly doing him good. He decided that he had been thoughtless and foolish in the proceedings of his enlistment night, and that the folly which he committed then he had since gradually developed, until he found himself with little credit in his present position. He had been deceitful pretended love, which had been, without benefiting itself, standing between him and the rightful claims here upon him. He began now to think of his parents and his home, as in his careless self-engrossment he had not done hitherto, with that tenderness which the memory of early memories great purifiers and strengtheners of a man's nature when thrown into a foreign sphere under very different influences. As he began to do so drew out a letter from his cousin Lizzie, which he had before but glanced over carelessly while on his way to Kate. Now as he read it over, he found not but feel its unconscious revelation of a character such as he had not before seen in those of whose whom she loved—a love which quickened her perception in helping or comforting its objects; a cheerful spirit which exerted itself with the utmost of to-day, together with a high religious trust that realized that God's to-morrow would be good enough for her—blessed, at any rate, should her sleep it. Then, as he did not see, there was perhaps in the letter very little to interest any one but the person for him; an instinctive confidence tempered with unconscious modidity reserve; an ascription to him of the qualities which he knew to be his ideal of excellence; an assumption that his actions were guided by the same high principle which controlled her own. But there was in the tone which awakened in him a sentiment for the writer which had long been dormant. As he thought with shame how much he had lost in character although gained to him, his heart dwelt tenderly upon her who so esteemed him; and there rose up in his soul a determination to become more like this ideal character, and to try and deserve a good opinion, which to such innocent eyes had a higher value in his own. It was a good sign that he did not think that he was in love with Lizzie. The feeling associated with Kate Clare was very different from this. It here was the beginning of a true love, which might elevate his character in a greater degree than it had been lowered by the first frivolous affection.

III.

THE quiet of the camp had been broken. Below the picket line, on the Rappahannock, a small trading-shop had been set up by the sutler's men, and this was drifting where where it might be plundered. The troopers came swarming out with the picket-guard, and, without fear or defense, the officers of the post were hastily consulting together.

Suddenly a small skiff with two or three men on board of them was seen to shoot from the bank a hail of rifle-shot from the Mississippi regiment who held the opposite shore, it kept on its way. Presently the men were seen on board the sloop. Snatching the tiller from the grasp of the wounded man who crouched beside it, the leader of the party altered the course, giving his orders promptly and sharply to those who manned the sheets; and in ten minutes the little craft rounded to in a little cove, protected from the enemy's fire. The leader quietly handed over the vessel to the colonel, and, saluting a sailor's salute, he and his men then promoted on the spot to a high place on the non-commissioned staff. It was Lawrence Moore, who had followed the example of his comrades in running away, who now set them this good example of high daring and individual bravery. The change had not been so very rapid. It was six months since the other affair had taken place, and with many a falling back had his advance been checkered. To one so impressible as he it had at first seemed easy to become steady, brave, and religious. He had attempted a great deal more than he could perform, and had even spoken out his resolutions. Then, time and again, when he had been weak and relapsed, he had had to endure the laughter of his comrades, most discouraging of all things to a sympathetic temperament. But after such trouble, as if by the ordering of Providence, there had come a letter reviving the spirit that was on the point of dying out; and he was slowly not only forming himself but making his mark upon his comrades. Those who gathered around him began to catch his tone and spirit, and when he sprang forward to take the lead in any thing they took, one impulse followed. He found that by being conscious what he was doing, he became an important element in the military character of the regiment. He observed old soldiers at last that was not slow to mark this; and the promotion, which amounts to every thing in the ranks of a militia, was really the result of many weeks of observation.

And now military events began to come thick and fast upon each other's heels. Long, swift marches day after day, with little food and less repose. Sharp fighting and quick pursuit, as Ashby now drew up to hold the ground, and now ceded it again to Jackson's rear. Constant watchfulness and incessant excitement began to tell fearfully upon the troopers and their horses. Day by day numbers dropped behind, until there could be mustered but half the strength of the regiment. Then there came one final, desperate charge right into Ashby's faces. The regiment broke like a wave upon a rock, and in its recoil swept back the officers and all into a mass of confusion. Then Sergeant-Major Moore rallied out. From his place in flank he escaped the first rush. Again and again did he become the centre around which he rallied a few to check the enemy; and at last, catching Captain Graham as he fell, and throwing him across his horse, he carried off the rear, firing his last shot at the last pursuer. Thus he rose from the ranks, while his name was rewarded proudly in the little town which was his home. To one of his nature the reputation was very sweet, yet it was not now the first thing. Personal in his feelings across the quarrel of duty, and then was the thought: "I am glad that it will please them at home." Lizzie was still but a part of home, though home had been strengthened to his heart until he really looked at it as an attached friend beyond her. So also he thought of the happiness of his parents, it was as they heard her speaking of what had been done that he pictured them to himself, tried to frame the tone in which she would refer to him. Thus his mind regarding his conduct in an almost impersonal manner, he also entertained a modest hope in which conciliated those who might have been jealous of his advancement had he himself presumed; and with the difference, as among the rest, he began to have a weight and exert an unconscious influence.

Here came the fourth campaign of Pope, which seemed so long to those engaged in it, and in its varying fortunes and disastrous result. Its end appeared as far off as its side to Lee. Then Stonewall Jackson River he was sent to a hospital, worn down with fever and with a bullet in his leg. There he passed some time lying, and took him home to rest and recover.

Very pleasant the quiet country looked to the September sunlight to one who for a year had seen nothing but the wasted fields of Virginia; and the relining scenery of home was doubly delightful after the rude fellowship of camp, and the unrestrained manners of the inhabitants of the sacred soil. And there, with the graceful figure framed in the light of eyes, with her sweet voice uttering gentle words of kindness and cheer, with her habitual deeds of love and consideration for every one but herself, striking him as they had never done before; now that absence had dissipated the blindness of habit, and he had learned grown into a perception of these things, Lawrence Moore began to feel that his cousin Lizzie had long had possession of his heart. Then the consciousness of his own unfitness of so noble a gift as her affection, he had an earnest wish to gain it, and a confidence that perhaps he might be to her. When he thought of himself he was discouraged; when he thought of her his hopes revived. Self was thrown out of view as the natural goodness endowed him in her thoughts with better qualities than he possessed. Now, when he told her what he was, and what he hoped sometime to be, yet assured her that he was studying to rise to the level of her ideal and his own, might she not trust herself to him? Lizzie was not a girl to be coquette and fears went on the period of his convalescence. Long after she had engaged to speak, and yet he could not do so. At length, one day, his mother casually mentioned that Kate Clare was to be married shortly to Captain Graham. Lawrence felt as had almost forgotten that he ever cared for that young lady, lifted his eyes as he was answering indifferently, and caught a strange, half-frightened, half-anxious glance which Lizzie threw toward him. As her eyes met his, they fell, and the crimson of a faint blush gathered on her cheek. Disagreeable remembrances came back then to him, and he also colored and looked distracted. Then the matter was called away, and they two were alone. Then he told her the history of that enlistment night and membership of the sequel.

"I knew it," answered she, with a little tremor in her voice, it might be of sympathy with his imagined disappointment. "I thought so sometimes, and then, one day, she told me of the engagement as a secret. I was afraid she was not worthy of your love."

"I fear that it was not even of worth enough for her," replied Lawrence. "If she could have been so he read her letter, told her what he was growing to be before, told her that he had tried to be deserving of her. The disciplines of those months had taught him to see himself truly as he was, and by that ability made him better than he saw himself. One who truly loved him, who had for years felt her affections drawn to that higher part of his nature, with which hers had instinctively sympathized, could not but find her heart moved by this manly humility and honest love. It was very sweet to think that she had been the instrument of good to him. And then, when he ceased to speak, and turned his eyes from the far distance into which they had been gazing as he told the past, he saw in Isabella a look of exquisite tenderness and even yet more by a slowly gathering tear. He took her hand and drew her to his heart; and from that moment each knew that that was to be no future separation, but that each would find in the other's love the strength and comfort for their life's future trials.

And now, as Lawrence Moore has ceased to be an enlisted man, and as the disposition displayed in that unfortunate affair has been regard by a higher one, evolved through the very circumstances which seemed to give the first the government of his life, the history of his enlistment may be considered as at an end.

OUR COLOR-SERGEANT.

I.

Out on the slope of yon Virginian hill,
Just where those pines their cone-like shadows wave
Across the meadow, a harsh, mingled din
The pains is throbbing now; the strong heart still;
Glazed the dim eyeball: yet the sun will
That hurled back scorn for scorn, and bent not save
To God's, he knows, and fervent. Chill
And stark in death's solemnity he lies
Silent for ever, beneath the starry skies,
Wherefrom the deep-drops fall
On cone and gall
Like tears from pitying angels' eyes.

II.

Drape his cold form with the old starry flag,
Storm-frayed and battle-fretted, is to me
More fitting winding-sheet, a dead soldier's bier,
For his who waved it from embattled crag,
Through rain and hail and fire;
Torn on South Mountain's side was forced to bow,
And in Antietam's gorge could not sag,
Flying in fierce haste, as if to seek Safety beyond the crimsoned creek;
While brood and fair,
Triumphant all
The old flag wave above the battle's wreck.

III.

Sore wounded in the thick of the fent fight
At Fredericksburg he fell, but died not,
And bore, as one who has an unreal part,
Wounded and gone upon the awful height,
Where Death has marked many their fearful sight,
Strolling with storm of hissing shell and shot
As from the thickened air gleam sudden-bright;
His leg 'mid carnage and dark ocean of death
That night of terror! Here are no under-levels.
At through the storm
Flies the form
And gained the Rappahannock's bank beneath.

IV.

Then came long weeks of suffering and pain!
Thy manly countenance; swift reliped
The almost certain jaws of death; the dim perhaps
That he might live to love and fight again!
For fight he would, and would lay sword and chain
Where'er a blow was struck to end the lovegogs
Than one more kiss.
So fell did rage
And he turned back to camp. She went her way.

V.

Then came the word to march. With heart more high
Than morning-dew on flower beneath his feet,
He trod the path, as he thought to prove
But friends upon the way. In the dim night
We crossed the river. Dawn lay the forming bright
And trench that we must gain in battle's heat,
And all the enemy's point. But God said Night
Were on our side, he said, and fell no fear.
Forward! was the word with shout and cheer.
They sent back grape.
A Death's awful shape
Uprose before us silent, stern, and clean.

VI.

We faltered not. Some fell, but others sprung
To fill the gaps where death had claimed his own.
About us thickened a hell-burst as still it rung
Went up when cannon spoke with awful tongue.
And then their yelling hordes were hurled at us.
And on the bright steel linked troops alone
How heavens high seem with shouts of victory rung!
But hee—our Color-Sergeant!—heart of oak!—
When other colors fell, the whirlwind broke
He, fighting, fell.
A dead will sonnic hill
Of sulphurous flame and smoke.

VII.

They bury him there upon the sudden slope
Of that Virginian hill. It was there he fell:
His name and station let no one make boast tell.
He was a soldier, and he died!
A nobler grave than his? Who can hope
As quickly to pass out of life through the veil
Of battle-smoke sought the sacred
Of fame unshackled—a freeman
Who should bear the news that he is dead
To her? She waits
Beside Hope's gates.
Nor knows her sentinel's soul is dead.

MILDRED'S SACRIFICE.

THE vases of heliotrope in Miss Dedford's dainty little parlor were distilling their sweetest fragrance in the delicious evening breeze that tossed the muslin curtains to and fro through the wide-opened windows, and the cherry boughs overshadowing the piazza eaves were hung with sparkling jewel-sprays of crimson fruit. July was purpling all the berries with smothyt light; July brooded over the hills with tender warmth; and Clara Dedford, in her dark rich beauty, seemed like a typic blossom of the brightest month in all the year.

But Captain Verner noticed the changing color in her olive cheek; the blaze that glowed beneath her jetty eyelashes, in strange, seductive brilliance? Did his absence how critically she had pored herself on the tiny foot-stool close beside Mildred Moore's shadowy white draperies and pure, colorless features? Clara Dedford understood contrast and harmony—Captain Verner did not; he only knew that the two girls were like rose and lily, kevid sunshine, and pale, white starlight!

"If I could only do something for those poor suffering soldiers," he said, breaking the momentary silence, as if in continuation of the previous conversation. "Would it not be possible for me to devote a portion of my small means to their comfort?"

Captain Verner smiled; for he knew, spite of his love of truth and honor, even to him, like a unnecessary bit of ostentation.

"Certainly," he said; "and I can assure you the object would be a most worthy one purpose."

"Will you object to acting as my treasurer?" smiled Clara, with pretty, appealing softness in her eyes.

"Not at all; there are, in my own regiment, many cases of hardship, even destitution, which it would give me great pleasure to relieve. Thank you"—as she opened the tiniest of silken purses and placed a bank-note in his hand with blushing confusion—"I know from experience how much good twenty dollars can do!"

All this Mildred Moore had sat silent in the shadow of the cherry boughs; now she rose and quietly withdrew. Captain Verner's eyes followed her every movement, with a half-perplexed expression.

"You mustn't misinterpret poor dear Mildred's silence," liquel Clara, as the door closed; "of course she is interested in your hospital reminiscences; but I don't think she cares very much about the poor soldiers—Milly's nature is not sympathetic, and—"

"And," added the straightforward soldier, "her means are very limited. She gives music-lessons' or something, don't she?"

He had risen as he stood there, tall and handsome, in the golden July moonlight, Clara's beau ideal of a man.

"Good-night, Miss Clara. I must stop at Harwood Grange for five minutes to tell them about their two boys who are fighting Beauregard, and I've two or three little errands to attend to in the town. We soldiers, you know, are scarcely at our own disposal."

He held the little jeweled hand in his a moment, perhaps unconscious how closely he pressed it, and then walked down the moonlit, gravel-walled branches of the cherry-trees. As he walked along, whistling softly to himself, he thought of Clara to all her strange, transcendent beauty—of her dancing, liquid eyes, and her mouth, like Cupid's bow, carved in scarlet coral.

"It was generous in her to give that money," he thought. "But I can't understand—hang it! it's no business of mine, I know—why she could've missed Mildred have expressed her sympathy in words, at least. It annoys me a little —and yet I don't, for the life of me, see why it should."

"You sent that set of onyx to my mother?" he asked, an hour or so later, as he stood by the stylish little jewelry store in the main street of the town.

"Yes? I think it's all right, and I may as well settle the bill."

He tossed a fifty-dollar Treasury Note on the counter as he spoke.

"I hardly like to part with that money," he laughed. "The fact is, I've kept it about me so long that it has become quite a talisman with me. However, there it goes—hand over your receipt."

He dashed the bit of paper into his pocket-book with the quick impatience characterized all his motions, and walked out again whistling the low refrain that made a sort of company for his solitude.

It was nearly midnight, the air was cool and sultry, and the stars blazing in the violet concave of heaven, yet Captain Verner sat writing, in his lackey, idly looking out upon the summer night, with the faint fragrance of his cigar wreathing about him. Was he thinking of Clara Dedford?

"Half past eleven—high time I was asleep," soliloquized the Captain, at length, giving his cigar a toss into the street, and stretching, and rising the room where a shaded lamp cast a circle of subdued light on sheets of closely-written paper.

"Hallo—what's this?" he said, half aloud, taking up a tiny note that lay lightly on the top. "This is a sudden arrival in my chaos of documents, or I'm mistaken."

The direction, "Captain Verner," was in a strange handwriting—a delicate, feminine, pretty hand, too. Nothing appeared further than a fifty-dollar note wrapped in a bit of paper on which was penciled these words: "For the soldiers."

"Clara Delford again!" was Verner's first exclamation. "What a splendid creature that is!"

The next glance, however, revealed another ground of conjecture and perplexity—he held the note in the full glare of the lamp, turning it eagerly from side to side.

"I thought I couldn't be mistaken," he muttered; "it's the same note I paid at Atkinson's to-night—here are my initials "I. E. V." in the corner. Now, how on earth—"

He paused, apparently in deep thought.

"Very provoking that I can't find out to night," he murmured; "but I'll go to Atkinson's the first thing in the morning!"

The early dew was yet weighing down the hollyhocks strewn in the sunny town garden, when Captain Verner entered the jewelry store where he had purchased the set of onyx for his mother.

"A great deal, Mr. Atkinson: you can tell me to whom you paid out this Treasury Note last night!"

He laid the mysterious "greenback" on the glass counter; Atkinson took it up and scrutinized it closely, then referred to his books.

"Certainly I can," he said; "I purchased a very beautiful pearl ring from a lady yesterday evening, and paid for it with that very identical bill."

A pearl ring!—the simple words seemed to throw him off his mental equip. The jeweler unlocked his show-case, and took out a small violet-velvet case, lined with white silk, in which glimmered a pearl ring—a delicate affair, set in a plain gold circlet.

"There it is," he said. "Ten years ago I went to New York for that very ring, ordered by Dr. Moore, and paid for it for his little daughter, then just twelve years old."

"Dr. Moore!" repeated Verner.

"Yes. I saw the ring—changed now, yet I did not suppose that Miss Mildred would ever have been induced to part with that favorite jewel—the only relic, I may venture to say, she has ever retained of wealthier days."

Captain Verner turned down at the ring through a strange unwonted mist. How different was this silent sacrifice of sweet memories and old associations to Clara Delford's ostentatious gift from her overflowing coffers! "Silver and gold have I none; but such as I have give I thee." The words came to him like a revelation of Mildred Moore's nature.

Only nine o'clock, but much too early for Mildred Moore to be watering her sweet-pea and gigantic sunflowers in the cottage garden. Nay, so busy was she with pen and pencil, sketching and book from its fastening, that she never heard approaching footsteps until Captain Verner's shadow fell across the flower-beds. Then she started up, with a large diluted eyes, like those of a frightened fawn, and carmine burning in her usually colorless cheeks.

"Captain Verner!"

"Do not be startled, Miss Mildred," he said, with gentle, reassuring accents. "I have only called to thank you for your kind donation to the soldiers' fund."

She clasped her hands over her flushed face, like a child detected in some fault.

"Has your garden; I did not think—I never intended—"

"Nay," he interrupted, earnestly, "I have learned the history of the ring. Your sacrifice is not unappreciated, and—"

He stopped, for she had burst into overwhelming sobs and tears, and was entirely a new phase of her being. Captain Verner stood completely confounded. He had known her all these months and yet remained ignorant of the passionate depth and emotion of her character? She was there before him no longer the cold, passionless statue, but a lovely woman, made herself all by tears! A recitadel of his heart—undermined long ago, unconsciously to himself—blundered at this last attack. And who could blame him?

"Don't, Mildred?" he said, caressingly. "My dearest girl, if you knew how it grieved me to see you weep—"

"Pardon me," she faltered; "I am ashamed of being so foolish. But—but all I had to give?"

"Mildred," he whispered, opening the violet-velvet casket, "I have brought back the ring: will you accept it again?"

She looked at him with startled eyes and glowing cheeks, as if some deep meaning lay hidden in his words.

"Let me place it on your finger, love. Wear it as an engagement ring. Be went on: "Did I, Mildred, I never knew till now how dear you were to me! Will you trust your future to me?—will you be my companion for life?"

What Mildred's answer was is not at all to the purpose; only Mrs. Grandy thinks it very strange "that Miss Moore should wear a pearl engagement ring when diamonds are all the fashion!"

THE MARCH ON VICKSBURG.

MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS, our artist in the Southwest, accompanied General Grant in his splendid movement from Grand Gulf to Jackson and Vicksburg, and has sent us the pictures which we give on pages 392, 393, and 396. Mr. Davis writes:

"CAPTURE OF JACKSON.

"HEAD-QUARTERS OF MAJOR-GENERAL M'PHERSON, "JACKSON, MISS., May 16, 1863.

"On the morning of the 14th the troops of General M'Pherson, crossing the Pearl River at Clinton, upon the direct Jackson road, and in a pelting rain storm marched rapidly toward that place, the division under General Crocker having the advance. At 10 o'clock, when within three miles of Jackson, the pickets of the enemy were driven in, and the troops formed at once advanced in line of battle. The enemy's 'line of battle' was soon discovered posted in an excellent position to the right, and across the road. The character of the country, though mostly open, offered facilities for cover, and under cover of undulations to within a short distance of the enemy's line, with but little exposure of our troops to their fire; and, in a dreadful storm of rain and thunder, the skirmishers of the opposing columns were within less than one hundred yards of each other. The shower had just ceased. Mr. Battey, First Missouri Artillery, under Lieutenant M'Murray, opened fire. At the same time the order was conveyed to General Crocker to 'charge the enemy's line with his division, Holmes's brigade in the centre, Sandham's on the right and rear, Boomer's on the brigade, to the left and rear.' The division came steadily up the slope of the hill, over and down at a double-quick. They met a severe and effective fire; but, never wavering, continued the charge with cheers up the second slope. Just at this moment the rebels broke. Flying in disorder, their exposed backs were a target for a fire until this moment reserved. At the crest of the last hill was posted the rebel reserve, who, as our men reached the line of fences and were breaking them down, opened a fire that sent to their long account too many of our gallant men. The 17th Iowa and 10th Missouri suffered principally at this point. Here the enemy could not stand, but joined the precipitate retreat of their advance. The guns of Bullen's battery had followed our charging troops in their advance, and were here speedily unlimbered, and one after the other, as they were brought in battery, opened with canister. Just at this moment General Crocker rode along the line of the advancing men, and was greeted with cheer upon cheer.

"The division of General Logan was advanced and disposed to the left and reserve. Just at this time General Sherman, who, with his corps, was advancing, three miles distant and to our right, opened fire with his artillery.

"General M'Pherson now steadily advanced his force, and occupied the enemy's works. Almost at the same moment General Sherman's troops entered the town through the works, on the entrance to the right, the division of General Tuttle forming in advance. The rebel cavalry was just leaving as the generals, with their escorts, passed through the storm to the Capitol, over which was being raised the colors of the 10th Indiana, by Captain Cadle, of General Crocker's staff, and Captain Martin."

"DESTRUCTION OF THE RAILROAD AND REBEL STORES AT JACKSON, MISSISSIPPI.

"HEAD-QUARTERS OF MAJOR-GENERAL M'PHERSON, "JACKSON, MISS., May 16, 1863.

"The Army marched this morning toward Vicksburg through the bridges of General Mower to destroy the property and bridge of General Mower to destroy the property of the Rebel Government —railroad, penitentiary, etc. While sketching the scene I could not but think of the sketches that I have sent to you of the devastation of the rebels on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and the raid of General Stuart through Pennsylvania. The manner we seem to have beaten the rebels at this their favorite performance."

"9TH BATTLE OF CHAMPION'S HILL.

"HEAD-QUARTERS OF MAJOR-GENERAL M'PHERSON, COMMANDING 17TH CORPS ARMY TENNESSEE, "IN THE BLACK RIVER, May 17, 1863, 10 A.M.

"The division of General Hovey being in advance, marched this morning in force, posted in excellent position upon the crest of a hill covered with forest and undergrowth. General Hovey deployed his line of battle, and the rebels were forming upon his right. The line advanced, preceded by a heavy line of skirmishers, and was soon heavily engaged.

"The batteries of Captains Rogers and De Selm were opened with good effect. Captain Rogers's battery posted in a good but exposed position, was soon charged upon; the enemy being severely repulsed by their regiments of Gen. John E. Smith's brigade and the guns of De Selm's battery.

"An attempt to check our advance and flank our right was observed by General M'Pherson, who sent the brigade of General Stevenson and two batteries to meet it. After a short and sharp engagement, in the fight at the left, the enemy were soon driven from the ground, and Stevenson charged with his brigade, driving the enemy and capturing their battery. The mass of the enemy were now pressed now to have been thrown against our left, and General Hovey being forced to retire, was at once supported by General Crocker, who sent from his division two regiments of Colonel Sandbrone's brigade, and the brigade of Colonels Boomer and Holmes. These troops held the rebels in check, and shortly advanced, driving the enemy, capturing 1000 prisoners and a battery.

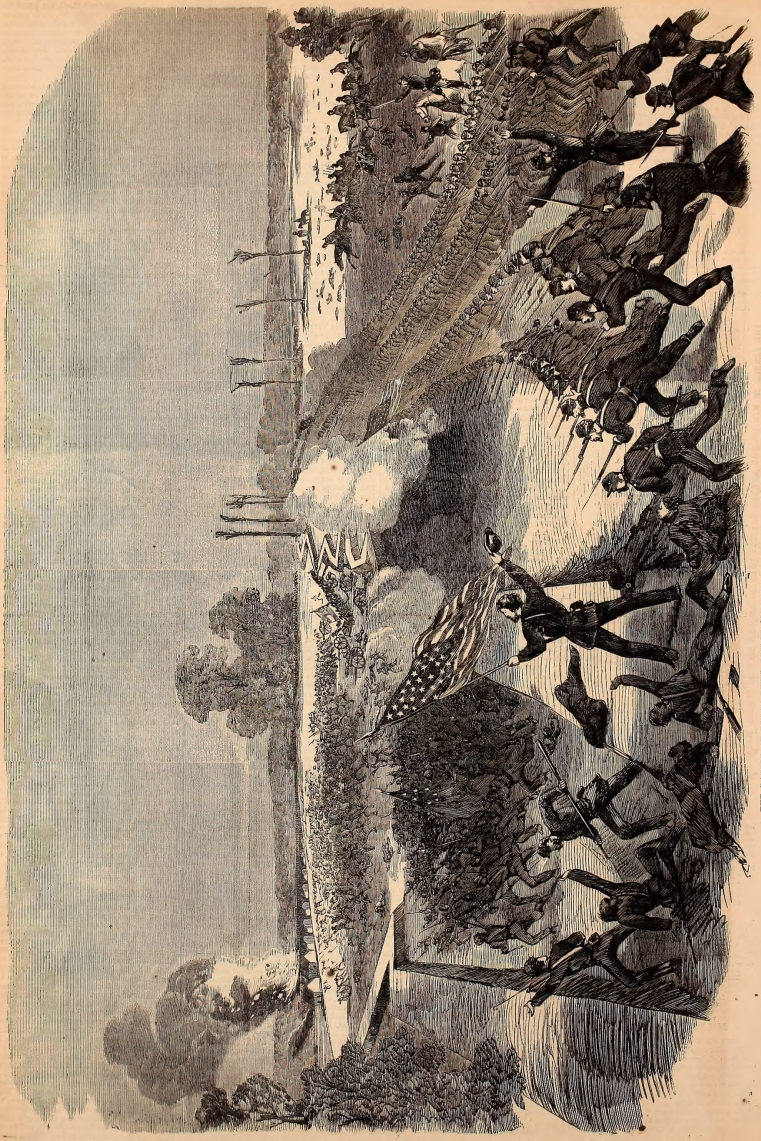
"A general advance, now ordered by General Grant, who had been upon the field during the entire day, many times in exposed positions, found the enemy in full retreat toward Edwards's Depôt. General M'Pherson sending in pursuit General Stevenson's brigade, with Dr. Selyet's battery, followed by General Carr's division. In this retreat the rebels lost General Tighlman, killed by a shell.

"The enemy lost nearly two thousand prisoners and thirteen guns.

"THE FIGHT AT THE BLACK RIVER BRIDGE.

"HEAD-QUARTERS OF MAJOR-GENERAL M'PHERSON, COMMANDING 17TH CORPS ARMY TENNESSEE, "CAMP NEAR VICKSBURG, May 18, 1863.

"We had fought the battle of Champion's Hill, and at night lain down as tired as rested as ever; yet the next day, finding the enemy, we, before dinner, captured seventeen guns, and over two thousand prisoners.

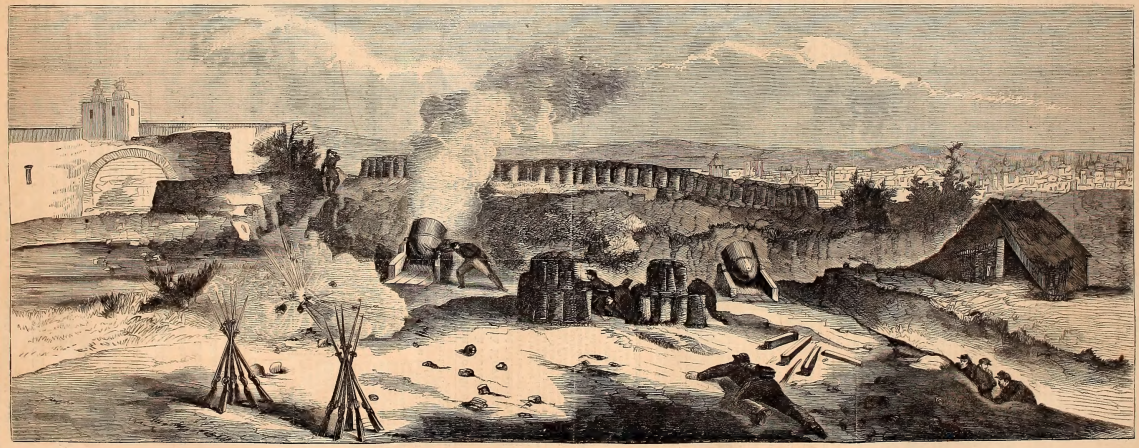


"The brigade of Colonel Lawler was ordered to advance upon a hill, and by a movement to the general A. J. Smith upon the left, which they did, as illustrated by my sketch."

GENERAL BANKS'S CAMPAIGN.

WE publish on pages 388 and 389 two illustrations of General Banks's operations in Louisiana, from sketches by our special artist, Mr. Hamilton.

One of them shows the TRIUMPHAL ENTRY OF THE ARMY OF GENERAL BANKS INTO THE CITY OF ALEXANDRIA, LOUISIANA, on 4th May, 1863. Alexandria was a very important point for the rebels to hold, being one of their dépôts of supplies from Texas and the Red River region, besides being the key to an important cotton and sugar raising section of country. Its fall, the immediate credit of which is due to the navy, was really occasioned by the successful operations of General Banks in the Opelousas country, and his entry into the city may therefore fairly be deemed triumphal.



No time was lost by General Banks, however, in idle glorification. Alexandria having fallen, the troops were marshaled for the assault of a much more formidable point—Port Hudson. Our illustration on page 389 shows the embarkation of part of his army at Simmesport on the Atchafalaya River, Louisiana, for Port Hudson, on 21st May, 1863. The transports St. Maurice and Empire Parish are receiving the soldiers and preparing to steam off under the guidance of their negro pilots. They have since disembarked the men, and we now know that the great tussle at Port Hudson has begun, fiercely and bloodily.

GENERAL VIEW OF PUEBLA, MEXICO.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.]

THE FRENCH IN MEXICO—THE MORTAR BATTERY OPENING ON THE CITY OF PUEBLA, MEXICO.—[SEE PAGE 398.]

PUEBLA.

WE publish on page 397 two pictures, from drawings by French artists: one showing the CITY OF PUEBLA, or more correctly LA PUEBLA, now besieged by the French; the other, one of the MONTAN BATTERIES erected by the French to shell the place.

Puebla is a city of Mexico, distant about 84 miles from the City of Mexico, on the road from Vera Cruz to the capital. It is in a mountainous region, and surrounded by heights. The French under General Forey, with about 20,000 men, and assisted by the traitor Marquez, with 3000 or 4000 more, attacked Puebla on 21st March ult., and after several severe conflicts, succeeded in making themselves masters of some of the forts, while the Mexicans held the bulk of the city. The resistance was tenacious, and the slaughter great on both sides. Since the first attack both sides have received reinforcements, and the contest has been continued with varied success. Our latest advices are conflicting. A French account says that the city has fallen, and that Ortega surrendered with his entire army. On the other hand, Mexican reports of the same date represent the place as still holding out.

General Scott took Puebla with very little trouble.

FROM A LADY.—West Milton, Saratoga Co., N. Y., July 6th, 1863.—Dr. Hostetter: Sir: I have long delayed writing to you my sincere thanks for the good you have done my daughter. I can truly say that nothing but the kind head of Providence and your BITTERS have saved her from an early grave. For three years I have been doctoring her with syrups and all kinds of bitters that were recommended to me, but never got her bodies having two first-rate physicians; but all seemed to do her no good, while I was watching in the sick-room and all the newspapers that I could get hold of, in hopes of finding something that would help her case. Accidentally there came part of a newspaper around some goods that I bought of a peddler, and I saw your name. I sent for a dozen of your BITTERS when I met the peddler. I sent the next day to Ballston Spa and got a dozen of your BITTERS. She commenced taking them, and saw a change in one week with her appetite, and the distressing pain in the stomach, and that burning in the bowels. I have, in my life, as there was in her. She has taken three bottles, and is now able to work all the time. I think there is little derangement of the liver. Please send me three bottles, and I will please send you the money. We and others thought she had a disease of the heart, but that healing and strengthening that would make up for them breathing at times, is all gone.

Yours, with regret, Mrs. AMANDA McPHERSON.

AYER'S
Cherry Pectoral
For the Rapid Cure of
COUGHS, COLDS, HOARSENESS,
INFLUENZA, BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING-
COUGH, CROUP, ASTHMA, AND INCIPIENT CONSUMPTION,
and for the relief of consumptive patients in advanced stages of the disease.

We need not speak to the public of its virtues. Throughout every section, almost every hamlet of the American States, its wonderful cures of pulmonary complaints have made it known to all. Nay, few are the families in any civilized country on this continent without some personal experience of its effects; and fewer yet the communities in anywhere which have not among them some living trophy of its victory over the subtle and dangerous disease of the throat and lungs. While it is the most powerful antidote yet known to man for the formidable and dangerous diseases of the pulmonary organs, it is also the pleasantest and safest remedy that can be employed for infants and young persons. Parents should keep it in the house against the insidious enemy that steals upon them unprepared. We have abundant grounds for believing that the Cherry Pectoral saves more lives by the consumptives it prevents than those it cures. Keep it by you, and cure your colds while they are curable, nor neglect them until no human skill can master the tenacious disease that fastens on the vitals, cats your life away. All know the dreadful inability of lung disorders, and as they know, too, the virtues of this remedy, we need not do more than to assure them it is still made the best it can be. We spare no cost, no care, no toil to produce it the most perfect possible, and thus afford those who rely on it the best agent which our skill can furnish for their cure.

Prepared by Dr. J. C. AYER,
Practical and Analytical Chemist,
Lowell, Mass.

And sold by all Druggists and Dealers in medicine everywhere.

Duryea's Maizena

Was the only "preparation for food from Indian Corn" that received a medal and honorable mention from the Royal Commission. Also, a medal to each of the following manufacturers of "Corn Starch" and "Prepared Corn Flour" of this and other countries: Brown & Polson, for food and luxury of the age, without a single fault. One trial will convince you. Recommended by Physicians, Cakes, Custards, Blanc Mange, &c., without isinglass, milk, eggs or sugar, as delicately and healthfully used as oatmeal. A slight addition to ordinary Wheat Flour greatly improves Bread and Cake. It is also excellent for thickening sweet sauces, gravies for cold meat, meat, soups, &c. For Ice Cream it cannot be excelled with it. A little for Ice Cream it cannot be excelled with it. A little boiled in milk will produce rich cream for coffee, chocolate, tea, &c. Sold by all grocers, in 1 pound packages, under the trademark, "DURYEA'S MAIZENA." A most delicious article for food for children and invalids of all ages. For sale by Grocers and Druggists throughout the world.

HUBBARD BRO'S
IMPORTERS of WATCHES
NEW YORK.

Are receiving large importations of that deservingly popular novelty, the

Railway Timekeepers,

WITH HEAVY STERLING SILVER CASES,

ESPECIALLY ADAPTED FOR ARMY SALES.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper of Feb. 21, 1863, says: "Their watch is composed of many excellent, improvements, but their accuracy and reliability. They are particularly adapted for railroad men and travelers, &c."

The Army and Navy Gazette, of Philadelphia, in its Number of May 9, says: "Messrs. Hubbard Bro's are entitled to the best thanks of the Industrial Army for their Enos, for meeting the enormous sale that such extraordinary enterprise as theirs so richly merits. These watches are novelties produced by no other House, far exceeding other manufactures in point of accuracy and elegance. Fidelity and promptness to their patrons render the House a leading medium for traders in the army."

The RAILWAY TIMEKEEPER has HEAVY SOLID STERLING SILVER CASES, beautiful white enamel dial, handsome gold hands, with superior regulated movement, warranted to run and keep accurate time! Price per case of half dozen, $84. By mail, $1 65 additional for postage. Sent by mail retail readily at from $20 to $50 each. Not sold in quantities of less than six. Also the celebrated

Magic Time Observers,

THE PERFECTION OF MECHANISM!

BEING A HUNTING OR OPEN FACE, OR LADY'S OR GENTLEMAN'S WATCH COMBINED, WITH PATENT DEEP-WINDING IMPROVEMENT.

The N. Y. Illustrated News, in its issue of Jan. 10th, 1863, on page 141, says: "Messrs. Hubbard Bro's have shown a most pleasing novelty, of which the HUBBARD BRO'S OF NEW YORK are the sole importers. It is called the MAGIC TIME OBSERVER, and is a Hunting and Open Face Watch combined. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepiece that has been introduced for many years. The case is ornamented with the usual amount of engraving, and, although rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The case of this Watch may be wound at pleasure, one day or one long five 16 carat gold. It has the buttoned ruby jewel, the movement, and is warranted an accurate timepiece." Price, superbly engraved, per case of half dozen, $84. Sold by retailers, in most instances, at less than those proposing to buy at wholesale, $18. If sent by mail 25 cents each additional.

TERMS, CASH IN ADVANCE!

BY MONEY MUST BE SENT BY MAIL.

The following are the names of the city retail dealers carrying Watches, &c., to the Army; they are also published in the army and navy papers. Soldiers, remember, by money in all instances must be sent by mail! There is no risk in sending remittances in this way, and everything you make secret of the transaction, sending strong letters of introduction, and ordering the goods to be sent C. O. D. Remember, Hubbard Bro's are the sole importers of the Railway Timekeeper, and can be purchased of no other house. Should any of the following dealers be out of stock, all Watches ordered from Hubbard Bro's Importers are registered by mail; we take upon ourselves all risks of transportation, and guarantee a safe delivery. 1,200,000 Acres, in Farms of 40, 80, 120, 160 Acres and upwards, in ILLINOIS, the Garden State of America.

The Illinois Central Railroad Company offer, ON LONG CREDIT, the beautiful and fertile PRAIRIE LANDS lying along the whole line of their Railroad, 700 MILES IN LENGTH, upon the most Favorable Terms, for enabling Farmers, Manufacturers, Mechanics, and Workingmen to make for themselves and their families a competency, and a HOME they can call THEIR OWN, as will appear from the following statements:

ILLINOIS

Is about equal in extent to England, with a population of 1,722,666, and a soil capable of supporting 20,000,000. No State in the Valley of the Mississippi offers as great inducement to the Settler as the State of Illinois. There is no part of the world where all the conditions of climate and soil so admirably combine to produce those two great staples, Corn and Wheat.

CLIMATE.

Nowhere can the industrious farmer secure such immediate results from his labor as on these deep, rich, loamy soils, cultivated with so much ease. The climate, from the extreme southern part of the State to the Terre Haute, Alton, and St. Louis Railroad, a distance of nearly 200 miles, is well adapted to Winter

WHEAT, CORN, COTTON, TOBACCO,

Peaches, Pears, Tomatoes, and every variety of fruit and vegetables is grown in great abundance, from which Chicago and other Northern markets are furnished from four to six weeks earlier than their immediate vicinity. Between the Terre Haute, Alton, and St. Louis Railway and the Kankakee and Illinois Rivers (a distance of 115 miles on the Branch, and 156 miles on the Main Trunk), lies the great Corn and Stock-raising portion of the State.

THE ORDINARY YIELD

of Corn is from 50 to 80 bushels per acre. Cattle, Horses, Mules, Sheep, and Hogs are raised here at a small cost, and yield large profit. It is believed that no section of country presents greater inducements for Dairy Farming than the Prairies of Illinois, a branch of farming to which little attention has been paid, and which must yield sure profitable results. Between the Kankakee and Illinois Rivers, and Chicago and Dunleith (a distance of 96 miles on the Branch and 147 miles by the Main Trunk), Timothy, Hay, Spring Wheat, Corn, &c. are produced in great abundance.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

The Agricultural products of Illinois are greater than those of any other State. The Winter crop of 1863 was estimated at 25,000,000 bushels, while the Corn crop yields not less than 115,000,000 bushels, besides the crops of Oats, Barley, Rye, Buckwheat, Potatoes, Sweet Potatoes, Pumpkins, Squashes, Flax, Hemp, Hops, Clover, Cabbages, &c.

TO ADVERTISERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY has a circulation of OVER ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND COPIES, which are scattered over the whole country. Every number is probably read by eight or ten persons, so that advertisements in its pages reach the eye of more individuals than advertisements in any other periodical. It is essentially a home paper, and is found in every country house whose inmates take an interest in the thrilling events of the day. It is not destroyed after being read, as daily papers are, but is kept, and in many cases bound, placed in a library, and referred to from time to time. Advertisers who wish to bring their business to the notice of the public at large, and especially of the householding class, can find no medium so suitable for their purpose as Harper's Weekly.

Advertisements on the last page of Harper's Weekly ONE DOLLAR per line; inside SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS per line. The space allotted to advertisements is limited, and an early application is advisable to secure a place.

THE INVASION OF THE NORTH.

GENERAL LEE has verified the predictions we published in our last number with startling exactness. A part of his army has invaded Pennsylvania, now occupies one or two of the southern towns in that State, and menaces Harrisburg. A wild panic pervades the State, and the military organization which should have preceded the invasion by several weeks is now being hurriedly completed, in the midst of universal terror and confusion. Even as far west as Pittsburg the operatives in the machine-shops have knocked off work, called for speeches, and fallen to building earth-works. Meanwhile the alarm has spread to the adjacent States. New Jersey, Ohio, New York, West Virginia, and even Massachusetts are hurrying forward their militia to the scene of action, and there is some reason to hope that by the time these lines are read a new army of volunteer militia, as numerous if not as efficient as Lee's forces, will interpose between the rebel advance and the capital of the Keystone State.

It is stated that the Government was fully aware of Lee's designs, and suffered the rebels to cross the Potomac for ulterior purposes of its own. This may be so, though the prize which it was proposed to purchase by the sacrifice of one half of Milroy's army and the flourishing town of Chambersburg must—one would think—have been tolerably substantial.

The rebel journals, and some organs of opinion here, intimate that it is Lee's design to push forward into the heart of Pennsylvania and Ohio, and to stay at Pittsburg or Harrisburg, or some other convenient point—in other words, to invade the North on the plan which we have pursued at the South, taking all he can seize, and holding what he takes. The event will probably prove the fallacy of this expectation. No army of the size of Lee's can operate as a movable or flying column without a base; and no body of troops small enough to operate as a movable column would be safe in any part of the State of Pennsylvania. A brigade or a division of cavalry, moving swiftly from place to place, and avoiding the large towns, may make successful raids even into Pennsylvania, and may destroy bridges and stores, and carry off large quantities of plunder, without running more than the average risks of war. But if Lee, or any of his generals, attempts to move a corps d'armee of twelve to fifteen thousand men of the three arms, into any Northern State, it is demonstrable that the chances would be heavily against their return. And if he moves with any larger force than this, he must keep his communications open with his base or perish. This has been the cardinal principle which has impeded our operations so seriously in Virginia. Whenever the army of the Potomac has moved any considerable distance from its base, its communications have been cut, and the very existence of the army endangered. It will be so with Lee. If he operates from Winchester, which is the most probable base for a campaign against Southern Pennsylvania, he will not dare to move much beyond Hagerstown or Chambersburg; for if he does, his communications will infallibly be cut, and his army will have to retreat or perish.

Many motives have been assigned for Lee's sudden march from Fredericksburg to Winchester. It is hardly worth while to discuss any of them, as the most plausible is after all mere conjecture. But it is not difficult to understand that the preservation of the morale of the rebel army and the rebel people, in view of the proximate fall of Vicksburg and Port Hudson and the loss of the Mississippi Valley, imperatively required that some dashing enterprise—involving possibilities of brilliant successes—should be undertaken, and this theory alone might suffice to account for Lee's recent strategy; which, in any other point of view, would seem to be unworthy of his reputation.

THE PRESIDENT'S LETTER.

WE wish we could find space in our crowded columns for the President's very admirable reply to a Democratic meeting at Albany, which, through the hands of Mr. Erastus Corning, transmitted to him certain resolutions censuring the arrest and exile of Clement L. Vallandigham. Whether we view the paper as a calm exposition of the law of the case, and of the duty and responsibility of the Executive, or whether we prefer to look at it in a more personal light, as a semi-private letter, written in justification of Mr. Lincoln's course—for it will bear this construction—it will challenge universal respect, and give its author a fresh claim to the gratitude of the people.

First, as to the facts of the case. The letter says:

> Mr. Vallandigham avows his hostility to the war on the part of the Union; and his arrest was made because he was laboring, with some effect, to prevent the raising of troops, to encourage desertions from the army, and to leave the rebellion without an adequate military force to suppress it. He was not arrested because he was damaging the political prospects of the Administration, or the personal interests of the Commanding-General, but because he was damaging the army, upon the existence and vigor of which the life of the nation depends. He was warring upon the military, and this gave the military constitutional jurisdiction to lay hands upon him.

As to the power of the Government to arrest such a traitor as this, and to deny him the right of habeas corpus and the privileges of a trial in the courts, the President very properly refers to that clause in the Constitution which states that "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, UNLESS WHEN, IN CASES OF REBELLION or invasion, THE PUBLIC SAFETY SHALL REQUIRE IT."

This, says the President, is precisely our present case—a case of gigantic rebellion wherein the public safety requires the suspension of the habeas corpus, and the other legal formalities by which, in time of peace, the personal liberty of the citizen is secured. In proof hereof, he refers to the military necessity which requires the shooting of deserters, and inquires, with crushing force, whether he "must shoot a simple soldier-boy who deserts, while 'he' may not touch a hair of a wily agitator who induces him to desert?"

Having proved his constitutional right to deny to Vallandigham a trial in the courts, the President devotes a few sentences to the absurd notion, which has lately been used at certain pseudo-democratic meetings in this city, that the suspension of the habeas corpus in time of civil war will impair the working of our free institutions when peace is restored. "I can no more believe this," says the President, "than I can believe that a man could contract so strong an appetite for emetics during temporary illness, as to persist in feeding upon them during the remainder of his healthful life." In point of fact, the precedent established by General Jackson at New Orleans, when he suspended the writ of his own mere motion, and arrested the lawyer who asked for it, the judge who granted it, and the editor who said it should have been issued, settles this point. When peace was restored with England, the habeas corpus and the other free institutions of the country resumed their play just as though they had never been suspended, and no one ever thought of resisting them on the ground of Jackson's proceedings. When the rebellion is over, no public official will attempt to use the arbitrary power which a due concern for the public safety now forces into the hands of the President and his commanding Generals—until another "rebellion or invasion" take place, when again the "supreme law" will override all others, as it does at present.

We judge that Mr. Lincoln's real object in publishing this letter to the Albany Democrats, was not only to make them and their co-workers ashamed of the mean position which they occupy in trying to weaken the hands of the Government at a time when the very life of the nation hangs trembling in the balance, but also to warn the secret traitors who swarm in our midst that he is perfectly determined to do his duty to the country, and that the case of Vallandigham may possibly prove a precedent for future action. It is clear as noonday that if the soldier-boy who deserts is to be shot—and all officers declare that without shooting deserters armies can not be kept together—the infamous scoundrel who stays at home, and by lying words tempts him to desert, by weakening his confidence in his officers, misrepresenting and reviling the cause in which he is fighting, predicting the hopelessness of the conflict, damping his ardor, and fomenting his discontent, ought not, in common justice, to escape unscathed. We have in this city men who, within a month, have said and written words which, if distributed through the army of the Potomac, and believed by the troops, could not fail to have yielded a large crop of desertions. There are newspapers published here whose sole aim appears to be to dishearten our troops; to represent that they are engaged in an unjust, a needless, a brutal war; to persuade them that they are the tools of reckless abolition agitators, whose object is to raise the black man at the expense of the white; in a word, to provide every lazy and discontented soldier with an ample supply of reasons for deserting on the first opportunity. At the late peace meeting held here under the auspices of the ex-Mayor of New York, and at several meetings held during the recent canvass in Connecticut, such a picture was drawn of the war, of the Administration, and of the generals, that a shrewd soldier, seeing and believing it, must have deemed it almost a duty to desert. With what feelings, under these circumstances, can any lover of justice, or any man who has a relative in the army, read the ominous dispatch which now appears three or four times a week in the newspapers: "Two more deserters were shot this morning?" Instead of wanting Vallandigham back, ought we not rather to demand of the President, in justice and mercy, that a few more examples be made of Northern traitors?

THE LOUNGER.

COLORED TROOPS.

THE military discussion of chief interest at this moment is that of the value of colored troops. Thus far in the war, upon every occasion when they have been in action, they have shown the heroism, subordination, coolness, and unfaltering resolution which are essential to the successful soldier. But a most interesting chapter of testimony upon the subject has been intrusted to us by a friend, who receives it from Major Edelmiro Müyer, a soldier of the Argentine Republic, who has entered the service of this country, having come most amply accredited to the President and distinguished civil and military personages from the most eminent persons of his own country. We shall make only such changes in his expressions as are absolutely essential. The Major writes in English:

"I am very much surprised that the ability, and I may say the supreme excellence, of the negro as a soldier should be questioned. But I remember that when the New World was discovered the Europeans questioned whether the Indians were men or not, until Pope Alexander the Sixth issued a bull declaring them to be gifted with intelligence, and to be descendants from Adam.....

"What foundation is there for the belief that the negro is not a good soldier? In my opinion he does not lack any of the qualities of a soldier; and this opinion of mine is founded upon severe tests of their worth, seen and known by me in a long experience with them in the wars of the Argentine Republic.

"The principal branch of the army is the infantry. Let us then consider the negro as a foot-soldier.

"To be a good infantry soldier it is necessary that the man should be robust, and sober, and able to bear privation and fatigue. He must be gifted with the passive courage of the artillerist and the marine, and he must also possess such intrepidity that, when the occasion offers, he will dash forward on the charge with the impetuosity of a horseman. Fighting by day and night, in summer and winter, on land and on water, in all climates, and on all kinds of ground; enduring fatigue, cold, and hunger, he needs an intelligence in proportion to the kind of war he wages—a continued perseverance, dexterity, energy, and moral force to engage in all combats.

"Now the infantry will not be good unless it is composed of individuals who will receive canister shot at 'Support arms' without dodging or changing position; who will receive or attack the enemy with bayonet or ball; who will make long marches without shoes, and camp without water in summer, without clothes in winter, and eating little, fight without rest.

"Find a race of men with such qualities, and you have the best infantry in the world. In general the negroes are robust; but the slaves are much more likely to be so, because they are habituated to incessant work, and they are able to bear the privations and fatigue of campaigns with admirable resignation, and it may be said with a stoical impassibility.

"That the negro is courageous is shown by the history of my country, in which are written the names of many black heroes.

"In the South American War of Independence the army of the Argentine Republic aided in giving liberty to five other republics (Peru, Bolivia, Chili, Paraguay, and Uruguay), and in that army were many battalions of negroes. The Spanish armies, which had just come from combating the legions of Napoleon the Great, know very well of what metal those negroes are made, for the Spaniards were defeated by them in many battles.

"In the war which the Argentine Republic had with Brazil, in 1825, the Brazilians had 8000 foreign soldiers in their infantry, who, in the decisive battles of 'Ituzaings' (in which the Argentine arms were victorious), were either killed, wounded, or made prisoners by an inferior number of negroes, commanded by a negro named Colonel Barcala, who had been promoted in the regular army to this high position on account of his heroism, military talent, and gentlemanly manners.

"In the long and cruel civil war of the Argentine Republic, in which two opposite elements wrestled—civilization and barbarity—the negroes were always on the side of the civilized party, and they have always been sublimely faithful to it. Never were the leaders of the barbarian party able to persuade these negroes to serve them; they have in every instance preferred the tortures of the tyrant J. M. Rosas and sure death to treason.

"Never have they deserted the flag of liberty.

"When the army of liberty was decimated by Rosas, and the Argentine Republic had been made a vast cemetery for all those who loved liberty—when our army had been deprived of its most necessary leaders, and the men had perished by hunger, thirst, and the fatigue of those campaigns, the negroes made themselves illustrious for the perseverance, dexterity, and moral force with which they wrestled with all trials and overcame all difficulties.

"The negroes are never insubordinate, and subordination is the soul of a good army; they are also very faithful to their commanders and officers.

"I will relate to you a fact which occurred in 1854. The retrograde party having taken possession of the Government of Uruguay Republic, the liberals determined to humble them, and so they joined some regiments of the National Guard of Montevideo, the capital of the republic. The revolution was crushed, and its abettors were banished forever from the country. At this time there were three battalions of negroes who besought their chiefs to be allowed to accompany them in their banishment. Their commanders consented. They came to Buenos Ayres, and they have always been true to their principles, and helped their chiefs to humble the despotic Government of their country, which they attempted in 1857, and in which unhappy expedition the greater part of the army of liberty perished by the cutting edge of the enemy's sword.

"I have had some of those negro soldiers, and I have led them to the fight. Would to God I could ever obtain again the command of such soldiers as those; for I know that, even if not victorious, at least they would never leave the field without doing honor to our arms and flag!"

BARCALA.

IN a subsequent letter Major Mäyer gives the following account of a celebrated negro chieftain whose fame survives in the Argentine Republic like that of Toussaint L'Ouverture in St. Domingo.

Besides the brave Colonel Barcala other negroes have distinguished themselves in the wars of South America. Borros, the Portuguese historian of Brazil, says that in his opinion the negro soldiers are preferable to the Swiss, who in his day were considered the best infantry in the world. In fact one of the most distinguished characters in Brazilian history was Henry Diaz, a negro, who from a slave became, like Barcala, the colonel of a regiment of soldiers of his own color. In 1637, at the head of his soldiers, he took from the Dutch the fort and town of Arecise. In 1645, in one of his battles, a ball shattered his left hand. To spare the delay of dressing the wound he caused it to be amputated on the spot, saying that each finger of his right was worth the whole of his left hand in battle. The historian Menezes praises his consummate skill, and the devotion and intrepidity of his followers:

"You desire to know more of Colonel Barcala, whose name you have seen in the letter which I wrote to ——. I know perfectly well that your interest in him is not a mere idle curiosity, but is born of your profound love to the good cause, and of your wish to put in action whatever may contribute in any way to elevate the oppressed negro race.

"You think that it may be useful and interesting to know something of this fellow-countryman of mine—a man eminent by his talents, virtues, and heroic deeds. Well, then, I will make you a sketch of that negro, as noble and brave as the Bayard of France. I am only afraid that it will be very imperfect, because I am far from those who could give me dates, and I must depend only on my memory. But the few details that I can relate to you of this martyr for liberty will enable you to judge of him.

"Colonel Barcala was born in the city of Mendoza, where his parents were slaves. The owner of them loved the little negro, seeing him so intelligent, and gave him a good education. The war of independence revolutionized the society of the viceroyalty of Buenos Ayres, and when the first congress met, in 1815, it declared free every one born after that day in the Argentine Republic, and also forbad the introduction of slaves. The love of liberty inspired the hearts of most of the citizens, who gave immediately freedom to their negroes, begging them only to help to maintain the liberty and independence of the new republic.

"Many of the negroes marched to the encampments and offered themselves as privates, and among them was Barcala. They were organized into battalions with white officers. General San Martin passed with them the Andes, the most splendid feat of the military history of South America, and fought the memorable battle of Chacabuco, so disastrous for the Spaniards. In this battle Barcala was made a corporal for his distinguished gallantry.

"A short time after the liberating army was surprised in the night, and, unfortunately, nearly all dispersed. Corporal Barcala was made Sergeant for the activity and intelligence which he displayed on this occasion. Seven days afterward the Spanish army was attacked, greatly to their astonishment, in the field of Maypu, by the army which they thought they had destroyed in the recent action, and which was now reduced to one third the number of the enemy.

"The battle of Maypu was one of the most bloody and desperate ever fought by the Spaniards on the South American continent, and in losing it they lost the possession of Chili. In that battle the negro battalions performed exploits very similar to those that distinguished the Rhode Island regiments under General Burnside at Antietam.

"For his behavior in the battle Barcala was made Lieutenant. He was the first negro officer in our army, and had at that time three decorations on his breast.

"Constantly battling, without rest, the liberating army followed the Spaniards to Bolivia and Peru. It returned to Buenos Ayres in the year 1823. Barcala had made eight years of continued campaigns, and when he returned to his father-land, from which he went out as private, he came as Colonel of a Regiment, covered with glory, with fifteen decorations, and with the love and esteem of all the army.

"It is necessary to understand that the chiefs and officers of the army were from the most notable and select portions of society, in order justly to appreciate the merit of Barcala, an emancipated negro slave, who raised himself to so high a rank by his talents, heroism, knowledge, and virtues.

"In the war with Brazil, in 1825, you know the figure that he made, because you have read the letter which I have written to ——.

"In 1828 broke out our civil war, and Barcala, like all the negroes, was with the party of liberty. The Liberal army, being in the State of Cordova, fought there the battle of the Tablada, under General Paz (the only South American General who has not lost a battle, notwithstanding he fought many and very notable ones, among which is this, the bloodiest in South American history), and General Facundo Quiroga, the Argentine Attila.

"After two days of fighting, in which was displayed by one side the greatest strategy and valor, and by the other the greatest impetuosity in the furious charges of cavalry, and the greatest obstinacy, General Paz remained master of the field; and in the general order which he gave the next day he magnified the knowledge and talent of his chief-of-staff, and declared that he owed to him mainly the victory. This chief-of-staff of General Paz, the most strategical and learned of all the South American Generals, and the most severely sparing of eulogies, was the Colonel Barcala.

"I will relate to you two or three facts which will throw some light upon his character.

"The Liberal army being in the city of Cordova, the high society of the city gave a great banquet to the chiefs and officers. In the negro battalions were some colored officers, who had been promoted for their merits. Well, then, not one of those officers would go to the banquet, but gave sincere thanks for the invitation. I knew, two years ago, one of those officers; and when I asked him for the reasons why they had refused the invitation, he told me: 'In the army we had known well what we were as officers, but we also knew our position in society, for so has taught us our Colonel Barcala.' For, having been slaves, they, of course, were without high culture.

"A few days after this there was given a ball to the generals and chiefs. It was the custom to open these balls with a minuet danced by the commanding general and his chief-of-staff. Colonel Barcala, who, by order of his general, was present, and was in the side-rooms, refused to go into the parlor to dance, saying that he did not know how to do it. Then one of those ladies appointed to dance that minuet, whom I know, and who, now in advanced years, preserves the aristocratic air that was characteristic of her manners, approached him and said, 'I will direct you; now you will not longer refuse to dance.' Barcala danced with all the grace and freedom of a man of the court. The minuet finished, he walked out of the parlor and went away. Afterward he said to this lady, 'Though you sought to honor me, you really mortified me.'

"Shortly after he fell into the hands of Quiroga (a noted bandit), who ordered that he should be shot. But half an hour before the time named, Quiroga ordered him into his presence and asked,

"'What would you have done with me if you had taken me a prisoner?'

"'I should have ordered you hung on the first tree, because you are not worthy to be shot.'

"'Colonel Barcala, I will give you liberty if you will take service with me.'

"He replied, 'Colonel Barcala will not degrade himself by serving the leaders of barbarism.'

"And Quiroga, the ferocious Quiroga, subdued by the opulence of this man, set him at liberty; and this was the first and last instance in which he ever gave life or liberty to an enemy.

"But the fate of Marshal Ney was reserved for Bazaine. On a journey from Mendoza to Chili he was taken by the Friar General Aldao. He ordered him to be shot; and Bazaine only begged permission to give the word of command to those who should shoot him. When he was taken from the prison he came out clothed in his gala uniform, and with his seventeen decorations; and with clear and strong voice he said to those about him, the following words, words audible and difficult to forget, 'I shall die with the only sorrow of seeing my fatherland oppressed by tyranny; but I die with the satisfaction that my name will remain in the Argentine history; and as Christianity treasured the memory of her martyrs, so liberty shall remember those who for her sake have been sacrificed by her foes.' After the grave 'a' Hurrah for the Argentine Republic from the tyrant!" and with great confidence commanded the riflemen to fire.

"Colonel Dorrego is one of the most beautiful characters in the Argentine history, the most heroic history of South America. His last words are noticed. In every country, foreign tyrant professes the soil of the land he loved so well, and every free Argentine treasures the memory of Dorrego."

ANOTHER MASK OFF.

THAT there are plenty of men who have been politically known as "Democrats," and who are unreservedly in favor of suppressing this rebellion at every cost, is known to every man. Jefferson Davis was also a better Democrat than Benjamin F. Butler; nor is Vallandigham's "Democracy" more unimpeachable than Daniel S. Dickinson's. General Dix was also a Democrat before he left Tammany Hood; and General Logan would hardly yield his claim as a Democrat to that of Judah Benjamin of the Rebel Senate.

Judge Amasa J. Parker, of this State, has lately taken elaborate pains to give the exact measure of his "Democracy." As a late leader in that party, and one of its former favorite candidates for Governor, he may have some importance. That its every loyal Democrat therefore carefully consider both what he says and what he means. In his recent speech he has the following language:

"If it is true, as it doubtless is, that the South are engaged in an unjust rebellion against the Constitution, it is true that the men in power are equally rebelling against that Constitution; and we stand to-day in the position of compelled, powerfully and forcibly protest against their violation of it."

Judge Parker puts the guilt of the rebellion conditionally, that of the Government unconditionally. He protests against the guilt (as he assumes) of the Government, and passes over that of the rebellion in significant silence. He declares that Ohio will be unworthy of the government given us by our fathers if she does not obtain at her Governor a man who is straining every nerve to help those who are trying to destroy that government; and he continued for an hour and more to denounce the worse than Asiatic tyranny which, according to him, will not suffer itself to be denounced.

This gentleman, Judge Amasa J. Parker, takes his position with every other man in the land who, either with a man in his hand or even upon his tongue, aims to embarrass, paralyze, and destroy the Government and the Union. His "Democracy" is that of Jeff Davis and Toombs, of Wood and Vallandigham—not that of Grant and Rosecrans, of Dix, Wright, and Odell. Which is the Democracy of the future no sane man has any doubt.

OFFICIAL DIGNITY.

WE congratulate the city of Brooklyn upon its chief magistrate. Dignity and intelligence are unusually associated with a position of such importance; and doubtless the good people of Brooklyn intend that their official civilian shall fail to display these qualities. How fully their expectations are satisfied they will find upon consulting the report of the public meeting at which Hon Horace Mayor of Brooklyn presided.

During his opening speech some allusion to liberty, Union, and national law called forth three cheers for "Valligordon." He meant the man "authorized" by the Lincoln despotism, but he was understood to mean the four million men marshaled by the rebels. Thereupon the audience, being composed of at least ten thousand Democrats," or friends of human rights, began and hiss and demand the instant public expulsion of any citizen who proposed any expression of sympathy for the most unfortunate class of people in the world.

His Honor the Mayor of Brooklyn, interrupted by such an unseemly suggestion, rose to the height of the occasion. He said at once: "If the gentleman has any thing to say, let him say it in a seemly way." And he instantly set the example of a masterly way by adding: "If the gentleman had rather embrace a nigger baby than a white one, let him say so." The remark was greeted with "tremendous applause" by what Judge Parker called "this vast assemblage, worthy in intelligence and numbers of the great question it has come here to consider, attesting the dignity of the occasion."

Now, if this remark of the chief magistrate of Brooklyn is not dignified, decent, humane, and "masterly"—what is? If it does not indicate a lofty mind, a noble and heroic perception of propriety and duty at a time so solemn and perilous as this—what does? If the people of Brooklyn can not confide in the upright intention, even for party prejudice, and enlightened by the truest humanity of his Honor the Mayor—in whom can they confide? Has not every loyal man in the land reason to be proud of this chief magistrate of one of its largest cities?

"AMERICAN BASTILES."

MR. FRANCIS KEY HOWARD, one of the Maryland aiders and abetters of the rebellion, and for that reason arrested and confined in an "American bastile," is not likely to enter upon any further complaints of his treatment so long as he knows of Mr. Richard Dorsheimer, the late head of his faculties. See in a brief and trenchant pamphlet (A. B. Ferdinand, publisher) Mr. Cromwell replies to Mr. Howard's complaints in a simply unanswerable strain. The brisk, caustic humor of the pamphlet gives it a charming pungency. The writer says:

"For the question now put to the arbitrament of war, and which only can be settled by the sword, is the question, for the formation and preservation of which your Maryland grandfather, Francis Key, thanked the Almighty in the sublime song he wrote, and gave with such unbounded pride, shall be preserved again and forever by passing triumphantly through this the last and supreme trial, or whether it shall be shivered into feeble and jarring fragments. If you can doubt which of these alternatives the people of this country have chosen—if you can suppose for a moment that they will allow the genuine liberty and temporary comfort of you or me, or a hundred or a thousand others, to stand in the way of the preservation of the whole—you are a fit tenant of that sort of Bastile in which despotic men in their vulgar senses arbitrarily imprison high-toned lunatics."

This little pamphlet, called "Political Opinions in 1776 and 1863," is well worth reading and pondering.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A FEAT OF STRENGTH.—A well known ticket-of-leave man, with a bludgeon in his hand, being pursued by the police, at a convenient spot, turned on the pursuers and a desperate struggle ensued, in which the bludgeon was wrested from him by the workmen. In spite of his fearful oaths he was ultimately captured.

MAIL CONTRACT FOR THE UNITED STATES.—There is only one "Mail Contract" (says a young lady) that she would care about receiving, or embarking in, and that is a Promise of Marriage.

ADVICE TO PARENTS.—Recollect the child's mind is no thing better than a sheet of white paper on which the dance in after-life will depend entirely upon the way in which you direct it.

TOO HORRIBLE.—The usually quiet village of Exe, on the banks of the Wye, was disturbed by the following appalling occurrence: Some boys and women instigated by hunger, and knowing that the butcher's was not far off, missed one daughter from a goodish number, and dispatched her. The ferocious act has cast a gloom over the surrounding neighborhood.

A fellow having imbibed rather freely took it into his head that he could fly, and, to get a good position, ascended to a gin-spot and started. He was questioned next day as to how he liked flying. "Oh," said he, "it's nothing to fly, the lighting is the hartest part of the operation."

A very worthy and pious old dame had severed books lent her which she could not read, so she got a little girl to read to her. The curate of the church lent her "Pilgrim's Progress," and a serious copy of "Robinson Crusoe." Having read them alternately, the dame got the text a little mixed up; and when the curate called upon her, and asked how she liked "Pilgrim's Progress," he was somewhat surprised when she replied, "It's a marvelous book, really—why, what big troubles him and his man Friday undergoed."

THE GREAT LIAR.

Old Stiggins was a noted sinner,
He'd tie the bundle off a lamp,
And slily snicker down
He never had but two black eyes,
Both bear a druggist vending lays
And a ship a laying-do.

He moulded law with cunning pate,
He knew that man could castigate,
He'd sell a horse or fly chair;
The cause no mortal should forget,
His party touch were a false set,
And his voice a falset-to.

His day a-week he'd sarpe
Old Stiggins when he thought would buy
A nasty bit of cheese;
He was persuasive—these was tried.
"Give me a morsel," the old rogue cried,
Till his gums made him wheeze.

"Look, what a tail!" the drover cried;
"Twould make a million kingly pride
When courtly fancies fail."
"What! that a tail?" the rogue replies,
"Don't think to blind these precious eyes;
For I am not a calf."

The drover paused upon him quick,
And beat him with a stem at stick,
Until his arms did tire;
Old Stiggins laughed, and yelled in fear;
The sutee did charm the truthful ear,
When the drover left the liar.

At last old Stiggins lost his breath,
"Twas stolen by the hand of Death,
His mouth quoth he, "I'm done."
And as his friends did take their leave,
They heard the rogue declare
When they found him lying still.

An Irishman being asked by his angry master what he did to the dog that he had broken his cur on at 6 o'clock he treated, replied, "Cruelty trait him, yer honor!—not if I never seen't a sorry sight in my life, sir, than his; and yer honor bade me cut his tail, and so I cut only a little bit off every day, as I thought it would be aisy for him."

"Are you going in any business?" asked Jim Brown, as he met Tim Smith strolling up Whitechapel, the other morning. "Why, no, I don't think so," but I am going to open a shop very soon." "Open a shop?" "Yes, I am!" "What kind of a shop?" "Why, I'll open a bowsher shop!" "You must be joking. You know you haven't a farthing." "Well, I'll open it, then." "When?" "Why! as soon as I can get a crust-bow," replied Tim, and coolly walked off, leaving the public, to see if he could not swindle some one out of a drink.

A widow lady, with her intended husband, a quaker, standing before the altar, the clergyman to be united to the holy bonds of reddock. "You have buried Mr. Johnson, then?" "Yes, friend, I have." "Oh yes, dear, dead, and-gone Mr. Johnson, I bet him, and it broke my heart!" "Yes, it has, my friend, my heart," replied the quaker, "and now you have come to me to have it re-paired."

A countryman came to London to sell his fruit, but for some cause or other, he was not allowed by the law to be the index of negligence, helped themselves to the contents of the panier. "Sir," said the disgusted fruit-seller exclaimed to the old lady, rolling her eye like a ship in a storm. "Not so much as that, sir, for I am not a ship." "No, you are the sea then, or was taking a nap, and the boys were only taking an airpole."

"What, miss, you here from boarding-school, and without asking my permission?" said an anxious father: "what's the meaning of this?" "Why, papa, I—I—I'm a—a—a less-senior, pa." "The locumotive? That's good." "Why, papa, I just said it was bad." "Did I? Well, there, I forgive you."

Letter X on type.

What two animals had the least hunger in the ark?
The fox and the cock, for they had a brush and comb between them.

How many young ladies will reach from London to Brighton, in being fifty miles?
Fifty, for a mile is as good as a mile.

Which is the fastest, hoot or cold?
Heat, because you can catch a cold.

What must you do if you have to make six?
Si, for is sixth S is six.

Why are the teeth like verbs?
Because they are regular, irregular, and defective.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE INVASION OF THE NORTH.

As we intimated in our last number, the rebels are fulfilling their threat of invading the North. It appears that the army under Lee commenced to move in a northwesterly direction on 9th June, and that General Hooker, discerning that Washington was the object of the movement, broke camp on 13th, a large body of rebel troops, how many or of what description we know not, crossed the Potomac in the vicinity of Shuter's Ford, and moved on Hagerstown, which was evacuated by our troops on 15th. In falling back, our people are said to have taken with them their stores, supplies, and guns. At 8 P.M. on 15th, the rebel advance-guard is said to have entered Chambersburg, which place we are likewise reported to have evacuated. Other rebel columns are described as moving on Mercersburg, on the one hand, and Waynesboro on the other. On 16th the rebel advance, consisting mainly of cavalry, was at Chambersburg and Scotland. The forces assembled for the protection of the State were at Shippensburg, Pennsylvania, Harrisburg was threatened, but it was believed that it could save it.

Of General Hooker's movements no precise account has yet transpired, though it is known that his entire army has moved in the direction of Manassas Gap. The President has called for 120,000 men, viz., 100,000 six months' men, namely, 50,000 from Pennsylvania, 30,000 from Ohio, 10,000 from Maryland, and 10,000 from West Virginia; and 50,000 New York State militia, to serve for a short period. Proclamations calling out troops have been issued by the Governors of Ohio and Pennsylvania, and troops are moving with alacrity toward the scene of conflict.

STRENGTH OF LEE'S ARMY.

It has been ascertained that the reinforcements reaching General Lee from the Carolinas and elsewhere have swelled his army to double the number of men in the battle of Chancellorsville. His force is divided into three corps, of 30,000 men each.

THE SIEGE OF VICKSBURG.

We have advices from Vicksburg and vicinity to the 13th inst., at which time the situation was nearly unchanged, though our lines were being daily contracted. The last steamer from Memphis had passed the army; Joe Johnson was still receiving reinforcements from the East, and was preparing for an attack. About 400 of Kirby Smith's force were reported to have come up the Washita River, and to be making demonstrations on the Louisiana side of the river, in consequence of which our troops at Millikin's Bend had been withdrawn. The siege is perfectly confident that Vicksburg will be taken.

THE FIGHT AT MILLIKEN'S BEND.

At the fight at Milliken's Bend on 7th the rebels, under McCullough, Green, and Gregg, advanced upon our force, composed of three negro regiments and the Twenty-third Iowa Volunteers. The rebel attack made a desperate charge at daylight. The negroes broke in confusion; but, finding that their captured companions were being slaughtered by the rebels, rallied with great desperation, and drove the rebels back, with heavy loss on both sides.

GENERAL KIMBALL'S EXPEDITION.

General Kimball's expedition up the Yazoo was a success. He went up the river in boats with a force of fourteen thirty miles below Yazoo City, and arrived there on the 4th inst. He learned that a rebel force, under General Wirt Adams, 2000 strong, was not far off, and he immediately moved out to attack it. At 10 A.M. on Thursday the 4th inst., he came up with the pickets of the enemy, when a brisk fight ensued, lasting thirty minutes. The enemy gave way, and a total rout ensued. Our loss was but seven killed and seventeen wounded. The rebels killed and wounded was considerable. We captured a hundred prisoners.

THE DEFENSES OF PORT HUDSON.

A most interesting description of Port Hudson and the state of things there has been given to the Herald by a gentleman who visited it. It appears that the defenses of the place consist not only of fortifications and heavy artillery bearing both upon the river and upon the land, of entrenched chasts, stretching out for nearly ten miles in a semicircle, bristling with batteries of heavy calibre. The water defenses consist of ten batteries, numbering between thirty and forty guns, the largest of which is a 13-inch and other 13-inch bore. One of these batteries is stationed on a bluff 200 feet high. The strength of the garrison is between four and five thousand, but their provisions and ammunition are said to be in abundance. The post is commanded by General Franklin Gardner, a graduate of West Point, and formerly an officer in the United States army.

THE RECENT CAVALRY FIGHT.

The rebel reports of the great cavalry fight on the Rappahannock, on Saturday, Fitzhugh Lee was wounded, and that a number of prominent rebel officers were killed. The correspondent of the Herald says that about 30 killed, wounded, and prisoners, and that we gained so much ground as to drive the General Stuart's forces entirely into brandy, and also near Brandy Station.

General Stuart, with his cavalry, has replied to a flag of truce sent by General Pleasonton that all our wounded in the cavalry raid at Brandy Station had been decently interred, and that all our wounded prisoner were being well treated. He also sent word to permit the friends of the dead to cross his lines for the purpose of moving their remains.

HORSE REBEL PRIVATEERS.

Two new privateers have been made their appearance, and it would appear from all the reports that they are scouring the Atlantic Ocean as far down as Brazil, and from that point round into the Pacific, to intercept our vessels from China and India. The Secretary of the Navy has proceedings on the part of the rebel navy appear to have worked up our Navy Department, for four United States vessels were sent from this port on 18th; three were ordered to the Mediterranean, and one to the coast of Africa are under orders to follow immediately to hunt up the Clarence or Tuscaloosa. Two sailing vessels, captured by the pirates, have been converted into privateers. The Clarence is described as a vessel of 1000 tons, mounts 6 of the square, four United States vessels—the Dorcas Prince, Ben Lewis, Crenshaw, and Tacony—have valuable cargoes.

WHAT OUR BLOCKADERS ARE DOING.

The Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Fox, reports somewhat that the action of the blockading fleet is unknown. He states that up to the 1st of June they captured 300 rebel vessels, which shows that the Department has not been asleep all the time.

THE OPPOSITION AGITATION CROPPING OUT.

In Indiana recently some resistance has been shown to the enrolling officers doing their duty under the Conscription Act. Deputy Provost-Marshal, a detective, and an enrolling officer were fired upon on Wednesday near Manville, in Rush County, and the first two killed. Two companies of soldiers have been sent to the locality of the murder. A soldier was also shot at Shelbyville, Indiana, on Wednesday, by a deserter whom he was attempting to arrest.

VALLANDIGHAM.

It is understood that Mr. Vallandigham has proceeded to some Southern port, from which he intends to take his passage for Europe.

FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

THE ELECTIONS.

The French elections, conducted under a universal suffrage law, were concluded on the 3d inst. The Government candidates were defeated in every district of Paris save one. They were carried in several districts, by very few exceptions. Of two hundred and sixty-eight elections the Emperor's friends gained two hundred and seventeen. It was thought the Opposition in the new Legislative Body would number from fifty to sixty members of independent and name. This result was regarded as very unfavorable for Napoleon. Thus did not cause a single rise or breach of the peace in the whole extent of France during the two election days.

POLAND.

THE INSURRECTION.

The Poles have again defeated the Russians in battle. France, England, and Austria forwarded a joint note to the Czar, asking a representative government and an amnesty for Poland. The French Emperor having invited the United States Minister to the Tuileries, and also their representations to Russia, Secretary Seward declined to receive the message, and sent word that non-interference in European affairs must be adhered to. Mr. Seward's note has been published in St. Petersburgh.

JAPAN.

WAR WITH ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

The English Admiral has demanded of the Japanese Government a large indemnity for the murder of Mr. Richardson, and the murderers of Mr. Richardson, being subjects of the Tycoon, would not be tried by the Japanese. The Admiral dates thirteen British vessels of war and two French were in the Japanese waters. The Japanese had hostile intentions, and all the merchants had been ordered to take on board foreign residents in case war commenced.

THE APPROACHES TO VICKSBURG—THE CENTRE UNDER MCPHERSON.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 405.]

THE SIEGE OF VICKSBURG.

We continue in this number our series of illustrations of General Grant's operations before Vicksburg, from sketches by Mr. Theodore R. Davis. The pictures will be found on pages 401, 404, and this page. Mr. Davis writes:

"THE APPROACHES AT VICKSBURG.

"HEAD-QUARTERS OF MAJOR-GENERAL M'PHERSON, May 5th, 1863.

"The sketch is of an incident coming under my observation while, a few days since, I was making my way, with due regard for personal safety, through the trenches and rifle-pits to a point from which a near view of the rebel works could be obtained.

"An officer of General M'Pherson's staff, a fine shot, had taken his rifle, and was, with the sharp-shooters, rendering it an impossibility to use a gun that had been used to annoy our men at work in the trenches. A sharp-shooter from the rebel works was crawling, as he thought, unseen, to a point nearer our line. A hat placed invitingly was, in a few moments, shot through by the ball from his rifle.

"The moment was the rebel's last; he had exposed his head in shooting. And the sharp-shooting officer now wears an airy hat. I am told by a deserter that seventeen men have been shot from a spot called by them 'The Dead Hole.' Lieutenant-Colonel Strong, the sharp-shooter, is the officer whose gallant escape from the rebels, some time since, near Washington, was the subject of an illustration in this journal."

"THE CENTER, UNDER COMMAND OF MAJOR-GENERAL M'PHERSON.

"HEAD-QUARTERS SEVENTEENTH ARMY CORPS, May 28, 1863.

"The view at this point conveys perhaps a more comprehensive idea of the difficulties presented by the exceedingly broken formation of the country than that at either the right or left. Sketches of each position will follow this. Some of our troops have gained by approach a point distant from the main work of the enemy but fifty yards.

"The battery of the late gallant Captain De Selyer was intrenched by him within one hundred yards of the enemy's fortification. Many and heavy guns are within three hundred yards of the same work.

COTTON BRIDGE OVER THE BLACK RIVER.—[SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

"From our batteries and sharp-shooters an effective fire is kept up to cover the construction of works that will, without doubt, effect the ultimate fall of the strong-hold.

"A most gallant but unsuccessful attempt was made upon the 21st inst. to carry these works by assault. Since that time the sharp-shooters upon either side have been busy enough. The ping of a shot is sure to follow the exposure of any portion of one's person. My pony and sketch-book bear indubitable evidence that sketching in plain view of sharp-eyed rebels must be rapid enough.

"One can hardly realize the fact that our gallant men are, with the flag that the breeze ruffles, within a stone's-throw of a work of immense strength. To dislodge our men the rebels send, ever and anon, a shell, thrown by hand. Some of these grenades are seized by our men as they come rolling and fizzing into the trench, and hurled back to explode within the works of the senders.

"Confidence of the fall of Vicksburg is the one feeling of our army."

"THE COTTON BRIDGE OVER THE BLACK RIVER.

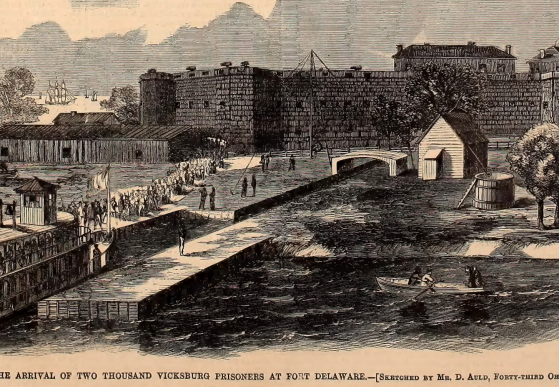
"HEAD-QUARTERS OF MAJOR-GENERAL M'PHERSON, SIEGE OF VICKSBURG, May 30, 1863.

"We had fought the battle of Champion's Hill and captured the extensive line of works at the railroad bridge over the Black River; but the bridge was destroyed, and a deep and narrow stream was between us and Vicksburg. Our engineers were soon, with their working parties, tearing down the 'gin-houses' upon the adjacent plantations. With the timbers so procured rafts-bridges were soon in process of construction.

"One of the bridges built by General M'Pherson's corps was so entirely novel that I send, with my sketch, a detailed account of it. Two heavy beams thirty-five feet in length were joined together by smaller beams ten feet in length, spiked two feet apart. This frame now turned over, cotton bales were rolled into it in two rows, and secured by stanchions at the side of each bale, and a beam crossing the top. These rafts so fitted were now launched into the river, and, floated into place, were secured by guy-ropes from the shore; stringers then placed, 'breaking joints,' the entire length of the bridge, which was then 'decked over' with plank from the demolished 'gin-houses.' Over this bridge the troops, artillery, and baggage trains were safely passed.

"The ingenious constructor of this bridge, Major Hickenlooper, Chief Engineer of General M'Pherson's corps, has, during this brief but brilliant campaign, earned for himself a most enviable reputation.

"This bridge is certainly the most easily constructed, as it is the most secure, of any impromptu bridge known. The buoyancy of a 500-pound bale of cotton is quite 400 pounds, and serviceable for eight days."



ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

We illustrate on pages 408 and 409 a preliminary incident of the third passage of the Rappahannock by our troops—namely, SHELLING THE REBELS OUT OF THEIR RIFLE-PITS. Mr. Waud, the author of the sketches from which our pictures were taken, writes:

"The rifle-pits erected by the enemy entirely commanded the crossing; therefore it was necessary to either drive them out, or make it so dangerous to rise above the parapet that but few would attempt it. The artillery massed on the river-bank did this effectually. Lieutenant Wollaston's battery of Napoleons (Battery D, Second Regulars) did magnificent practice; hardly a shot missed the earth-work; its defenders, the Second Florida, were kept enveloped in smoke and dust; and yet so great a protection is a little bank of earth, that not a man was killed, though some were severely wounded. With a loss of some forty killed and wounded engineers—including Captain Cross, a very fine officer, and a graduate of West Point—the boats were carried down to the water and launched; the Twenty-sixth New Jersey were ferried over, and carried the work at the point of the bayonet, capturing some eighty prisoners.

"Some of these endeavored to get away by running down the river, but a well-directed fire from Lieutenant Wollaston's battery brought them to a stand-still, and they threw down their arms.

"The First Massachusetts battery was there, and also did good execution. We now hold the southern bank of the river—Ayre's, Macartney's, and Wollaston's batteries in front, supported by the Vermont brigade, one of the very finest bodies of soldiers in the United States. I heard a pretty little anecdote of these men in connection with Wollaston's artillery. While that officer was lying on the ground upon a paulin, among his guns, a tall soldier came and placed himself alongside, and asked his name. The Lieutenant told him. "They do say you are from Vermount," said the Green Mountain boy. He was informed that such was the case; and upon further inquiry learned that the battery was formerly commanded by Captain (now Colonel) Platt, also of Vermont. "Then, said the man, rising, and stepping off like a rooster, "a whole crop can not take this battery while the Old Vermont brigade supports it!"

THE ARRIVAL OF TWO THOUSAND VICKSBURG PRISONERS AT FORT DELAWARE.—[SKETCHED BY MR. D. AULD, FORTY-THIRD OHIO.]

"SENSATION."

NATIONALLY speaking we write very much as we eat, with cruel disregard of our digestion, be it mental or physical. Judge a nation by its habits, and said some one, it would be an inconsistency in me to remember who); but we neither make nor sing ballads. Those are for people who take siestas and dance to orange-groves or about May-poles—people who keep sheep, and have traditions, and are just as much a product of the country as the heather or the twilights.

We scribble—every body—on every subject. There is found plenty of it. Great events are upon us, trip us up; great discoveries half blind us with the truths they are letting in on our accustomed treadmill of trains of thought; and in this feverish age, when the whole world goes on at a mail gallop that makes the calm days when pamphleteers angels coming in at their doors incredible, the mighty Union artery fairly bounds with the hot flow of the mingled blood of every nation under heaven.

All this whirl and fire and fever must find vent, and has it, in the sensation writing—good for its appropriate expression, partly from necessity; for this strange thing, for which we have coined a name for want of other expression of our form of thought and action, is a veritable Briareus, clutching at all our being and doing, down to its least detail—our walking, talking, building, dressing, governing, our very religion; even so grim a thing as our war—which—all scent of it rushed in the presence in any one of these conditions necessitates it in all.

So it occurs that in the intellectual arena the sensation writer is in the stock-market; two-thirds desire money, the other third are after fame, and all combine, something like this: the duchesses who compromised on the sugar-tongs—that is, each in turn held the other's tongue with them—think the world will find out the story, and held wriggled mightily is not apropos, but I append it for the benefit of femininity).

There is no doubt of this element, for the Sensational creed reads something on this wise: The longest advertising column and the hugest placard within the reach of you are going to be the words about your probabilities, and accurate with your facts, you will be detected and thrown out of office; if you mean to stop for scruples of conscience or grammar, you are too nice for your profession; but if you have any thing to say, you must say it in the next generation, to-day can't wait for you; a great truth, a noble thought, is only the product of a lifetime, a glorious harvest, with the sickle for, if you can afford it! says the Age with a sneer.

If Right were the thing we battled for we could afford it; but "Sensation" is not only our living but our object also; and for those who won't bow down to the great golden idol there is very apt to be a fiery furnace of poverty and persecution in waiting. In the days of Nebuchadnezzar there was wood found bulbul, and in that respect I think we are something better than the Babylonians; but I am talking to my fellow-scribers—those who, with me, bow down to the dust and ashes of the times. I mean to berate our idol. I can do so safely, it being the fashion; for it is hard to tell whether the magazine and the sensational number of the weeklies with more contempt than the fullfledged book the frothy articles of the magazine, or the daily review the last new book or pamphlet edition. So all the way through I shall be in line with some one, and therefore I can put my own samples for us all; for there is the necessity—the money and fame considerations hinted at—and there is the complimentary nature of a theme for the next generation, viewed in the light of the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick-maker, as patitive and the sentiment. Sensational articles are simply writing made easy. They require little time, and comparatively no brain wear; only tact, and a general knowledge of the technicalities of the different schools—for sensational writing has its schools. Mrs. Browning's "commonplace, worn with proper sense of difference as to quality;" dissimilar in style, but identical in object, and all equally ways of achievement. Take the following recipes in witness.

The Valenciennes:

Must have, not all its story; shadow emotions, rather than paint them; deal with life in a rosecolored, almost, distant way—at the finger-tips, as it were. If you prefer pourally with a pair of Chinese vases or a scrap of stormy twilight, and ends with a marriage. You come out of it very much as a mouse might out of a rag-bag, a nice rag-bag. You have nothing very positive. Change the characters all around, and go over the story again, it would make no very special difference. You have reminiscences of a knot of gay ribbon, dainty slippers, white fingers, perfumes, generally a rocking-chair, a long dressing-glass, silver-topped bottles, a ring (it must be a signet, and be particular about the crest and armorial bearings, for that tells), glances, rising color, and a keen look (masculine, that last).

Analyze it, and you will find a bunch of violets or a coral comb to be at the root of the matter; all the rest are but accretions. Indeed for a Valenciennes article best look in at Fountain's or Ball & Black's for half an hour previous to composition. Commence with the trinket that pleased you, and stir in circumstances and pretty girls to taste. There is no better recipe.

The Poker and Tongs:

Deals in paragraphs and cast sentences. The men bully the women, swear, and are not too delicate; the women violate all the proprieties and some of the commandments, and make faces. All the characters smart, and you imagine them closing their sentences with a snap like a cross cut. Indeed the principal incentive for reading is the natural desire to hear the success that these repulsive people will offer for falling in love with each other, as they do persistently.

The Lucifer Style:

Natural product of utter weariness of the four people who have transmission every Sunday of epigsy who steals that inevitable child; the fairhaired heroine who lounges on river banks in white crape wrappers and dies of grief; the dark young lady who serves a battery, takes the helm of a man-of-war, snuffs out a candle with a pistol-ball, crushes and sets every thing straight in the story with equal nonchalance and success. We must have our crimes, but with the spice of vraisemblance given. The author makes of us all amateur policemen: we have the excitement of the thing, and we hunt our villains through the highways of life (I take these walks on faith: I have never seen them, or found them on either Jury or directory). We unearth him in courts of law, and hear counsel on both sides; we deal largely in secret drawers and old-fashioned desks, and are very particular about the appointments in what looked directly on the lawn, facing the wing in which was located Sir James's study. And what shall I say of the Lucifer? I shall be false to tell of the stalwart sailor, across whose bronzed and handsome features flitted a shade of scorn or anxiety as he thundered, "Haul down your foresails! belay the clew-lines! fort the anchor! reef your rattlin's in the shrouds! and let the main-top-gallant sail! and crowd on the bowsprit, my hearties, as ever you wish to see your homes and your sweethearts again!"

Or of that excellent policeman—that diamond in the rough—who knew that something was up, the moment Lucifer looked to down in the mouth; and at last, says he,

"Craven,' says he, 'are you the man for five hundred dollars?'

"And says I,

"I reckon I am, if I know where they are to be got, and that they can be come by honorably.'

"And says he, 'You calculate to finish a job when you undertake it.'

"And says I,

"I generally go in lemons and come out on the squeeze.'"

And then he makes a clean breast of it. On—th Avenue, between —th and —th streets, there was a little shop that I look after sometimes, and on it, it being in my best, etc., etc., till his game is bagged.

Or of our Military Friend, who commences:

"It was after our little brush at— (pay close attention to the italicizing and the Seven Pines are as popular as any). We had fought like demons, but the enemy outnumbered us as usual. We had been compelled to retire a mile to the rear, and come to a farm-house, which we surrounded with our whole force, and, finding empty, entered with the utmost care. We were hungry, faint, and thirsty—rather thrizzle," etc., etc., ad infinitum, ad nauseam.

We analyze our swill milk and alum bread, and protest. I present specimens of the intellectual swill and alum bread, and protest as well as I can; it is impossible, annihilation being the only process of which they are susceptible), and ask should such be the staple?

It is true that every century has its sham, stalking triumphant on its stage, and for the time being believing what there may be of truth in it to be a sham out of sight. And it is true that our sham is to be builded and founded on our education, our prejudices, and our whole life; a wall of fire against for its destruction. But it is equally true that in all ages the lucky heirs of a truth, be it ever so unintensional, have had to ask and seek with sham, and that it is in the nature of sham to be beaten. And it is true that, every century and third century only half as much is earnest with their toy-hammers as I with mine, the result would be matter for chronicle. And, as to my work, it sometimes sometimes spring from deep beginnings, there can be much satisfaction and no special harm in firing off my pop-gun among the birds.

FRENCH DEAD (AND ONE KNOWN) SHOTS.

THERE are three instruments which the code of dueling recognizes: the small-sword, the sabre, and the pistol. In France, the first is looked upon as the national and characteristic weapon; the others are more or less barbaric and exceptional. Most Frenchmen are fencers, and learn that useful science as an accomplishment. The sabre is rarely met not, indeed, from his dying bed press upon his child the duty of being "always ready with the pistol," which was the affectionate instantaneous farewell of an Irish gentleman of some repute in his native country, but will take it as the last thing his son well grounded in the management of the rapier. Up to a recent period a Frenchman, when challenged, invariably named the sword.

The constitutions, however, distinctly recognize the pistol, and the peculiar variations which that special shape of weapon of battle is subject to take. First, the rude Anglo-Irish and semi-barbaric system may be adopted in all its rugged simplicity: a measured distance, the two combatants facing each other, and a signal. So might Rousseau's Indians, out of their State of Nature, and furnished by a pardonable anachronism with the explosive weapons of civilization, decide their quarrel about the charms of a squaw. The simplicity was Utopian. See how it can be refined into an elegant and more exciting pastime. First, for a duel a outrance, according to the technical name. Two lines, distant from thirty-five to forty paces, are marked off; within which are drawn two other lines, from fifteen to twenty paces apart, which is the nearest approach tolerated. According to the canon of the duel a outrance, the combatants advance cautiously, starting from the outside line, and holding their pistols downward. They can halt when they please, and can take aim when they halt, but not fire, which is only allowed when the line is reached. Thus, if one should fire before the first shot, he must walk on quickly till he reach the line, and then fire; but he has the disadvantages of a hasty aim and a long range. The moment he has fired he must remain steadily in his place, a prey to the most uncomfortable feelings, until his adversary shall have approached to his side, and covered him. On this account, in Ireland, there has always been a reasonable prejudice in favor of receiving the adversary's fire; the apparent risk being more than counterbalanced by the enormous advantage of a quiet aim without the disturbing influence of a hostile barrel, which must naturally confuse and agitate.

The duel a marche interrompue appears at first sight to differ little from the one last described; but there are grave and important points of distinction. Out of these various shapes of encounter the skilful amateur will find his advantage according to his experience, and the peculiar manner in which he is disposed during that experiment. There are the same lines, and the same distances between them, but the combatants advance in a single direction—halting and advancing like Indian skirmishers—with power to fire the moment either halts. This duel is a combination—modern one of form, it will be observed, but of principle, and much to be recommended to novices, who might court notoriety in the pursuit of their ideal. They will thus secure an early shot with a freedom from disturbing influences. There is, of course, always the chance that they will accept the adversary's fire without sign or protest. It should be mentioned, that in the case of a duel, the other is not allowed to advance further, but must discharge his pistol from the point at which he is standing.

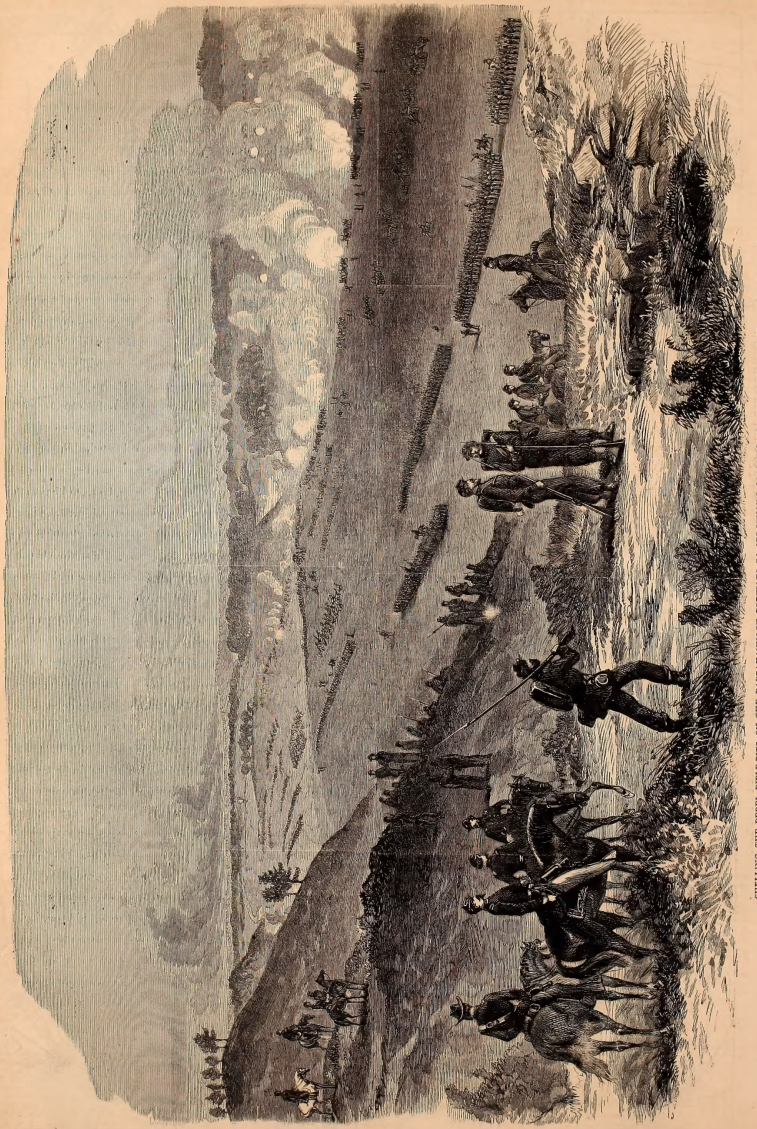
Next follow a duel a volonte, which is a near approach to the old Hiberno-Britannic fashion, and was doubtless meant to conciliate national prejudice. The duelists are to be given by three men of the hand, with an interval of three seconds between each. At the first, the parties were to move slowly one pace forward; at the second, to level, still walking; at the third, to halt and fire. The French are fond of the duel a feu roulant, after the fire signal, by so much as half a second, he shall be considered a dishonorable man; and if by this disgraceful manœuvre he shall have killed his adversary, he shall be looked on as an assassin. To minds less nice there would appear but little distinction between the two. But if the adversary who has been fired at thus dishonorably have been lucky enough to escape, he is allowed a terrible retributionary fire at leisure, deliberate aim, and a shot à loisir. Where one disgracefully reserves his fire after the signal, the disagreeable duty is found to be accorded to nothing in at all risk and peril—even in front of the weapon, if no other course will satisfy the demands of honor.

Then follows the Barriere, which is, strictly speaking, a generic term, and applicable to any species of combat where the space between the parties is enforced. Sometimes the term is applied to an arrangement by which the parties are set back to back, and at a given signal must march away ten, or any special number of paces, then turn round smartly and fire. This is, perhaps, the most difficult of all duels, and the many chances that the parties will miss each other. The veteran the gentleman who has gratified one of the legs and moors will have a fatal advantage in this hurried style of shooting. Allowance, however, should be made for a profitable experience of our neighbors among the robins and sparrows—a good range of practice among those tiny warblers will be of very great use in contributing to steady the eye and hand very considerably.

There is also the duel a marche non interrompue et a feux graduels, another cumbersome title for a very simple mode of arrangement. The inevitable parallel lines are traced at twenty paces from the centre (though it is a little mysterious how those marks can be "traced" along the green sward of the Bois de Boulogne), and the parties are started from points exactly opposite each other. They can walk either fast or slow, and can fire when they please, but are allowed to stop and reserve their fire a second after reaching the end of the march. This system, however, is not open to the objection that would be favorable to the person who receives the first fire and reserves his own, as he is allowed to be on route while taking his aim, and is limited by time and the short distance he has to walk.

Next in the annals of French dueling comes the fashion of turning the two adversaries into a dark room, armed each with a pair of pistols (Duel au Pistolet). Instead of as an encounter on horseback, armed with weapons of every kind. The first is worthy of gladiatorial days and the most savage of the Germanic, and there is something horrible in the notion of the two caged men springing round by the wall, with finger on the trigger, scarcely daring to breathe for fear of giving their enemy a hint of their position. There is a room, they say, somewhere of artful device to make the enemy deliver his fire first, the light from which would illuminate his figure, and render him a fair mark for the shot. These shapes of action the French code looks on as exceptional and highly irregular, refusing to take any notice of them, or apply its ordinances to their case. It throws out only one contemptuous hint in reference to them —namely, that all stipulations and arrangements must be put in writing.

The terrible duel a l'outrance, where so desperate was the character of the offence it was agreed that one of the parties should die on the ground, was contrived, by loading one pistol only. The other was primed merely, and the second holding them behind his back, the parties chose, by saying "The right," or "To the left." Then the end of a pocket-handkerchief was placed in each of their hands, and the fatal signal given. If the holder of the pistol pulled the trigger before the signal, he was justly dealt with as an assassin, in the case of his having the loaded weapon. In case of its proving the empty one, the opponent had the privilege of putting the muzzle to his head and shooting him on the spot. But these extravagances—outpourings of an indolent and sentimentally amiasmity—received but little toleration, and the general code, as we have mentioned, takes no cognizance of its incidents. Of the dramatic elements involved in a "situation" of this sort, that skillful dramatist, M. Alexandre Dumas, has made use to avail himself: he has worked this strata up according to true "Saint Martinsgate" traditions, in his melodrama of Pauline.



The chronicles of the Bois de Boulogne—taking that name in its widest sense as symbolical of such battle-grounds all over France) show many encounters between Frenchmen and foreigners. But the Bois de Boulogne has been also invaded by the beautifiers of the Empire, and its pleasant privacy for such meetings disturbed. It used to enjoy the distinction of being the traditional lists in lieu of all tournaments, just as Chalk Farm was the trysting-place for London, and the Fifties for "the busy mans or lees"—the attorney writing his challenge observed with professional accuracy on the back.

Going down to Marseilles about the month of March, seventeen hundred and sixty-five, we discover Lord Edward Bligh, the eldest son of the Right Earl of Glencarne, sitting in the theatre of that wonderful Mediterranean city. He happened to be there at the time with the permission of the fickist in that way, talked with an earnest loudness. A French officer in the next box, with the most attentive ear for performance, which he have not yet reached to, and that intemperate manner of reproving interruption, in which we are very happy for Englishmen, asked us to be silent—not roughly: "Paix! paix!" This admonition was unintelligible to the deaf lord, who maintained his conversation at the same level of pitch. The injunction was repeated several times with the same result. Then the gentleman politely frowned on, and, stooping over, said, with great violence, "Taisez-vous!" To him the viscount, at last restored to hearing, gave some short answer, and talked a good deal louder to show his disregard. It chanced then that the officer changed his box, and later on in the evening, he was wandering round the house, happened to come into the very box, of all others in the house, in which the noisy nonconformists stood at the door, his eyes roaming over the features of the officer. The latter, then boiling with rage, and in excellent determinate mood, struck him, started up and flew at the Englishman, asking him what he meant by staring at him. The other, no doubt, thinking that the affair had blown over, growled, said he had a right to look at any one even of royal rank. Up which the officer flew at him, dragged him out of the box, struck him violently on the shoulder with his naked sword. Upon which the dead Lord drew his sword gallantly; but, before he could make more than a pass or two at his man through the body, the officer's sword coming out at the other side of him. Those familiar with this part and Eastern port can fancy that scene in the open Place hard by to the Canebière, with the lighted lamps that were then the days of the gorgeous and fantastic Cafe Turc—and the colored awnings from the windows fluttering in the air, and the great crowd of people hurrying up to the scene by twos away. Strikes for the watch, a crowd, pouring down from the theatre, gathering round, and the Marquis de Pecoygiro, at the head of his guard, hurrying up to the spot where the poor Englishman lay dead. Then the gasping for breath, choking for want of air, while the crowd, with the stupidity of all crowds, pressed in still closer on him. But the hurrying guard made a clear round him, and saved his life for once. He was still, however, gasping and struggling there, when a message was sent at the place, and he, with all open the collar of his shirt, had him lifted up, and the doctor came to him. He was not dead, and could not speak; but, wonderful to relate, in three days was perfectly well. Some little interference of authority was apprehended at first, but the English embassador at Paris soon set all straight.

Two years before the great French Revolution, a French officer was arrested and thrown into gaol for the aphorism that "the English army had more pluck than spirit"—a sentiment which really had its germ of truth, but was awkwardly worded, verbed. He should have said that pluck was one shape of the spirit of the English army. The same little insolent Frenchman was artfully veiled under that of the Chevalier B——, and that of the French officer, who promptly challenged him, was thinly disguised under that of Captain S——, of the Eleventh Regiment. The offense would appear to have been a blow, but the particulars were placed at the alarmingly short distance of only five paces! Captain S—— fired first, and his ball "took" him, to use the words of the authorized report of the transaction, on the chevalier's breast, but by a marvel of good luck, was stopped by a metal button. The chevalier, touched by so happy a deliverance, magnanimously fires in the air, and secures himself from the English dash with spirit and phlegm. In illustration of this fortunate escape, it may be mentioned that, some forty years ago, a gentleman connected with the family of the writer of these notes, was riding out one morning in Ireland, accompanied by sympathizing friends, to arrange a little "difficulty" of the same description. When at the gate his eye fell upon a horse-shoe. With obstreperous cries of rejoicing he was called on to dismount and pick it up. All felicitated him on his lucky an omen. He put it into his pocket, and his adversary's ball actually struck it over the region of the heart and glanced off at an angle.

BOYS RUN WILD.

THE nearest approach to a wild boy, says Mr. Burnet Tylor—in the amusing new journal, the Anthropological Review, which is the source of all this information—was to be found in Germany, after the desolating spirit of Napoleon had breathed over the land. The countries ravaged by his armies fell into utter misery. Children without parents and friends, destitute and homeless, were quite common in Germany. Several of them were brought to the shelter of Count von Rantzau's asylum at Overdyke, and two of these had fallen more nearly into the condition of wild animals, were more wolves than children, than any others of whom there is unquestionable record. One of these children was brought in ragged and starving. Unable to tell his name, he was called Clemens, since he was received upon St. Clement's day. With a power of speech almost as limited as Caspar Hauser's when first found, nearly all that he could make intelligible was, that he came "from the other side of the water." He had also a large vocabulary of frightful curses. He had been set to keep a peasant's swine, had lived with them, and been shut with them at night. Scantily fed, he used to suck the milk sow, and eat with the little pigs. When first received at Overdyke he had to be kept out of the salad-beds as if he were himself a pig, for in the garden he would go down on all fours, and grub among the growing vegetables with his projecting teeth. He retained also a brotherly regard for the whole race of pigs, and wished to them so well that they would let him ride upon their backs. His pleasantest memories were incidents of his life among them as a pig. This Clemens, who had a narrow head and a low forehead, was of imperfect intellect, though not an idiot. Good-natured, laughter, and open fondness, he was liable also to uncontrollable fits of passion. Once, when he had tried to murder his benefactor with a six-cutter's axe that he held in his hand, he was carried away laughing to confinement.

The other wild boy at the Overdyke asylum had learned to live as the beasts of the forest, only prowling about villages of nights to steal food. He climbed trees like a bird, lived on fruit and nuts, and had extraordinary knowledge of birds and their habits. To such that he knew he gave a name of its own, and it said that the birds seemed to recognize the names he whistled after them.

Sir William Sleeman, in his narrative of a journey through the kingdom of Oude, gives a very curious account of a boy, said to have been taken when running on all fours with a she-wolf and her three cubs. The wolves all seem content with the river to drink when the boy was caught. The wolves, the boy themselves, are very shy even among the ravines which run down to the banks of the Goomtee River. They are wolf preserves, for the Hindoos have a game law. They are also spilled within the bounds of the asylum of the wolves, are said to divide spoil with them after the hunting. Very young children are given with costly ornaments upon them. Wolves carry off and eat their children, but reject the ornaments among their refuse, and for the chance of finding these, the vagrants patronize the wolves, and are to waiting near them thus.

Getting more spocryphal as it proceeds, the native account of the habits of wolves goes on to say that a he-wolf always eats the children of the gang, and so does a she-wolf, except when she is suckling; in that case she rears with her own young the stolen baby. Now as to the principal boy, to whom Sir William Sleeman found at Sultanpoor, and who was said to have been carried away by fostering down on all fours with the wolf foster-mother, and his three cubs of foster-brothers, to the river to drink. He was first caught, he had to be tied lest he might not run off into holes and dens. He ran away from adults, but ran at children, snarling like a dog to bite them. He ate his meat with the dog fashion, using his hands as forepaws; would let a dog share with him, but snarled if a man came near. The boy was sent to Captain Nicholetts, commanding the First Oude Local Infantry, with whom he became a favorite; but he grew much teased, ran to his fool on all fours, and ate whatever was thrown to him, preferring raw meat and bones to good food. He could eat half a lamb at a time, drink a pitcher of buttermilk without drawing breath, and would pick up and eat earth and small stones. He delighted in food, but not in decent clothing. In cold weather they gave him a quilt, but he tore it up and ate it bit by bit with his bread. This boy was of repulsive aspect, he shunned human society, preferring that of dogs, but who showed no concern whatever at his death. This "beast child," who was supposed to have been taken from the wolf at nine or ten years old, lived three years among men, making slight progress in a few signs—when hungry he pointed to his mouth —and was never known to speak all a year and a half before his death, when he put his hand to his head and said it ached, asked for some water, drank it, and then said he knew few words more before death might have been the return of an old childish impression.

Another of Sir William's stories is of a boy said to have been carried off by a wolf when three years old, and to have lived in forests nearly seven years, at Chupra. Six years afterward he was caught when going down to the river with three wolf cubs, and recognized by a birth-mark, as well as by the scar of a scald and the marks of the wolf's teeth in his loins; for she had been seen to take him and carry him off by his loins. This boy was alive at the time of Sir W. Sleeman's visit. He could not articulate words, his knees and elbows were hardened with going on all fours. He followed his mother about for what he could get, but at night he would make off to the jungle. He also liked his meat uncooked. The village boys threw crops to him and he ate them. When a bullock died and his skin was taken off he would go and eat it like a village dog.

The unproved fact in the case of both these blind boys, who had been outcasts in the woods, is the wolf-nursing. The notion of wolf-rearing is commonly attached in India to the outcast little children, who are sometimes found living, like the beasts, upon what garbage they can find.

In Poland the name bard has come to such unhappy children credit or discredit for having been reared among the bears. Of one such boy, caught two centuries ago in a beat-hunt, it is said that he appeared to be eight or nine years old, went on all fours, and ate greedily such things as bears love—raw flesh, apples, and honey. He was taken by the king at Warsaw and baptized Joseph. With difficulty he was taught to walk upright. He never could learn Polish, but expressed his views of life with an ursine growl. The king gave him to a vice-chamberlain, who employed him to carry wood for his kitchen. He never lost his wildness, and sometimes escaped into the woods, where the bears never molested him.

Such stories are not more credible, though more honestly set forth, than that of the Irish boy established at Amsterdam as having been reared by a sheep, so that he ran upon all fours, cropped grass, and bleated.

CHAPTER XV.

THE two supple dusky forms went whirling so fast, there was no grasping them to part them. But presently the negro seized the Hindoo by the throat; the Hindoo caught him in the arm with his knife, and the next moment his own head was driven violently against the side of a cabin with a stunning crack; and there he was, pinned, and wriggling, and bluish with fright, whereas the negro's face alone showed none. It was dark-gray with rage, and its two fireballs of eyes rolled fearfully, as none but African eyes can roll.

Fullalove pacified him by voice and touch: he withdrew his iron grasp with sullen and lingering reluctance, and left the Hindoo gasping like a mortified fish. The cabin was now full, and Sharpe was now putting both the Hindoo's wounds in the splinter of bone was he. But Fullalove suggested there might be a moral distinction between things that happen in a fight and after it.

"Well, then, speak quick, both of you," said Sharpe, "or I'll lay ye both by the heels. Ye black scoundrelsh, what business have ye in the captain's cabin, kicking up the devil's delight?"

Thus threatened, Vespasian panted out his tale: he had discovered the Agra at sea, he assisted in calling the Hindoo, eternally provoking him about captain's daughter, and asking stupid questions: he had watched him, and seen the surgeon coming out with the good news that the captain's danger was reduced to a simple but very abominable egotism.' And he raised a ponderous fist to point the polysyllables: with this and the utterance would disappear the whole meaning: but Fullalove hung on the sable orator's arm, and told him dryly to try and speak without gesticulating. "I like your story," said Vespasian, with a pathetic sigh at not being let into him. He resumed: and told how he had followed the Hindoo, stealthily, and found him with a knife uplifted over the captain—a tremor that brought a cold shudder into them. And then a loud murmur filled the room: a very ugly one, the sort of snarl with which dogs fly at dogs' throats with their teeth, and men fly at men's throats with a cord.

"Be quiet," said Sharpe imperiously. "I'll have no bullying in my cabin, I tell you! Now then, you, Sir, how do you know he was robbing the captain?"

"How do I know? Yah! yah! Cap'n, if you please you tell dis unskeptical geenman whether you don't miss a lilly book out of your bosom!"

During this extraordinary scene, Dodd had been looking from one speaker to another, in great surprise and some confusion: but, at the negro's direct appeal, his hand went to his breast and clutched at it, and he gave a sudden loud cry.

"Oh, him not gone far. Yah! yah!" and Vespasian stooped, and took up an oil-skin packet off the floor; and laid it on the bed: "dis child gone him in dat at nigger's hand: and heard him go whack on de floor."

Dodd hurried the packet into his bosom, then turned all pointedly on Fullalove and said, "Now God bless you! God bless you! Give me your honest hand! You don't know what you have done for me and mine."

And, sick as he was, he wrung Vespasian's hand with convulsive strength, and would not part with it. Vespasian patted him soothingly all over, and whimpered out: "Nebber you mind, cap'n! You bery good man: dis child bery fond of you a long time ago. You bery good man, outrageous good man, dam good man! I propose your health: invalence directly!"

While Dodd was speaking, the others were silent out of respect: but now Sharpe broke in, and, with the national desire to hear both sides, called on Ramgolam for his version. The Hindoo was now standing with his arms crossed on his breast, looking all the martyr, meek and dignified. He inquired of Sharpe, in very broken English, whether he spoke Hindostanee?

"Not I: nor don't act it neither," said Sharpe.

At this confession Ramgolam looked down on him with pity and mild contempt.

Mr. Tickell was put forward as interpreter.

Vespasian. The damned old cuss.

Ramgolam. Seeing him often convey his hand to his bosom, I ascribed his unparalleled excellence to the possession of some sovereign talisman. Tickell managed to translate this sentence all but the word talisman, which he rendered "a fetich." Ramgolam's cautious—"artificle." Finding him about to depart to the regions of the blessed, where such auxiliaries are not needed, and anxious to engage to endless perfections here below, I came softly to the place where he lay—

Tickell. When I saw him going to slip his cable, I wanted to be as good a fellow as he is, so I crept aboard—

Ramgolam. And gently, and without force, made myself proprietor of the amulet, and inheritor of a few of its qualities—

Tickell. And quietly boned the article, and the captain's virtues. I don't know what the beggar means.

Ramgolam. Then a traitor with a dark skin, but darker soul—

Tickell. Then another black-hearted nigger—

Ramgolam. Came furiously and misappropriated the charm thus piously obtained—

Tickell. Ran in and stole it from me.

Ramgolam. And, to profit me of the excellences I was inheriting: and—

Here Sharpe interrupted the dialogue by putting the interpreter aside, and other men's virtues in irons: and the surgeon insisted on the cabin being cleared. Dodd would not part with the three friends yet: he begged them to watch him, and see nobody else came to take his children's lives.

"I'll sink or swim with it; but, oh, I doubt we shall have no luck while it is aboard me. I never had a single sixpence before, in all those years. What is this?—here's something in it now; something hard—something heavy: and—why it is a book!"

On this announcement, an eager inspection took place: and, sure enough, a bullet had passed through Dodd's coat, and waistcoat, etc., and through the oil-skin, and the leather pocket-book, and just dented the "Hard Cash;" no more.

There was a shower of comments and congratulations.

The effect of this discovery on the sick man's spirits was remarkable. "I was a villain to bolt it," said he, "and I beg my wife's pardon for it, and it has saved my life for them."

He kissed it, and placed it in his bosom, and soon after sank into a peaceful slumber. The excitement had not the ill-effect the surgeon feared: it seemed to refreshened him; and he slept long: but, on awakening, was pronounced out of danger. To tell the truth, the tide had turned in the night overnight; and it is to convey the good news on deck the surgeon had left him.

While Dodd was recovering, the Agra was beating westward, with light but contrary winds: and a good month elapsed without any incident affecting the fate of Cash, whose singular adventures I have to record. In this dearth please read up with a few lines of blacking. Fullalove did thank one colored lad a servant whose mission it was to black his shoes. This simply showed Vespasian's shoes, though better blacked than his master's, were any thing but mirrors, and that this child had his eye on them.

The black desperado emerged on tip-toe from Kenealy's cabin, just as Macbeth does from the assassination-chamber, and not only with a pair of boots in his hand instead of a pair of daggers; got into the moonlight, and finding Vespasian uninterrupted, assumed the whistle of innocence, and polished them to the nine, chuckling audibly.

Fullalove watched him with an eye like a rattlesnake: but kept quiet. He saw interference would only demoralize him worse: for it is more than probable he knocks clandestinely, like Revelry: men ditto.

He relieved his heart with idioms. "Darn the letter. It's fixed my flint eternally. Now I cave. I swan to man I may just hang up my fiddle: for this darkey's too hard a row to hoe."

It was but a momentary dejection. The Mixture was (inter alia) a Theorist and an Anglo-Saxon; two indomitables. He concluded to temporize with the Brush: and breed it out.

"I'm bound to cross the obscurious case with the catawamptiousest gal in Guinea: and one that never saw a blacking-bottle, not even in a dream." Majora canamus.

Oh the great African heart!" said Fullalove, after the battle. "By my side he fears no danger. Of all men negroes are the most capable of friendship; their affection is a mine: and we can only work it with the sword." And that is a ridiculous mining tool I rather think."

When Vespasian came out so strong versus Ramgolam, Fullalove was even more astonished; for after all it is not so much the heart, as the intelligence, of the negro, we albiculi affect to doubt.

"Oh the great African intellect!" said Fullalove, publicly, taking the bull by the horns.

"I say," said Mrs. Bercsford, maliciously; "down in the maps as the great African Desert."

"To blame the many accumulated ignorance" had an infirmity. This was, an ungovernable itch for brushing whites. If he was talking with one of that awful company, and now believed, race, and saw a speck of dirt on him, he would brush him unobtrusively, but effectually, in full dialogue: he would steal behind one, a knot of wires and brush whoever needed it, however little. Fullalove remonstrated, but in vain; on this point Vespasian would not yield to his reason. He could not keep his hands off a dusty white. He would brush the very miller of Dee. But the worst was he did not stop at clothes; he loathed ill-blacked shoes: woe to all foot-leather that did not glow like the skin furnished a serious standard of comparison. He was eternally blacking boots en amateur. Fullalove got on a rage with him and insisted on having his fellow-creature's leather alone. Vespasian pleaded hard, especially for leave to black Colonel Kenealy. "Colonel," said he, "is a gentleman, and is such a narration fine gentlemen spoilt for want of a little bit of blacking." Fullalove replied that the colonel had got a servant whose mission it was to black his shoes. This simply aroused Vespasian's shoes, though better blacked than his master's, were any thing but mirrors, and that this child had his eye on them.

"A servant!" said he. "Yah! yah! What is the use of white servants? They are not biddable. Massa Fullalove, I am bound to be reared at, I am bound, to kick up a dust, white servants unspecially, and the darkeys to brush em; and like em: and blow em up: and—and boots shine, a lily bit." He concluded with a dark hint that the colonel's servant was a very much thought better blacked than his master's, were any thing but mirrors, and that this child had his eye on them.

"Mesta inter prulis semper

Being now about a hundred miles South of the Mauritius, in fine weather with a light breeze, Dodd's marine barometer began to fall steadily; and by the afternoon the declension had become so remarkable that he felt uneasy, and, somewhat to the surprise of the crew—for there was now scarce a breath of air—furled his slight sails, treble reefed his top-sails, had his top-gallant, and royal, yards, and gaff top-sail sent on deck, got his flying jib-boom in, etc., and made the ship snug.

Keenely asked him what was the matter?

"Barometer going down; moon at the full; and Jonah aboard," was the reply, uttered doggedly.

Keenely assured him it was a beautiful evening, precursor of a fine day. "See how red the sunset is:

Evening red and morning grey
Are the sure signs of a fine day."

Dodd looked, and shook his head. The sun was red: but the wrong red: it was angry red: and, as he dipped into the wave, discharged a lurid coppery hue that rushed in a moment like an embodied menace over the entire heavens. The wind ceased altogether: and in the middle of an unnatural and suspicious calm the glass went down, down, down.

The moon rose: and instantly all eyes were bent on her with suspicion; for in the tropics the hurricanes generally come at the full moon. She was tolerably clear, however; but a light cloud sailing across her disk showed that a wind in the upper regions.

The night fell lower than Dodd had ever seen it. He trusted to science; barred the lee-ports, and had the dead-lights put into the stern cabin and scuttle: then turned in for an hour's sleep.

Science proved a prophet. Just at seven bells, in one moment, like a thunder-bolt from the sky, a heavy gust struck the ship, and laid her almost on her beam ends. Under a less careful captain her lee-ports would have been open, and she would have gone to the bottom like a lump.

"Ease the main sheet!" cried Sharpe, hastily, to a hand he had placed there on purpose: "ease the main, in his fury, took too many turns off the cleat, the strain overpowered him, he let go, and there was the main-sheet flying like thunder, and the sheet lashing every thing in the most dangerous way. Dodd was on deck in a moment. "Up, mainsail!" cried he of the clear parts, bunt-lines, and leech-lines; run them up!—Now then, over to wind'ard! Let go the main-bowline!—Keep to the main tack!—Belay!"

And so the sail was saved.

"Folkatle, there!"

"Sir!"

"Hands up: furl sails!"

"Ay, ay, Sir."

(Pipe.) "All hands furl sail, ahoy!"

Up tumbled the crew, went cheerily to work, and by the time the bells in the middle watch had furled the few remaining sails, and treble reefed the main top-sail: under this last the ship lay to, with her head as near the wind as they could bring it, and so the voyage was suspended.

A heavy sea got up under a scourging wind that rose and rose, till the glory and mighty pressure of that single sail treble reefed, heeled over so as to dip her lee channels. This went on till the waves rolled so high, and the squalls were so bitter, that sheets of water were actually torn off their crests and launched recurvously over them, not only drenching Dodd and his officers, which they did not mind, but threatening to flood the ship.

Dodd battened down the hatches, and stopped that game.

Then came a danger no skill could avert: the ship lurched so rapidly that the seams of her works opened and shut: she also heeled over so violently now, as not merely to dip, but bury, her lower deck port-pendants: and so a good deal of water found ingress through the windage. Then Dodd set a gang to the pumps: for he said: "We can hardly hope to weather this out without shipping a sea; and I won't have water coming in upon water."

And now the wind, raging and roaring like discharges of artillery, and not like wind as known in our seas, seemed to have put out all the lights of the world. The sky was inky black, and quite close to their heads: and the wind still increasing, the vessel came down to her extreme bearings, and it was plain she could not be on her beam ends. Sharpe and Dodd met, and holding on by the life-lines, applied their speaking-trumpet tight to each other's ears: and even then they had to bawl.

"She can't carry a rag much longer."

"No, Sir; not half an hour."

"Can we furl that main taupsle?"

Sharpe shook his head. "Till the first moment we start a sheet, the sail will whip the mast out of her."

"You are right. Well then, I'll cut it away."

"Volunteers, Sir?"

"Ay, twelve: no more. Send them to my cabin."

Sharpe's difficulty was to keep the men back, so eager were the fine fellows to risk their lives. However, he brought twelve to the cabin, headed by Mr. Grey, who had a right, as captain of the watch, to go with them; on which right he insisted in spite of Dodd's earnest request that he would forego it. When Dodd saw his resolution, he thanked the friend, and resumed the captain: and spoke to them through a trumpet; the first time he had ever used one in a cabin, or seen one used.

"Mr. Grey, and men, going aloft to save the mainmast, by cutting the sail away."

"Ay, ay, Sir!"

"Service of danger, great danger!"

"Hurrah!"

"But great dangers can be made smaller by working the right way. Attend! Lay out all on the yard, and take your time from one; man at the lee yard arm: don't know who that will be, but one of the smartest men in the ship. Next to him is; hold his knife hand well up; rest to see; and then in knives altogether: mind and cut from you, and below the reef band; and then I hope to see all come down alive."

Mr. Grey and his twelve men left the cabin; and hey! for the maintop. The men let the officer lead them as far as Jacob's ladder, and then hurrah for the lee yard arm! That was where all wanted to be, and but one could be: Grey was as anxious as the rest: but officers of his rank seldom go aloft, and soon fall out of their cat-like habit. He had done about six athletic, wiry, minutes instead of twenty-one, he spread his arms to seize a shroud on each side of him; by this he weakened his leverage, and the wind and ship came fiercely against him, and flattened him against the rigging as tight as if fixture had caught in a mountain for a hammer and nailed him with a cedar; he was spreadeagled. The men accepted him at once as a new patent rattlin with a fine resisting power: they went up him, and bounded three ordinary rattlines at a go off all his promontories, especially his shoulders, and his head, receiving his compliments in the shape of hearty curses: they gained the top and lay out on the yard with their hair flying like mainsail reefs, and got the place of honor, but Thompson, the jolly foretopman, who couldn't stand smoked pen nor cigar. So strong and so tough.

Thompson raised his knife high; there was a pause; down in went all the men, and away went the sail into the night of the storm, and soon seemed a sheet of writing paper, and soon lately it was not. Then the men, who had men came down, picked their officer off the rigging, had a dram in the captain's cabin, and saw him aroused from a nap on the locker, by a good service, and in the purser's for extra grog on Sundays from there to Gravesend.

The ship was relieved: she looked well, till the chronometer, their only guide now, announced a moment when the tempest would have to say appear, increased, and one frightful squall dipped the muzzles of the lee carronades in the water.

Then was heard the first cry of distress: an appalling sound; the wail of brave men. And they had learned to be brave here, and they still now. But now they knew something must go, or else the ship; the suspense was awful, but very short. Crack! came the fore top mast: a main top mast both gone; short off by the caps; and the ship recovered slowly, hesitatingly, trembling.

Believing her from one danger this subject her to another and a greater, Dodd ran to the companion that had fallen, unable to break loose from the rigging, pounded the ship so savagely as to threaten to carry away the stern.

But neither this stout captain nor his crew shirked any danger men had ever grappled with: most men were. Leaving mounting, they cut away the wreck to leeward; it was done: then to windward; this, the more ticklish operation, was also done very gallantly: the mainmast was the ship's quarter, and she drifted clear of it. Very breathless again.

At eight bells in the first watch it began to thunder and lighten furiously; but the thunder, though close, was not heard over the loud tremendous uproar of the wind and sea. It blew a hurricane: there were no more squalls now: but one continuous tornado, that blew the ship through that great gaunt skeleton, the ship's rigging and bare poles, howled and yelled and roared so terrifically as to make every man on watch a shuddering fool alongside. The overwhelming sea in which they were enveloped was streaked with devilish fire. The inky blackness added supernatural horror; the wrath of the almighty seemed concentrated in the gale that drop the black sky down on them for their funeral pall. Suckly Noah from his ark saw no such murky horror.

What is that? close on the lee bow: close: the flash of a gun: another; another; another. A ship in distress! Dodd's heart bled for her: ears; yet no sound: human thunder silenced, as God's thunder was momentarily, by one of his greater creatures in their mad rage. The Agra fired two minute-guns to let the other vessel ship know she was approaching her in helplessness, and her distress, and probably a companion in her fate. Even this companioning would be full of peril: for the two ships, if they were mere playthings of the elements; they might be tossed together; and then what would be their fate? Dodd ordered his mainsail to be great boiling cadron, and all the life split out.

Yet did not this new danger for a moment damp and sympathy into the thick black supernatural horror.

And came now calamity upon calamity. A tremendous sea broke the tiller at the rudder-head, and not only was the ship in danger of falling off and shipping a sea, but the sea broke hammered her awfully, and bade fair to stave in her counter, which is another word for Destruction. Dodd ordered the after-hatch to be taken open at once.

These words always carry a spare tiller: they tried to ship it: but the difficulty was prodigious. No light but the miserable deck lantern—one glow-worm in this dark night—and the motion of the Agra never on an even keel, and heeling over like a sea-saw more than a ship; and then every time they did place the tiller, and get the strain on with their luff tackles, the awful sea gave it a blow and knocked it away like a hair.

At last they hit it off, or thought they had, for the ponderous thumps of the rudder ceased entirely. However, the ship did not obey the new tiller like the old one: her head fell off in an unlucky moment when seven waves were rolling in one, and, on coming to the wind'ward again, she shipped a sea. It came in over her bow transversely: broke as high as the mainstay, and hid and buried the whole ship before the mast; carried away the waist bulwarks on both sides, filled the launch, and drowned the live-stock which were in it: swept four waterbutts and three men away into the sea, like corns and straws; and sent tons of water down the forescuttle and main hatchway, which was partly opened not to stifle the crew; and flooded the gun deck middle-deep.

Dodd, who was in his cabin, sent the whole crew to the pumps except the man at the wheel, and prepared for the worst.

In men so brave as he was, when Hope dies, Fear dies also. Hitherto now was to separate the fate of those he loved from his own. He took a bottle, inserted the fatal money in it, with a few words of love to his wife, and direction to any stranger that should fall in with it; secured the cork with melted sealing-wax, tied oil-skin over it, and melted wax on that; applied a preparation to the glass to close the pores: and to protect it against accidental blows and attract attention, fastened a black painted bladder to it by a stout tarred twine, and painted on it, Agra, lost, and his name on the bladder. He had logged each main incident of the storm with that curt, business-like accuracy, which reads so cold and dreary a record of these great and terrible tragedies. He now made a final entry a little more in character with the situation: "Gale increasing. Rolls in the morning watch clipped a heavy sea forward. The rudder became unshipped: and the ship barely manageable, brought the log and case on deck, expecting to founder shortly. Sun and moon hidden for two days, and the navigation perplexed: but by calculation of wind and current, we should be about fifty miles to the southward of the Mauritius. God save us all!"

He got on deck with the bottle in his pocket, and the bladder peeping out: put the log, and its case, under his arm, and by means of the life-lines crawled along on his knees, and with one arm aft, to the stern. Finding the men could hardly hold on, and dreading another sea, Dodd, with his own hands, lashed him to the helm.

While thus employed he felt the ship give a slight roll, a very slight roll, to windward. He instantly looked round with hope: for he cast his eager glance to leeward. There it is a sailor looks for the first spark of hope. Ay, there was a thick, dim, streak of light. He patted the helmsman on the shoulder and pointed to it; for now neither could one man speak for the wind, nor another hear. The man nodded joyfully.

Presently the continuous tornado broke into squalls.

Hope grew brighter.

Dodd, unfortunately, in one furious squall the ship broke round off so as to present her quarter to the sea as an unlucky moment: for it came seven times running mountain-high, and swirled itself over her stern and quarter. The mighty mass struck her stern frame with the force of a hundred thousand tons of water, and drove her forward as a boy launches his toy-boat on a pond. The ship did not make so little resistance, stove in the dead-lights and the port frames, burst through the cabin bulk-heads, and swept the cabin furniture, and Captain Keeneley in his night-gown with a table in his arms, bome on water three feet deep; and carried him under the poop ventilator, by way to the lee quarter-deck scuppers; and flooded the lower deck. Above, it swept the quarter-deck clean of everything: the capstan, the spare bulwarks: washed Dodd away like a cork, and would have carried him overboard had he not brought up against the mainmast and grasped it like grim death: half drowned, half stunned, sorely bruised, and scraping like a wounded human shell.

He held on by the mast in water and foam, panting. He rolled his despairing eyes around on the bulwarks that were all in fragments, with wide chasms, as between the battlements of some decayed castle; and through the gaps he saw the sea mountains rolling for him. He dare not move: no man was safe a moment, unless lashed to a mast or bulwark. He was expecting death. But presently it struck him he could see much farther than before. He looked up: he was clearing: the sky was a dirty white and dog visibly. And now the wind did not decline as after a gale; extraordinary to the last, grew itself out.

Sharpe came on deck, and crawled on all fours to his captain, and helped him to a bulkhead. Then they lay, and gave the crew orders.

The wind was blown out; but the sea was as dangerous as ever: the ship began to roll wind'ward. If that was not stopped, her fate was sealed. Dodd had the main trysail set, and then the mizen, before he would yield to go below, though drenched, and sore, and hungry, and worn out. Those sails steadied the ship; the danger was to go down by degrees: the celestial part of nature was more generous: away flew every cloud, and the sky became sky bluer and lovelier than ever they had seen it: the sun flamed in its centre. Nature, after those days' eclipse, was as lovely: it seemed a new heavens and a new earth. If there was an infidel on board who did not believe in God, now his mind did Him, in spite of the great hand: as for Dodd, who was naturally pious, he raised his eyes toward that lovely sky in heartfelt, though silent, gratitude to its Maker for saving the ship and cargo and her peoples' lives, not forgetting the private treasure he was carrying home to his dear wife and children at home.

With this thought, he naturally looked down, but missed the bladder that had lately protruded from his pocket; he clapped his hand to his pocket all in a flutter. The bottle was gone. In a fever of alarm and anxiety, but with good hopes of finding it, he searched the deck: he looked in every cranny, behind every coil of rope the sea had not carried away.

In vain.

The sea, acting on the buoyant bladder attached, had clearly torn the bottle out of his pocket, when it watched him against the mast. His treasure then must have been driven much farther; and how far? Who could tell?

It flashed on the poor man with fearful distinctness that it must either have been picked up by somebody in the ship ere now, or else carried out to sea.

Strict inquiry was made among the men.

No one had seen it.

The fruit of his toil and prudence, the treasure Love, not Avarice, had twined with his every thought, and which his fidelity as he had defeated two pirates, each his superior in force; and now conquered the elements at their maddest. And in the very moment of that great victory—it was gone.

THE SIEGE OF PORT HUDSON.

On page 412 we reproduce a sketch by our special artist, Mr. Hamilton, illustrating the Communication and Attack on the Enemy's Breastworks, Louisiana, by the capture by General Grover's division of the first rebel rifle-pit. The correspondent of the Times thus describes the affair:

General Grover started from Newport, six miles from Port Hudson, at 8 A.M. on Sunday the 24th, taking the road toward Port Hudson. His second brigade, under Colonel Kimball of the Twelfth Maine, and the Twenty-fourth Connecticut, were on an advance, leading the whole road through dense woods. They met no opposition until they reached the outer rifle-pits, about half past eleven o'clock. The reserve of the Twenty-fourth Connecticut was sent to the right which had the rifle-pits, and after a brisk and hard engagement of only half an hour drove the rebels from the rifle-pits possession of the pits.

General Grover then took a position right on the edge of the woods, about 200 rods from the nearest of the enemy's works, but, owing to the position of the land, could only bring his forces into play, and an artillery fight commenced, lasting from one to six o'clock, and leaving our men in the rifle-pits. During the time the artillery engagement General Grover went to the front, and a Parrott shell carried off the foot-leg of his horse, but the General himself escaped unhurt.

We have received another picture, also from a sketch by Mr. Hamilton, illustrating General Augur's recent Assault upon the Fortifications of Port Hudson—one of the most dashing acts of bravery in this war, so replete with heroic incidents. Mr. Hamilton writes:

General Augur's command had a grand and simultaneous attack from every part of our lines encircling Port Hudson at 10 o'clock on Wednesday, the 27th, General Augur, as early as 8 A.M. of that day, commenced a heavy cannonading upon the enemy's forces constantly pouring until 2 o'clock P.M., by which time Brigadier-General Sherman was directed to commence his assault as the same time on the left, had his troops in readiness.

General Augur's storming force consisted chiefly of Colonel E. P. Chapin's brigade, viz., the 48th Massachusetts, the Fourteenth Connecticut (Veteran), the 49th Massachusetts, by Colonel F. W. Bartlett; the 156th New York, led by Colonel Kenly, and the 75th New York, Colonel Adams also two regiments of Colonel Dudley's brigade, called the Louisiana Native Guards, the 2d Louisiana, under Colonel Paine; and parts of the 50th Massachusetts, under Colonel Messer.

Before commencing the assault Captain Holcomb's Vermont battery opened upon the view to draw their fire, which he did very effectively; and then the order for the assault was given. A number of brave fellows from each regiment had volunteered to go in advance with the forlorn hope, for the purpose of making a way through the most; those were immediately followed by others who had volunteered to form the storming party, and after them the various regiments with their colonels, all under the immediate direction of Major-General Augur in person.

The scene that presented itself to the view of our devoted men as they emerged from the woods was really appalling. Between them and the fortifications to be assailed lay a broad, open space, at least one-fifth of a mile, from right to left, and at least half a mile in depth from the edge of the woods. This space, originally a dense forest, but the rebels had ingeniously felled the trees, leaving the huge branches to interlace each other and forming with the thick brushwood underneath, a barrier all but impassable to even the human shade.

It was enough to daunt the stoutest heart; but our men pressed on, the staff to be served by any difficulties. The order had been given that Port Hudson must be taken, and by God, it should be.

In so horrible a place, where men could scarcely keep their footing, and were sinking at every step in their arm-pits, and tumbling along as best they could with their muskets and knapsacks, the rebels poured a murderous fire—the enemy all the while blazing away at them with grape, shell, and canister—the result may be easily imagined. It was wholesale slaughter.

But it was to test the heroism and endurance of our men. Onward they went—the old flag streaming proudly above them, while the fearless leaders led on in every direction—until they actually, many of them, fought their way through the last rifle-pit, and the rebels, unable to endure any longer the terrible and unequal contest, to the narrow open space between the two fires, gave way, and fled in every direction, many of them shot as they got back to the wood.

Such these two mortal hours many a brave soul went to rest. The dead lay in every direction, and the wounded, too, lay on the log, still went on, until he received a musket ball, which killed him, after he had done his part in a very few yards of the breast-works. Lieutenant-Colonel Cahill, of the Fourteenth, bravely charged in the thickest of the fray. Our loss in that brief space of time was severe—about 150 killed and 318 wounded—about 31 officers killed and wounded.

One of the most extraordinary instances of courage exhibited on this eventful day was that of Colonel E W. Kimball. This gallant officer had been severely hurt and already lost a leg in the Peninsula—finding it impossible to keep up the impetuous dash of his regiment, had the audacity to go on horseback—forming, of course, a conspicuous mark for the whole rebel batteries and sharpshooters.

Here the rebels were awed into respect by such an instance of heroism. "Who, in God's name, was that man who rode through the rebel rifle-pits?" was the question, of General Augur's staff, when he went under a flag of truce to ask for the dead. On being told the name, the rebel officer exclaimed, "He is a brave man, and we actually gave orders not to shoot him." The good intention was, however, not fulfilled, as Colonel Bartlett was twice wounded, through and through the same arm, and captured.

Another daring act recorded in our correspondence is that of Captain Holcomb, who, at the request of General Augur, Halsted, the Assistant Adjutant-General, Colonel Augur, brought up one time his battery, the Vermont battery, and dashed about the road, from place to place, directing and firing at the enemy, and thus saving many lives. In this daring feat Captain Holcomb was accompanied only by Major Halsted and his orderly man.

CAPTURE OF REBEL RIFLE-PITS, THREE-FOURTHS OF A MILE FROM FORT HUDSON, LOUISIANA, BY GENERAL GROVER'S DIVISION, MAY 24, 1863.—SKETCHED BY MR. J. R. HAMILTON.—[SEE PAGE 421.]

GRAND ASSAULT OF GENERAL AUGUR'S DIVISION ON THE FORTIFICATIONS OF PORT HUDSON, 27TH MAY, 1863.—SKETCHED BY MR. J. R. HAMILTON.—[SEE PAGE 412.]

A LETTER.

WHERE were you when I suffered? My heart was very faint;
It wanted a heart to lean on. Where was yours at the time?
I hope you were happy somewhere; I hope no passing taint
Of the chill air I was breathing troubled your softer clime.

I am thinking of you always, and I am afraid at night;
For before I dream, I fancy, and my dreams are fancy-marred;
And I see you lying wounded, with your face upturned to the light,
And I can not stoop to kiss it; and I think the parting hard.

I was reading alone—there was only the light of the fire—
When I thought you stood behind me, and I dared not turn my head.
Why was my heart so poor as to shrink from its best desire?—
I think you were there for a moment, but when I turned you were fled.

Where were you at that moment? Were you thinking of me?
Were you watching the turbans wind up the dry brown slope,
And, when they reached the top, and you knew they looked at the sea,
Were you dreaming of England? had you an hour of hope?

Oh, that hope is so weary; I have it always here.
Whenever it plays me false, they tell me I must not doubt;
But though they call it Hope, it is only a mask for Fear;
And it never lets me rest, and I think it is wearing me out.

You will hardly know me again, I am grown so pale and thin—
I looked in the glass to-day, and my face was old and strange;
And I felt a pang of dread when they told me the mail was come in,
For I thought, if you came home, that you would not like the change.

I suppose you are brown and fierce, and your eyes are ready to flash;
You walk erect and swift—you have always something to do.
Ah! you men are happy; you live with a burst and a dash:
Weeping wastes us away, but work ennobles you.

I am a pain in my home; they watch me with looks of distress;
Always they soften their tones when they ask me, "Dear, will you go?"
And because I want them to smile, I often smile and say "Yes;"
But when the dance grows gay, I wish I had dared to say "No."

For I should not like, when we sit together and talk and trace,
Our joy coming step by step through the gloom while you were away—
I should not like to see one doubt flit over your face:
"Perhaps she hardly missed me; her life was so light and gay."

Ah, a letter again! It brings no tidings to me.
I have not the heart to read, and I feel too languid to speak.
What! You are coming home! You are crossing the dear kind sea!
You are rushing home to me now! I shall see your face in a week!

He is coming;—where are you all?—he is coming. Do you not know?
See, I am kissing the words which I was afraid to read!
What are you saying, mother? Why do you look at me so?
"Ten years younger," mother? Yes, I should think so indeed!

HOSTETTER'S
CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS.

THE SOLDIER'S SAFEGUARD.—This is the title bestowed upon HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS by an officer of the United States Army, writing from the Valley of Virginia. He says in a letter to the proprietors, Messrs. HOSTETTER & SMITH: "In every instance where your Bitters have been taken regularly and systematically, as a protective against the bilious epidemics so common and so destructive here, they have answered the desired end, and you may therefore claim for your celebrated Tonic and Preventive the designation of the SOLDIER'S SAFEGUARD." —Wherever it has been tried in the army, the result has been the same. The soldiers themselves are clamorous to have it substituted for the pernicious liquors now used as stimulants in the military hospitals. Its well-known basis, Spirits of Rye, the purest stimulant, in the opinion of chemists, that can be produced from any substance by any process, and this matchless invigorant is medicated with a combination of the finest tonic, anti-bilious and corrective herbs, barks, gums, roots, &c., known to modern pharmacy. Hence HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS—the best and only preventive in malarious diseases, and the most powerful of all recuperants in cases of debility and utter physical prostration—should be in every army hospital and convalescent camp, and should form a portion of the medicine stores of every regiment in the field. Given promptly to the wounded, it would save the lives of thousands who must otherwise die of exhaustion on the battle-field. Sold by Druggists and Family Grocers.

Just Tribute to Merit.

AT INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION, LONDON,
July 11th, 1862.

Duryea's Maizena

Was the only "preparation for food from Indian Corn" that received a medal and honorable mention from the Royal Commissioners, the composition of all prominent manufacturers of "Corn Starch" and "Prepared Corn Flour" of this and other countries notwithstanding. The food and luxury of the age, without a single fault. Our trial will convince the most sceptical. Makes Puddings, Cakes, Custards, Blanc Mange, &c., without lumps, with few or no eggs, at a cost astonishing the most economical. A slight addition to ordinary Wheat Flour greatly improves Bread and Cake. It is also excellent for thickening sweet sauces, gravies for fish and meat, soups, &c. For ice Cream nothing can compare with it. A little boiled in milk will produce rich cream for coffee, chocolate, &c. Put up in 1 pound packages, under the trademark "Maizena," with directions. A most delicious article of food for children and invalids of all ages. For sale by Grocers and Druggists everywhere.

HUBBARD BRO'S
(IMPORTERS OF WATCHES)
NEW YORK.

Are receiving large importations of that deservingly popular jewelry, the

Railway Timekeepers,

WITH HEAVY STERLING SILVER CASES,
ESPECIALLY ADAPTED FOR ARMY USE.

Frank Leslie's Pictorial Newspaper of Feb. 21, 1863, says: "HUBBARD'S TIMEKEEPERS are becoming proverbial for their accuracy and reliability. They are particularly valuable for officers in the army and travelers."

The Army and Navy Gazette, of Philadelphia, in its Number of May 9, reviewing this watch, says: "We are glad to see that the last importation of the HUBBARD BROS. are meeting the enormous sale that such extraordinary enterprise as theirs so richly merits. These watches are novelties produced by no other House, far exceeding other manufacturers in point of accuracy and elegance. Fidelity and promptness to their patrons render the House a desirable medium for traders in the Army."

The RAILWAY TIMEKEEPER HAS HEAVY SOLID STERLING SILVER CASES, beautiful white enamel dial, handsome gold hands, with superior regulated movement, guaranteed to run and keep excellent time! Price per case of half dozen, $54. By mail, $1 65 additional for postage. Should not remit readily at from $20 to $30 each. Not sold in quantities of less than six. Also the celebrated

Magic Time Observers,

THE PERFECTION OF MECHANISM!

BEING A HUNTING OR OPEN FACE, OR LADY'S OR GENTLEMAN'S WATCH COMBINED, WITH FATHOM DIAL.

The N. Y. Independent, Feb. 19, in issue of Jan. 10th, 1863, on page 141, voluntarily says: "We have been seen a large number of watches, of which the HUBBARD Bros., of New York, are the importers. It is called the MAGIC TIME OBSERVER, and is a thinking and Fore Watch combined. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepiece for general and reliable use ever offered. It has within it and connected with its machinery, its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The case of this watch, composed of two nobals, has never before been offered at $24 gold. It has the improved ruby action lever movement, and is warranted an accurate timepiece." Price, superbly engraved, per case of half dozen, $108. Magic Watches, in most serviceable cases, for those proposing to buy at wholesale, $35. If sent by mail the postage is 16 cents.

VOL. VII.—No. 340.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 4, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3,00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

THE EXECUTION OF WILLIAMS AND PETERS.

We are indebted to Mr. James K. Magie, of the 78th Illinois Regiment, for the sketch of the execution of the two rebel spies, WILLIAMS and PETERS, who were hanged by General Rosecrans on 9th inst. The following account of the affair is from a letter written by the surgeon of the 85th Indiana:

HEAD-QUARTERS 78TH, FRANKLIN, TENNESSEE, June 9, 1863.

Last evening about sundown two strangers rode into camp and called at Colonel Baird's head-quarters, who presented unusual appearances. They had on citizens' overcoats, Federal regulation pants and caps. The caps were covered with white flannel havelocks. They wore side-arms, and showed high intelligence. One claimed to be a colonel in the United States Army, and called himself Colonel Austin; the other called himself Major Dunlap, and both representing themselves as Inspector-Generals of the United States Army. They represented that they were now out on an expedition in this department, inspecting the outposts and defenses, and that day before yesterday they had been overhauled by the enemy and lost their mules and purses. They exhibited official papers from General Rosecrans, and also from the War Department at Washington, confirming their rank and business. These were all right to Colonel Bayard, and at first satisfied him of their honesty. They asked the Colonel to lend them $50, as they had no coats and no money to buy them. Colonel Baird loaned them the money, and took Coulbel Austin's note for it. Just at dark they started, saying they were going to Nashville, and took that way. Just as soon as their horses' heads were turned the thought of their being rebel spies struck Colonel Baird, he says, like a thunderbolt, and he ordered Colonel Watkins, of the 6th Kentucky cavalry, who was standing by, to arrest them immediately. But they were going at a gallop, and Colonel Watkins had not time to get a regiment together with which to start out on the chase. He ordered the orderly to unsling his carbine, and if, when he (the Colonel) hailed them they showed any suspicious motions, to fire on them without waiting for an order. They were overtaken about one-third of a mile from here. Colonel Watkins told them that Colonel Baird wanted to make some further inquiries of them, and asked them to return. This they politely consented to do, after once expressing an element of the lateness of the hour and the distance they had to travel, and Colonel Watkins led them to his tent, where he placed a strong guard over them. It was not until one of them attempted to get the guard at the door that they were suspected they were prisoners. Colonel Watkins immediately brought them to Colonel Baird under strong guard. They at once manifested great uneasiness, and pretended great indignation at being thus treated. Colonel Baird frankly told them that he had his suspicions of their true character, and that they should, if spies, object to no necessary caution. They were very hard to satisfy, and were in a great hurry to get off. Colonel Baird told them that they were under arrest, and he should hold them prisoners until he was fully satisfied that they were what they purported to be. He immediately telegraphed to General Rosecrans, and received the answer that he knew nothing of any such men, that there were no such men in his camp, or had his pass.

Long before this dispatch was received, however, every one who had an opportunity of hearing their conversation was well satisfied that they were spies. Smart as they were, they gave frequent and distinct evidence of duplicity. After this dispatch came to hand, which at dist about 12 o'clock midnight, a search of their person was ordered. To this the Major consented without opposition, but the Colonel protested against it, and even put his hand to his arms. But resistance was useless, and both submitted. When the Major's sword was drawn from the scabbard there were found etched upon it these words, "Lt. W. G. Peter, C.S.A." At this discovery Colonel Baird remarked, "Gentlemen, you have played the d—d well," to "Yes," said Lieutenant Peter, "and I came very near a perfect success." They then confessed the whole matter, and upon further search various papers showing their guilt were discovered upon their persons. Lieutenant Peter then handed over to the Colonel a watch which he said formerly belonged to Colonel Wetzel.

Colonel Baird immediately telegraphed the facts to General Rosecrans and asked what he should do, and in a short time received an order "to try them by a drum-head court-martial, and if found guilty hang them immediately." The court was convened, and before daylight the case was decided, and the prisoners informed that they must prepare for immediate death by hanging.

At daylight men were detailed to make a scaffold. The prisoners were visited by the Chaplain of the 78th Illinois, who, upon their request, administered the sacrament to them. They also wrote some letters to their friends, and deposited their jewelry, silver cups, and other valuables for transmission to their friends.

The gallows was constructed by a will cherry-tree not far from the depôt, and in a very public place. Two ropes hung dangling from the beam, reaching within eight feet of the ground. A little after nine o'clock a. m. the whole garrison was marshaled around the place of execution in solemn ordinance. Two poker coffins were lying a few feet away. Twenty minutes past nine the guards conducted the prisoners to the scaffold—they walked firm and steady, as if unmindful of the fearful precipice which they were approaching. The guards did them the honor to march with arms reversed.

Arrived at the place of execution they stepped upon the platform of the cart and took their respective places. The Provost Marshal, Captain Alexander, then tied a linen handkerchief over the face of each and adjusted the ropes. They then asked the privilege of bidding a last farewell, which being granted, they tenderly embraced each other. This over, the cart moved from under them, and they hung in the air. What a fearful penalty! They swung off at 9.35—in two minutes the Lieutenant ceased to struggle. The Colonel caught hold of the rope with both hands and pulled himself up at 3 minutes, and ceased to struggle at 5 minutes. At 4 minutes Dr. Forster, Surgeon 6th Kentucky Cavalry, and Dr. Moss, 78th Illinois Infantry, and myself, who had been detailed to examine the bodies, approached them, and found the pulse of both full and strong. At 7 minutes the Colonel dragged his shoulders. The pulse of each continued to beat 17 minutes, and at 18 minutes all signs of life had ceased. The bodies were cut down at 19 minutes and placed in the coffins. Each was then was buried with a gold locket and chain on his neck. The Colonel's contained a lock of hair and a bead of hair. The latter, we presume, was taken from his wife's pocket—these were buried with him. Both men were buried in the same grave—companions in life, misfortune, and crime, companions in infamy, and now companions in the grave.

I should have stated in another place that the prisoners did not want their punishment delayed; but, well knowing the consequences of their acts, even before their trial, asked to have the sentence, be it by hanging or shooting, quickly decided and executed. But they deprecated the idea of death by hanging, and asked for a commutation of the sentence to shooting.

The elder and leader of these unfortunate men was Lawrence Williams, of Georgetown, D. C. He was as fine-looking a man as I have ever seen, about six feet high, and perhaps 30 years old. He was a son of Captain Williams, who was killed at the battle of Monterey. He was one of the most intellectual and accomplished men I have ever known. I have never known any one who excelled him as a talker. He was a member of the regular army, with the rank of captain of cavalry, when the rebellion broke out, and at that time was aid-de-camp and private secretary to General Winfield Scott. From this confidence and respect shown him by so distinguished a man may be judged his education and accomplishments. He was a first cousin of General Lee, commanding the Confederate army on the Rappahannock. Soon after the war began he was frank enough to inform General Scott that he was sympathize were with the South, as his friends and relatives were there, and that he could not fight against them. As he was privy to all of General Scott's plans for the campaign, it was not thought proper to turn him loose, hence he was sent to Governor's Island, where he remained three months. After the first Bull Run battle he was allowed to go South, where he joined the Confederate army, and his subsequent history I have not been able to learn much about. He was a while on General Bragg's staff as Chief of Artillery, but at the time of his death was idle Inspector-General. When he joined the Confederate army he altered his name, and now signs it thus: "Lawrence W. Orton, Col. Cav. P. A. C. S. A."—(Provisional Army Confederate States of America). Sometimes he writes his name "Orton," and sometimes "Anton," according to the object which he had in view. This we learn from the papers found on his person. The other, according to the procedure of Colonel Orton, I have gathered from the letters found from Colonel Watkins, who knew him well, they having belonged to the same regiment of the regular army—2d U. S. Cavalry. Colonel Watkins, however, did not recognize Colonel Orton until after he had made himself known, and now mourns his apostasy and tragic fate.

The other victim of the delusive and reckless daring

EXECUTION, BY HANGING, OF TWO REBEL SPIES, WILLIAMS AND PETERS, IN THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND, JUNE 9, 1863.—[SKETCHED BY MR. JAMES K. MAGIE.]

was Walter G. Peter, a lieutenant in the rebel army, and Colonel Ritter's adjutant. He was a tall, handsome young man, of about twenty-five years, that gave many signs of education and refinement.

Of his history I have been able to gather nothing. He had just a second part. Colonel Orton was the leader, and did all the talking and managing. Such as a succinct account of one of the most daring enterprises that men ever engaged in. Such were the characters and the men who played the awful tragedy.

History will hardly furnish its parallel in the character and standing of the parties, the boldness and daring of the enterprise, and the swiftness with which discovery and punishment were visited upon them. They came into our camp and went all through it, minutely inspecting our position, works, and forces, with a picture of their existence fastened upon them; and the boldness of their conduct made their flimsy subterfuges almost successful.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 4, 1863.

TO ADVERTISERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY has a circulation of OVER ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND COPIES, which extends over the whole country. Every number is probably read by eight or ten persons, so that advertisements in its pages reach the eye of more individuals than advertisements in any other periodical. It is issued in a home paper, and is found in every country house whose inmates take an interest in the thrilling events of the day. It is not destroyed after being read, as daily papers are, but is kept, and in many cases bound, placed in a library, and referred to from time to time. Advertisers who wish to bring their business before the notice of the public will find especially of the housekeeping class, can find no medium so suitable for their purpose as HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Advertisements should be in hand by TWENTY-FIVE DAYS previous to the issue of the paper in which they are to appear. The space allotted to advertisements is limited, and an early application is advisable to secure a place.

WANTED—A RESERVE FORCE.

GOVERNOR SEYMOUR has issued his Proclamation in pursuance of the requirements of the Legislature calling for the enrollment and organization—on a war footing—of the militia or actual guard of the State of New York. He contemplates a force of sixteen divisions. Which at the maximum would count 160,000 bayonets, but at the minimum would not exceed 80,000. Whether the acts of the Legislature and the proclamation of the Governor look to any other source than volunteering for the organization of this force

As the State of New York has sent over 150,000 men to the war, out of a population of 4,000,000, it may perhaps be questioned whether even so small a force as 40,960 men can still be raised, and kept in a state of efficient drill, on the voluntary principle. In this city and some of the interior towns the old patriotic excitement will continue to keep up their regimental existence, and will always have enough young men on the cross rolls to enable the officers to enjoy the privileges of the Militia Act. But it is quite doubtful whether such organizations can muster in the aggregate 40,000 men. It must be remembered that the bulk of the fighting population have gone to the wars, and are now in the ranks of the Union, in Virginia, Tennessee, Mississippi, or Louisiana.

In the other States, the deficiency of militia is still more apparent. In Pennsylvania even the invasion of the State did not bring out, in the shape of full regiment of militia, and it was New York troops who marched to Chambersburg to meet the invaders. This arises not from any lack of the spirit among the Pennsylvanians, but from the want of an organized militia or home guard. In the Western States there is no such thing as a militia except on paper. The war found the Northwestern States entirely unprovided with military organizations; and since the outbreak of the they have been so busy furnishing troops for the war that they have had no time to organize, and no means to arm militia.

It is clear, therefore, that we absolutely need a reserve force, armed, drilled, and equipped, and capable of moving rapidly to any point at which our territory may be invaded. For at men required to complete a victory by our armies. The mere organization of such a force would compel the rebels to abandon their aggressive projects of "carrying the war into Africa;" and contingencies might arise which would place it in the power of such a force to put an end to the to a close by rapid action at a critical juncture.

Two points are clear in this connection. In the first place, our reserve force should rather exceed than fall short of half a million of men; and, secondly, it should not depend on volunteering. It may safely be taken for granted that our fighting population proper is already in the ranks, and that there are no young men now at home who would prefer to be under arms. To ask the stay-at-homes to become volunteers of volunteer regiments is to prefer a request which will be generally disregarded. Every man will expect his neighbor to volunteer, and not volunteer himself. This is one of the cases in which compulsion is a necessity.

We can see no reason why the several Governments of the loyal States should not at once proceed to organize their militia on the plan of the National Guard of France and the Landwehr of Prussia—compelling every man between the ages of eighteen and fifty-five to enroll himself and perform military duty. The guard should be divided into two or more classes, after the [illegible] of the Conscription act, so that men of [illegible] age with families should only be called upon after the class of young, unmarried men had been exhausted. But every man in sound health, between eighteen and fifty-five, should be compelled to enroll himself, to provide himself with a uniform, to learn the manual of arms, and to perfect himself in company, battalion, and brigade drill. An hour three times a week could be spared by every one, and would not be too much to give for the end proposed. The effect of such an organization would be that in the course of a few months the loyal States would command a reserve force, armed, drilled, and equipped, of some 2,000,000 men, of whom at least 750,000 would be ready to take the field, on any emergency, at twenty-four hours' notice, to reinforce our armies, or complete any victory which they may win. Had we had such a force at our disposal, it would have been to rebel raids in Maryland and Pennsylvania. Had we had such a force last fall Lee's army would never have made good its escape after the battle of Antietam. Had we had such a force a year ago M'Clellan would have entered Richmond in July last, and the rebellion would have been over by the fall.

Such a system, once started, would be accepted cheerfully by all parties. In one in France or Prussia deems it a hardship to be compelled to perform his occasional day's service in the National Guard or Landwehr: nor would any one in this country deem it a hardship for a similar purpose here, though when we are asked to volunteer we have all other business on hand.

A National Militia, organized all made citizens, would naturally contain within it various minor organizations. Of these the most important would be the Cavalry regiments. A company of cool-headed, clear-eyed sharp-shooters is generally worth, in actual warfare, a brigade of ordinary troops. It takes, in real war, about 5000 cavalry to lead to victory 50,000 men. The English have realized this truth, and there are now in Great Britain over 250,000 men enrolled in volunteer rifle corps, each of whom can hit a mark at a reasonable distance. Were our State authorities to resolve upon the organization of such a system of militia, and, as we suggest, they would naturally provide for tests of marksmanship, and would, by offering prizes for good shots, gradually form bodies of sharpshooters who would be most valuable for actual service. Major Rowland, late of Berdan's Sharp-shooters, is already engaged in endeavoring to organize such bodies, and deserves to meet with success.

The mistake we have made throughout this war is mistaking our enemy—fighting him with one hand, and taking no advantage of our numerical superiority. It is time, if we wish to enjoy peace once more, that we should make our numbers tell. And the best way of doing this is by making every able-bodied man a soldier.

THE LONDON.

THE NATION AN ARMY.

IF there is one thing clearer than that Lee has for some time thought that the true movement is that the hurried marching of State militia to a threatened point for thirty days, or for six months, for "the present emergency," will not be of permanent service. The "present emergency" is the rebellion. It is to be met always and every where, and in the same way, with the same principle of action.

We have a line of more than a thousand miles to defend, in order to hold the Free States secure from the ravages of war. To prevent sudden and fatal calamity there must be constant and careful drill, and by their readiness to move as soon as necessity arises, to prevent the necessity, and in any direction. In every State the arm-bearing population should be an army as soon as possible. Let the militia-men be drilled, and arrange them as may be necessary, either into the main armies in the field, or to special points for temporary service.

Call it "conscription" or what you please, it is good. Certainly it is. And how can a republican nation conscript such a force as this except upon militia lines? It is not a measure which is liable to the sneer. The soldiers do not come upon hoppers to be torn from their homes and driven into the battle-field and return to tilling the corn-field. The rebellion is to be overcome, as a principle, by attacking it and keeping it attacked, day by day to the last spark. You do not make terms with it. You do not negotiate. You fight it wherever it appears, and as long as it lasts.

But the war, being in its nature a radical war—a conflict of systems—the old feud between the people and privilege, it is necessarily a long war. Every civil war is so. And it is made up of fluctuating fortunes. Now it is victorious, and it is going, it must be watched, not from day to day, but from month to month, as you watch the tide, not from hour to minute, but from day to hour. Like a falling tide there is often a mounting wave, which makes the flow apparently rising; but an hour hence the mounting wave falls below the point reached by the least wave now. Last September, sights some feeble soul, Lee was in Maryland and Pennsylvania, and now he is there again. Very well: where were we last September along the whole line? Are we in the comparative state of the rebellion then and now? Good, feeble soul, if you break your heart over any temporary defeat or aggression, it will certainly not last you to the end of a war which can be waged only by stout, cheerful hearts, that no liver can shatter and no mischance appall.

If, therefore, we are not dismayed and do not mean to be, but are really persuaded that we must fight to avoid wars worse than this war, let the authorities make the citizens soldiers as soon as possible: national soldiers, to march wherever the national welfare demands, under regulations that, while they do not weigh too heavily upon any man, yet amply secure an overpowering army.

A LOST LEADER.

THOSE who have been so loud in declaring, since the invasion of Pennsylvania, that the only hope for the country lay in the recall of General M'Clellan to the command of the Army of the Potomac should carefully read it will be very hard for the people to believe that the national salvation depends this week upon an officer whose name was cheered last week with the shout of Jeff Davis, by a meeting which insisted that we were "whipped," and that we must have peace at any price.

Nor will the personal confidence in that commander be stimulated by the fact that the Commander-in-Chief has publicly stated the reasons for the unconditional patriotism not for unswerving honesty, ask for his reappointment by a resolution stated that he was prepared by a Mr. Kerrigan, who before the rebellion was declared was engaged in raising troops apparently not avowedly for the Union cause, and who raised a company in our army, was court-martialed and cashiered.

Further, as we have heretofore said, can General M'Clellan's friends expect that the appointment of a man who has been so grossly abused by the party to-day will be received with enthusiasm by the party to-morrow? Is it not certain that a man who has been hailed with the loudest applause, and that all the Copperhead papers and orators, who are doing their utmost to paralyze the administration and secure the success of the rebellion, constantly commend him and his services.

Certainly it is enough to destroy all faith in the loyalty of Vallandigham that his name was mentioned in the rebel camps with admiration. But does any loyal man feel that there is any less pollution in the applause of Fernando Wood's faction than in that of Jefferson Davis? Wherever consents without protest to be commended by rebels, or by masked sympathizers with rebellion, voluntarily shares the odium of the company he allows to praise him.

General M'Clellan must see that every loyal man necessarily says to himself, "Why do the open enemies of the war praise M'Clellan? They do not praise Grant, nor Rosecrans, nor Dupont, nor Foote, nor Butler, nor Banks, nor Burnside, nor Schofield, nor Butler, nor Sigel, nor Porter, nor Hooker, nor Meade, nor Couch, nor Blunt, nor Farragut. And why not? These men are not called upon to protest—and why not? Their fame is moulded by Stanton and Cox, Wilkinson, Forney, Ryders, or Brooks. And why? Are Ryders and Company the man who are to be satisfied by the appointment of the commander of the national forces in a perilous crisis? Is it not the clear duty of the Government to ascertain who would to most degrade its forces, and place in their hands to avoid him with energy?"

Such questions ask themselves. If they do General M'Clellan injustice, who is to blame? If he has lost forever the confidence of all loyal men of all parties, is it their fault?

LOYAL CITIZENS.

IN the first days of the excitement in Pennsylvania every man in position an urgent official appeal was made "to the colored men of Harrisburg" to turn out to work upon the fortifications for "the protection of their property and the rights of the old Keystone State." Nothing could be more sensible. All loyal hands and hearts should work together in the emergency. And what is the concollary? That all loyal hands and hearts should share in the emergency alike. Still there is not that every loyal white Pennsylvanian check will be a little colored with shame by the reflection that he is "all right" because his defenders are the men whom she thus summons to her defense. And, above all, let us hope that nobody will lose his temper at the suggestion. For you may swear, and rail, and damn every nigger that was ever born to your heart's content, and be as hopelessly confused in your reasoning, and as ambiguous in action, and the intention of nature as you choose, but you will be quite unable to show yourself or any body else why an intelligent, industrious, loyal man is not a good citizen, whatever his color may be.

In the beginning of the war there were some who said that if we white men couldn't save the country, the niggers should have. They did not think so last week at Harrisburg. And they would not have done so last week if they had not. The sneer had neither principle, philosophy, common sense, nor common honor to recommend it. It was hototem of thoughtlessness and prejudice. Our Government is not one of race or color. It is not founded upon the points in which men differ, but upon the manhood in which they are all agreed. It does not aim at social equality, which is a mere phrase. It aims at the protection of the personal and political rights of all citizens. The war for its maintenance, therefore, is not that of Americans, or Germans, or Englishmen, or Irish, black, red, or brown races, but of every true man who lives under its protection.

MRS. KEMBLE'S JOURNAL ON A GEORGIAN PLANTATION.

THIS remarkable book, which will be issued next week by the Harpers, is just out in London. In speaking of works which are enlightening the English mind about us and our war, Mr. Conway says:

"The latest work of this kind, and one destined to produce a sensation upon both sides of the Atlantic, is that of Mrs. Fanny Kemble Butler, who has just published the Diary of her sojourn upon a Georgia plantation. It is very wonderful, and many think it more telling than 'Uncle Tom's Cabin.'"

The London Athenæum, in a long and elaborate review of Mrs. Kemble's Diary, acknowledges the graphic power and profound influence of the work, and confesses the revolting and necessarily brutalizing condition of a society founded upon slavery as the chief corner-stone. It concludes with the Athenæum's review of it, like that of the Spectator, will help open the eyes of people in England who, under cover of a sham neutrality, as they say they call "a gallant people striking for their liberty," are effectively aiding the establishment of the most barbarous despotism. Yet the reader will remember that the Athenæum itself is too British to be a friend of ours. It is too human not to sicken over the state of society exposed in this book. Still the Athenæum reflect that this rebellion is nothing but the incarnation of that society against civilization, human liberty, and civil order!

It says of the book:

"It tells the story of a lady who, born an Englishwoman and reared in the atmosphere of British freedom, was in an evil day induced to marry an American planter, being at the time of her wedding ignorant that the man whom she swore to love and honor had a vested interest in human wretchedness and degradation. That day, after she had become the mother of beautiful children, she together with her husband accompanied the husband to Georgia just five-and-twenty years since, and made acquaintance with the 'institution' recognized as a fact of social existence—not as a system observed from a distance through the glasses of opponents and speculators, but at home. She tells how she saw the linen piercing the soul of an oppressed race and might not raise a hand to pluck it out—how her own child by reason of her sex was born a slave, and through them stripes from the taskmaster and a stormer bondage. Finally, it tells how, disgusted with all she saw, she sought to do good, and forbidden to weep with those whom tears she had daily to witness—how she was compelled to be her care—she fled from scenes where compassion was a crime. A more startling and fearful narrative on a well-worn subject was never laid before readers, and the story does not lose in effect from the fact that its teller is well known in the country-houses and drawing-rooms of all the British grains.

"Amidst such scenes did Mrs. Fanny Kemble collect her facts on slavery—facts which she has put forth in a manner that will deprive the system of any defense that it can has lost through idealistic treatment by romance writers. She uses plain terms, calling a spade a spade, and we think all the better for it. The newly-created apologists, whose function it is to 'make things pleasant' with regard to slavery, will find that they could not more reflect a hearing in answer to the exaggerations of the novelists, than they will find their cause helped by all that Mrs. Kemble has come for best to be given to the other side. For many a day we have not heard, nay, and many a day we shall not hear enough, about the chivalry of Southern gentlemen, the moral and physical graces of Southern women, the patriarchal character of the peculiar institution, the devotion of slaves to their masters, the tenderness of overseers who wish nothing better than to be considerate masters, yet as brothers with their children, to let them goad, and make them the unpitied victims of anxiety. It is time to look at the picture from a fresh point of view, and hair its features explained by those who have had the best means of study. In the author's revelations, it is well for us to know that though she entered Georgia 'prejudiced against slavery,' as every Englishwoman is, she went there never prepared to find many mitigations in the practice to the gonial inquisition of the worst type of system, and Southern as the part of masters, much content on that of slaves.' It appears, however, that the Georgian system of slavery has disappointed. Slaves were more debased, masters more cruel, and life in every respect more barbarous than she had anticipated.

"But Mrs. Fanny Kemble's most valuable testimony relates to the working of slavery. Prepared to take a liberal view of the peculiar institution, she found it as bad as circus in details than in principle. As the negroes on her husband's plantation were treated with kindness, the brutal unmercy laborers on many estates in the same region, slavery was displayed in its worst features. Her experiences but what she saw differed widely from what the apologists of the system had led her to look for."

A RAID FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

WHITE Pennsylvania is invaded, Pennsylvania invades. We take the bulls of the rebels by the horns, it is with base-balls that the sons of the Keystone State advance upon the rebels. Still there is a difference. It is a play that the latter cannot play: it is in deadly earnest that the rebels rule.

In fact, early Monday morning, June 15, a party of Pennsylvanians with base-balls and clubs advanced rapidly upon the city of New York; crossed the East River at Long Island, and encamped a party in Brooklyn; recrossed to Hoboken on the following day, and the next morning returned to Long Island, and to the city of Brooklyn. Pushing on toward the interior, the enterprising Pennsylvanians took up a strong position in Hempstead County, at Hempstead, and by a rapid movement appeared at Newark, in New Jersey, on the following day; and on the 17th the expedition of State was generally known, had withdrawn in perfect safety to the banks of the Delaware, after a week's operations, in which they had increased their own glory and propitiated the favor and kindly remembrance of the communities through which they had made their raid.

Let us hope that no reader is so dull that he does not know why we represent the Philadelphia Base-Ball Club of Philadelphia, of which Colonel Fitzgerald of that city is President. Before their departure they were finely commended its intention in the following shi nd manner:

"This bold step! not undertaken by the Athletics in a spirit of bravado, but rather with the respect due to the new points of the game—to awaken interest in Invincible, and to encourage practice, will have no small meet delightful—the good-fellowship, the manliness, and the hearty hospitality of the players in and around New York having long since passed into a proverb."

The Base-Ball Club has this great value at the present moment, that it is the "school of the soldier" in vigor, endurance, and agility.

CHARLES KINGSLEY.

REV. M. D. CONWAY writes to the Boston Commonwealth a series of interesting letters from England, chatting about men and things in the most lively, pleasant way. In an opportunity review of the people in whom we are all interested he says:

dently many and favorable, and he is so sincerely alive to the scope and progress of the war that he can not fail to be serviceable to the good cause in the very home of its enemies. We have already quoted his graphic picture of Thomas Carlyle. From some later letters we take this account of Charles Kingsley, which will grieve many a true heart in this country. Kingsley, however, did not succeed in persuading Macmillan not to publish Professor Cairnes's book; for the work, originally issued by Parker & Son, was published in the second and enlarged edition by Macmillan. We hope when Mr. Conway goes to Oxford he will not fail to draw a full-length portrait of Goldwin Smith, who is Professor of History at Oxford, as Kingsley is at Cambridge, but who, unlike Kingsley, is constantly doing good things for us and for mankind, and who has just now published a pamphlet upon the kind of sanction given by the Bible to American slavery. Mr. Conway says:

"I had learned before going, that the general opinion at both Oxford and Cambridge was adverse to the North. Much of this at the latter University is owing to the unwearied efforts of Rev. Charles Kingsley, who has lectured and written and talked on the side of the Southern oppressors until many of his once earnest friends, such as Hughes and Dicey, speak of him as a 'lost leader.' Kingsley's only regret now is, that he once wrote such a book as 'Alton Locke.' He has given up his former brave testimonies for Justice and Humanity, for a chaplaincy to the Prince of Wales and a reception among the aristocracy. But, poor man, none love him now, and not even his new companies will trust him far. Still he has managed to stifle the sympathy with the cause of freedom whenever it began to rise near him. That he knows it is the cause of Liberty in America that he opposes, is shown by many facts; among others by this, that he persuaded Macmillan not to publish Cairnes's book, which is written entirely in the interest of Human Rights and not in that of any party."

There is a sting in the following sarcasm which our Copperhead patriots may wisely ponder. Mr. Conway is speaking of the adulation offered by the bold Britons, who never, never, never will be slaves to the Prince of Wales and his wife:

"I have seen a vast crowd gathered at the palace gate here, which I was assured had been there from early morning to dusk, to see the Prince and Princess, who, rumor said, were to pass that way. 'You do not have so good a chance to see him,' said I to a man among them, 'as we had in America: in Cincinnati I danced in the same set, and afterward had a chat for several minutes with him.' 'Ah,' replied he, 'you are all sovereigns over there—unless Jeff Davis makes you subjects again.'"

A QUESTION SETTLED.

The Brooklyn Daily Eagle publishes a poem with the following remarks:

"The following touching and beautiful verses have already appeared in these columns. They were attributed to a private in the National service. A local contemporary corrected this statement by stating that the verses first appeared in Harper's Weekly, and were the production of the lamented Fitz James O'Brien, who was wounded at Ball's Bluff and died after his arm had been amputated. We received at the time a communication claiming that the lines were written by a lady, whose name we have forgotten. The verses have gone all over the world. They have appeared in the London Times, where they were attributed to a private in the Confederate service. They are again claimed by a lady who writes for one of the New York weeklies. As it is uncontradicted that the verses first appeared in Harper's Weekly, it would be a matter of interest to have the question settled on the authority of the conductors of that journal. The following are the lines:

"'All quiet along the Potomac,' they say,
'Except now and then a stray picket
Is shot, as he walks on his beat to and fro,
By a rifleman hid in the thicket,'" etc.

The poem was originally contributed to Harper's Weekly by a lady, and is copyrighted. Mr. O'Brien, who was also the author of many stirring and touching lyrics in this paper, was not, however, wounded at Ball's Bluff. It was in a skirmish of General Lander's forces near Hancock that he received the wound from the effects of which he died.

"LLOYD'S WEEKLY NEWSPAPER."

A literary friend, R. S. M., in Philadelphia, who is familiar with the details of English literature, writes that the circulation of Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper, which we put at five hundred thousand, has never exceeded two hundred thousand a week, and that its price is not a penny, but exactly double that—four cents. Our statement was made upon the authority of what seemed a very accurate letter from London by one who knew. But he must know a great deal more of such matters than we do who would venture to correct R. S. M. He is doubtless right. But it certainly says at the head of the paper, "Price one penny. Stamped, two pence." (R. S. M. will understand that this is only the parting shot of a vanquished party.)

A NEW COLLAR.

There is no end to curious invention; and at last, after linen and cotton and paper and muslin, there is "a new thing in collars." Mr. S. W. H. Ward, 387 Broadway, offers patent steel collars! They are no stiffer than the starched linen should theoretically be; they defy the most moistening shower; and they are readily cleaned by rubbing them with a wet towel! They are made of various forms, upright or turn-over, and the ladies are not forgotten. The thin steel is covered with white enamel, and every man may wear a "dog-collar" which shall not be merely a name.

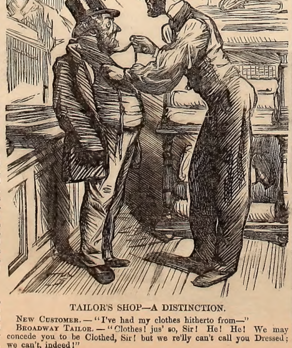
LITERARY.

The "American Publishers' Circular" (G. W. Childs), in its new form, is a truly valuable manual of current literature. The information in the French and English letters is copious and interesting; and its record of domestic literary intelligence is complete. Every fortnight it shows what books are, and are to be, published in all the great book-markets of the world.

The "Fairy Book" (Harpers) is a book to make the heart of every child in the land rejoice, and the purse of every parent open. It is a collection by Miss Mulock, the author of "John Halifax," etc., of all the most famous and delightful standard fairy stories printed in a handsome and attractive form. The stories are told in the old-fashioned simple way in which we all used to read them, and without any comment or dilution or impertinent moralizing.

Mr. Charles T. Evans, the energetic general agent of the Rebellion Record, publishes under the editorship of Mr. Frank Moore, "Papers of the Day," a series of short timely essays upon the most engrossing topics of the time. The first is an account of "The Freedmen of South Carolina" by Charles Nordhoff, and is full of the results of a tour of observation among them by a remarkably shrewd, calm, and intelligent observer, who had peculiar facilities for correct appreciation of their condition, and who writes in the most trenchant, animated, and interesting manner. Such papers are contributions of essential value to our history, and being ephemeral in form should be secured upon their appearance.

"Americans in Rome" is a work by Henry P. Leland from the same publisher. It is a lively, picturesque description of life in Rome, and its amusing fidelity is sure to be recognized by every reader who has lived for some time in that city. It is a charming and cheerful picture of the little incidents and details which the graver tourist is so apt to bury under his ponderous account of ruins and buildings and history, yet which abide so permanently in memory.



"Science for the School and Family," by Professor Hooker, of Yale (Harpers), is a delightful introduction to the mysteries of Natural Philosophy, by an experienced and competent master. It is an admirable manual for the household, and answers simply the thousand questions about common phenomena which every intelligent child continually asks and few parents can clearly answer.

"A Point of Honor" (Harpers) is a simple, tender love story, briefly and pleasantly told—good for reading in these summer days under the trees, if any reader finds time to lie there.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"Can I show you any thing more to-day, Sir?" asked the civil gentleman behind the counter of his worthy customer. "Yes, Sir," was the reply; "will you be good enough to show me the silk umbrella I left here three weeks ago?"

In the window of a shop in the city a violin is exhibited at a high price, being "the property of a gentleman in fine condition."

TAILOR'S SHOP—A DISTINCTION.

New Customer.—"I've had my clothes hitherto from—"
Broadway Tailor.—"Clothes! jus' so, Sir! He! He! We may concede you to be Clothed, Sir! but we re'lly can't call you Dressed; we can't, indeed!"

"There's no humbug about these sardines," said Brown, as he helped himself to a third plateful from a newly-opened box; "they are the genuine article, and came all the way from the Mediterranean." "Yes," replied his economical wife, "and if you will only control your appetite they will go a great deal farther." Brown did not ask for any more.

From Camden to Bletchley, a distance of forty miles, I traveled along with Mrs. Greaves. She was a sweet and interesting woman—so sweet and interesting that, fastidious as I am on the subject, I believe I would have been willing to have kissed her. I had, however, several reasons for not perpetrating this act. First: I am such a good husband I wouldn't even be guilty of the appearance of disloyalty to my sweet wife. Second: I was afraid our fellow-passengers would see me and tell Greaves. Third: I do not think Mrs. G. would let me.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE REBEL INVASION OF THE NORTH.

Since we last wrote the rebels appear to have been dashing hither and thither in Maryland and Pennsylvania, robbing farms and store-houses, but staying in no one locality for any length of time. They have been heard of successively at Chambersburg, M'Connellsburg, Scotland, in Pennsylvania, and Hagerstown, Frederick, Cumberland, Hancock, etc., in Maryland. Nothing is positively known of their force, but it is conjectured that the whole invading army consists of perhaps a couple of thousand cavalry. It is said, however, that a corps d'armée or division, probably Ewell's, are at Williamsport on the Upper Potomac. At 11 A.M. on 23d a body of rebels reoccupied Chambersburg in great force, and our troops, under General Knipe, fell back to Shippensburg and Carlisle. General Knipe arrived at the latter place the same evening, and his arrival led to another panic, the inhabitants flying in every direction, with the usual agony about a rebel attack on Harrisburg.

Large bodies of volunteer militia have gone forward from this State to repel the invaders, and the Pennsylvanians appear likewise to be enlisting—though not with alacrity. Some Jersey regiments have likewise gone to the scene of action. In Maryland the President's call for troops has elicited no response.

Rebel cavalry are said to have made their appearance on the Ohio and Indiana border; and there are rumors of small bodies having crossed the line on predatory excursions. A rumor to the effect that some rebels had made their appearance at Uniontown, Pennsylvania, scared the people of Pittsburg to death on 23d. Work was immediately suspended, and all hands set to build fortifications.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

The Army of the Potomac is said to be on or near the old Bull Run battle-field. General Lee's whereabouts are unknown, but he is supposed to be in the Shenandoah Valley. A decisive battle is momentarily expected, and General Hooker has placed an embargo upon correspondence until it comes off.

CAVALRY FIGHT AT MIDDLEBURG.

Head-quarters, Cavalry Corps,
Camp near Upperville, June 21—5.30 p.m.

Brigadier-General S. Williams:

General,—I moved with my command this morning to Middleburg, and attacked the cavalry force of the rebels under Stuart, and steadily drove him all day, inflicting heavy loss at every step.

We took two pieces of artillery, one being a Blakely gun, together with three caissons, besides blowing one up. We also captured upward of sixty prisoners, and more are coming in, including a lieutenant-colonel, major, and five other officers, and a large number of wounded rebels left in the town of Upperville.

They left their dead and wounded upon the field. Of the former I saw upward of twenty. We also took a large number of carbines, pistols, and sabres. In fact, it was a most disastrous day to the rebel cavalry.

Our loss has been very small, both in men and horses. I never saw the troops behave better or under more difficult circumstances. Very heavy charges were made, and the sabre was used freely, but always with great advantage to us. A. Pleasanton, Brigadier-General.

THE BATTLE OF WINCHESTER.

Full accounts are published of the late desperate two days' battle at Winchester between General Milroy and General Ewell, which terminated in a disastrous retreat of the Union forces to Martinsburg and Harper's Ferry, with only two thousand men out of seven thousand, and having lost all the artillery, stores, baggage, and every thing except what the men carried on their persons. Three entire batteries of field artillery and one battery of siege guns, about two hundred and eighty wagons, over twelve hundred horses and mules, all the commissary and quarter-master's stores and ammunition of all kinds, over six thousand muskets and small-arms without stint, the private baggage of the officers and men, all fell into the hands of the enemy.

GENERAL LEE'S REPORT.

Richmond, June 16, 1863.

A dispatch from General Lee, dated the 15th, says:

God has again crowned the valor of our troops with success. Ewell's division stormed the intrenchments at Winchester, capturing their artillery, etc. Lee.

FROM THE SOUTHWEST.

The siege of Vicksburg progresses slowly, but, we are told, favorably. Persons in official circles looked for the assault and capture of the city before this. General Grant's approaches were within a few yards of the rebel works at the latest dates. Our advices from Grant's army are to 19th at noon. At that time heavy firing was going on from both sides. General M'Clernand has been removed from the command of the 13th Army Corps by General Grant, and General Ord appointed in his place.

From Port Hudson we have no advices except that the siege is progressing.

A RAID INTO EAST TENNESSEE.

A dispatch from Murfreesboro on 22d states that General Carter has made another raid into East Tennessee with 2000 mounted infantry, spreading terror before him. He destroyed the station and took up the track at Lenor, and advanced as far as Loudon, where he drew up in line of battle to meet the enemy. He stated his intention to march on Knoxville and destroy that city.

CAPTURE OF THE "ATLANTA-FINGAL."

Our blockading squadron has diminished the rebel fleet of privateers by one very valuable and dangerous steamer, the Atlanta, formerly known as the Clyde-built vessel Fingal. She came down on the morning of the 17th inst. into Warsaw Sound, by way of Wilmington River, accompanied by two wooden steamers loaded with spectators. The Weehawken, commanded by Captain Rodgers, at once engaged her, and fired in all but five shots, three of which took effect, penetrating her armor and killing or wounding the crews of two guns. Two of her three pilots were also wounded, the top of her pilot-house being shot away. She then grounded, after having fired six shots, and immediately afterward surrendered. Her armament consists of two 7-inch and two 6-inch Brooks guns, rifled, and her officers and crew numbered 165. She had on board instruments and stores for a regular cruise. The prisoners reached Fortress Monroe on 22d.

REBEL RAIDERS PUNISHED.

General Burnside telegraphs to General Halleck from Cincinnati that Colonel de Courcy, with parts of the Tenth and Fourteenth Kentucky Cavalry and Eighth and Ninth Michigan Cavalry, cut off at Triplett's bridge the body of rebel cavalry that made the raid upon Maysville. He killed and wounded many of the rebels, and took over one hundred prisoners, including one captain and two lieutenants, and recaptured all the property stolen at Maysville. General Burnside says that the rebels are broken to pieces, and may be destroyed altogether, as our people are hunting them up.

LOSS OF THE "NORWEGIAN."

The steamship Norwegian, Captain M'Master, which left Liverpool on the 4th and Londonderry on the 5th of June, for Montreal, was wrecked on the 14th instant, on St. Paul's Island, Cape Breton. She struck about seven o'clock in the morning, during a dense fog, about a mile and a quarter east of the Northeast Light. She had 329 passengers on board. They were all saved, with the greater portion of their baggage. The Governor of St. Paul's Island lent all the assistance in his power. The Norwegian belonged to the Montreal Steamship Company, and her wreck makes the seventh vessel which they have lost.

CHAPTER XVI.

The subsiding sea was now a liquid Paradise: its great pellucid braes and hillocks shone with the sparkle, and the hues, of all the jewels in an emperor's crown. Imagine—after three days of inky sea, and pitchy sky, and Death's deep jaws snapping and barely missing with a click—ten thousand great slopes of emerald, aquamarine, amethyst, and topaz, liquid, alive, and dancing jocundly beneath a gorgeous sun: and you will have a faint idea of what met the eyes and hearts of the rescued looking out of that battered, jagged, ship, upon ocean smiling back to smiling Heaven.

Yet one man felt no buoyancy, nor gush of joy. He leaned against a fragment of the broken bulwark, confused between the sweetness of life preserved, and the bitterness of treasure lost, his wife's and children's treasured treasure; benumbed at heart, and almost weary of the existence he had battled for so stoutly. He looked so moody, and answered so grimly and unlike himself, that they all held aloof from him; heavy heart among so many joyful ones, he was in true solitude; the body in a crowd, the soul alone. And he was sore as well as heavy: for, of all the lubberly acts he had ever known, the way he had lost his dear ones' fortune seemed to him the worst.

A voice sounded in his ear: "Poor thing; she has foundered!"

It was Fullalove scanning the horizon with his famous glass.

"Foundered? Who?" said Dodd; though he did not care much who sank, who swam. Then he remembered the vessel, whose flashing guns had shed a human ray on the unearthly horror of the black hurricane. He looked all round.

Blank!

Ay, she had perished with all hands. The sea had swallowed her, and spared him; ungrateful.

This turned his mind sharply. Suppose the Agra had gone down, the money would be lost as now, and his life into the bargain, a life dearer to all at home than millions of gold: he prayed inwardly to Heaven for gratitude, and goodness to feel its mercy. This softened him a little; and his heart swelled so, he wished he was a woman to cry over his children's loss for an hour, and then shake all off and go through his duty somehow; for now he was paralyzed, and all seemed ended. Next, nautical superstition fastened on him. That pocket-book of his was Jonah; It had to go or else the ship; the moment It did go, the storm had broken as by magic.

Now Superstition is generally stronger than rational Religion, whether they lie apart, or together in one mind: and this superstitious notion did something toward steeling the poor man. "Come," said he to himself, "my loss has saved all these poor souls on board this ship. So be it! Heaven's will be done! I must bustle, or else go mad."

He turned to and worked like a horse: and with his own hands helped the men to rig parallel ropes—a substitute for bulwarks—till the perspiration ran down him.

Bayliss now reported the well nearly dry, and Dodd was about to bear up and make sail again, when one of the ship-boys, a little fellow with a bright eye and a chin like a monkey's, came up to him and said,

"Please, Captain!" Then glared with awe at what he had done, and broke down.

"Well, my little man?" said Dodd, gently.

Thus encouraged, the boy gave a great gulp, and burst in a brogue: "Och your arnr, sure there's no rudder on her at all barrin the tiller."

"What d'ye mean?"

"Don't murrder me, your arnr, and I'll tell ye. It's meself looked over the starrn just now; an' I seen there was no rudder at all at all: Mille diaoul sis I; ye old bitch I'll tell his arnr what y'are after, slipping your rudder like my granny's list shoe, I will."

Dodd ran to the helm and looked down; the brat was right: the blows which had so endangered the ship, had broken the rudder, and the sea had washed it away in pieces. The sight and the reflection made him faintish for a moment. Death passing so very close to a man sickens him afterward; unless he has the luck to be brainless.

"What is your name, urchin?"

"Ned Murphy, Sir."

"Very well, Murphy, then you are a fine little fellow, and have wiped all our eyes in the ship: run and send the carpenter aft."

"Ay, ay, Sir."

The carpenter came. Like most artisans he was clever in a groove: take him out of that, and lo! a mule, a pig, an owl. He was not only unable to invent, but so stiffly disinclined; a makeshift rudder was clean out of his way; and, as his whole struggle was to get away from every suggestion Dodd made back to groove aforesaid, the thing looked hopeless. Then Fullalove, who had stood by grinning, offered to make a bunkum rudder, provided the carpenter and mates were put under his orders. But, said he, I must bargain they shall be disrated if they attempt to reason. "That is no more than fair," said Dodd.

The Yankee inventor demanded a spare main-cap, and cut away one end of the square piece, so as to make it fit the stern-post: through the circle of the cap he introduced a spare mizzen-topmast: to this he seized a length of junk, another to that, another to that, and so on: to the outside junk he seized a spare maintop-gallant mast, and this conglomerate being now nearly as broad as a rudder, he planked over all. The sea by this time was calm; he got the machine over the stern, and had the square end of the cap bolted to the stern-post. He had already fixed four spans of nine-inch hawser to the sides of the makeshift, two fastened to tackles, which led into the gun-room ports, and were boused taut—these kept the lower part of the makeshift close to the stern-post—and two, to which guys were now fixed and led through the aftermost ports on to the quarter-deck, where luff-tackles were attached to them, by means of which the makeshift was to be worked as a rudder.

Some sail was now got on the ship, and she was found to steer very well. Dodd tried her on every tack; and at last ordered Sharpe to make all sail and head for the Cape.

This electrified the first mate. The breeze was very faint but southerly, and the Mauritius under their lee. They could make it in a night, and there refit, and ship a new rudder. He suggested the danger of sailing sixteen hundred miles steered by a Gimcrack; and implored Dodd to put into port. Dodd answered with a roughness and a certain wildness never seen in him before: "Danger, Sir! There will be no more foul weather this voyage; Jonah is overboard." Sharpe stared an inquiry. "I tell you we sha'n't lower our top-gallants once from this to the Cape: Jonah is overboard:" and he slapped his forehead in despair; then, stamping impatiently with his foot, told Sharpe his duty was to obey orders, not discuss them. "Certainly, Sir," said Sharpe sullenly, and went out of the cabin with serious thoughts of communicating to the other mates an alarming suspicion about Dodd, that now for the first time crossed his mind. But long habit of discipline prevailed, and he made all sail on the ship, and bore away for the Cape, with a heavy heart: the sea was like a mill-pond, but in that he saw only its well-known treachery, to lead them on to this unparalleled act of madness: each sail he hoisted seemed one more agent of Destruction rising at his own suicidal command.

Toward evening it became nearly dead calm. The sea heaved a little, but was waveless, glassy, and the color of a rose, incredibly brave and delicate.

The look-out reported pieces of wreck to windward. As the ship was making so little way, Dodd beat up toward them; he feared it was a British ship that had foundered in the storm, and thought it his duty to ascertain and carry the sad news home. In two tacks they got near enough to see with their glasses that the fragments belonged, not to a stranger, but to the Agra herself; there was one of her water-butts, and a broken mast with some rigging: and, as more wreck was descried coming in at a little distance, Dodd kept the ship close to the wind to inspect it: on drifting near it proved to be several pieces of the bulwark and a mahogany table out of the cuddy. This sort of flotsom was not worth delaying the ship to pick it up; so Dodd made sail again, steering now S.E.

He had sailed about half a mile when the look-out hailed the deck again.

"A man in the water!"

"Where abouts?"

"A short league on the weather quarter."

"Oh, we can't beat to windward for him," said Sharpe. "He is dead long ago."

"Holds his head very high for a corpse," said the look-out.

"I'll soon know," cried Dodd. "Lower the gig; I'll go myself."

The gig was lowered, and six swift rowers pulled him to windward; while the ship kept on her course.

It is most unusual for a captain to leave the ship at sea on such petty errands: but Dodd half hoped the man might be alive; and he was so unhappy; and, like his daughter, who probably derived the trait from him, grasped instinctively at a chance of doing kindness to some poor fellow alive or dead. That would soothe his own sore, good, heart.

When they had pulled about two miles, the sun was sinking into the horizon: "Give way, men," said Dodd, "or we shall not be able to see him." The men bent to their oars, and made the boat fly.

Presently the coxswain caught sight of an object bobbing on the water abeam.

"Why, that must be it," said he: "the lubber! to take it for a man's head. Why it is nothing but a thundering old bladder, speckled white."

"What?" cried Dodd: and fell a trembling. "Steer for it! Give way!"

"Ay, ay, Sir!"

They soon came alongside the bladder, and the coxswain grabbed it: "Hallo! here's something lashed to it: a bottle!"

"Give it me!" gasped Dodd, in a voice choked with agitation. "Give it me! Back to the ship! Fly! Fly! Cut her off, or she'll give us the slip, now."

He never spoke a word more, but sat in a stupor of joyful wonder.

They soon caught the ship: he got into his cabin, he scarce knew how: broke the bottle to atoms, and found the indomitable cash uninjured. With trembling hands he restored it to its old place in his bosom, and sewed it tighter than ever. Until he felt it there once more, he could hardly realize a stroke of good fortune that seemed miraculous—though, in reality, it was less strange than the way he had lost it—but, now laid bodily on his heart, it set his bosom on fire: oh, the bright eye, the bounding pulse, the buoyant foot, the reckless joy! He slapped Sharpe on the back a little vulgarly, for him:

"Jonah is on board again, old fellow: look out for squalls."

He uttered this foreboding in a tone of triumph, and with a gay, elastic recklessness, which harmonized so well with his makeshift rudder, that Sharpe groaned aloud, and wished himself under any captain in the world but this, and in any other ship. He looked round to make sure he was not watched, and then tapped his forehead significantly: this somewhat relieved him, and he did his duty smartly for a man going to the bottom with his eyes open.

But ill luck is not to be bespoken any more than good: the Agra's seemed to have blown itself out; the wind varied to the southwest, and breathed steadily in that quarter for ten days. The top-gallant sails were never lowered nor shifted day nor night all that time: and not a single danger occurred between this and the Cape, except to a monkey, which I fear I must relate on account of its remoter consequences. One fine afternoon every body was on deck amusing themselves as they could; Mrs. Beresford, to wit, was being flattered under the poop awning by Kenealy. The feud between her and Dodd continued; but under a false impression. The lady had one advantage over the gentler specimens of her sex: she was never deterred from a kind action by want of pluck, as they are. Pluck? Aquilina was brimful of it. When she found Dodd was wounded, she cast her wrongs to the wind, and offered to go and nurse him. Her message came at an unlucky moment, and by an unlucky messenger: the surgeon said, hastily, "I can't have him bothered." The stupid servant reported, "He can't be worried:" and Mrs. Beresford, thinking Dodd had a hand in this answer, was bitterly mortified; and with some reason. She would have forgiven him though, if he had died: but, as he lived, she thought she had a right to detest him; and did: and showed her sentiments like a lady, by never speaking to him, nor looking at him, but ignoring him with frigid magnificence on his own quarter-deck.

Now, among the crew of this ship was a favorite goat, good-tempered, affectionate, playful: but a single vice counterbalanced all his virtues: he took a drop. A year or two ago some light-hearted tempter taught him to sip grog; he took to it kindly, and was now arrived at such a pitch, that at grog time he used to butt his way in among the sailors, and get close to the canteen; and, by arrangement, an allowance was always served him; on imbibing it he passed, with quadrupedal rapidity, through three stages, the absurd, the choleric, the sleepy; and was never his own goat again until he awoke from the latter. Now Master Fred Beresford encountered him in the second stage of inebriety, and, being a rough play-fellow, tapped his nose with a battle-dore. Instantly Billy butted at him; mischievous Fred screamed and jumped on the bulwarks. Pot-angry Billy went at him there; whereupon the young gentleman, with an eldrich screech, and a comparative estimate of perils that smacked of inexperience, fled into the sea at the very moment when his anxious mother was rushing to save him; she uttered a scream of agony, and would actually have followed him; but was held back uttering shriek after shriek, that pierced every heart within hearing.

But Dodd saw the boy go overboard, and vaulted over the bulwark near the helm, roared in the very air, "Heave the ship to!" and went splash into the water about ten yards from the place; he was soon followed by Vespasian, and a boat was lowered as quickly as possible. Dodd caught sight of a broad straw-hat on the top of a wave, swam lustily to it, and found Freddy inside: it was tied under his chin, and would have floated Goliah. Dodd turned to the ship, saw the poor mother with white face and arms outstretched as if she would fly at them, and held the urchin up high to her with a joyful "hurrah." The ship seemed alive and to hurrah in return with giant voice: the boat soon picked them up, and Dodd came up the side with Freddy in his arms, and placed him in his mother's with honest pride, and deep parental sympathy.

Guess how she scolded and caressed her child all in a breath, and sobbed over him! For this no human pen has ever told, nor ever will. All I can just manage to convey is that, after she had all but eaten the little torment, she suddenly dropped him, and made a great maternal rush at Dodd. She flung her arms round him and kissed him eagerly, almost fiercely: then, carried away wild by mighty Nature, she patted him all over in the strangest way, and kissed his waistcoat, his arms, his hands, and rained tears of joy and gratitude on them.

Dodd was quite overpowered: "No! no!" said he. "Don't now! pray don't! There, I know, my dear, I know; I'm a father." And he was very near whimpering himself; but recovered the man and the commander, and said, soothingly, "There! there!" and handed her tenderly down to her cabin.

All this time he had actually forgotten the packet. But now a horrible fear come on him. He hurried to his own cabin and examined it. A little salt-water had oozed through the bullet-hole and discolored the leather; but that was all. He breathed again.

"Thank Heaven I forgot all about it!" said he: "It would have made a cur of me."

La Beresford's petty irritation against Dodd melted at once before so great a thing: she longed to make friends with him; but for once felt timid: it struck her now all of a sudden that she had been misbehaving. However, she caught Dodd alone on the deck, and said to him softly, "I want so to end our quarrel."

"Our quarrel, madam!" said he; "why I know of none: oh, about the light, eh? Well you see the master of a ship is obliged to be a tyrant in some things."

"I make no complaint," said the lady hastily, and hung her head. "All I ask you is to forgive one who has behaved like a fool, without even the excuse of being one; and—will you give me your hand, Sir?"

"Ay, and with all my heart," said Dodd, warmly, inclosing the soft little hand in his honest grasp.

And with no more ado these two high-fliers ended one of those little misunderstandings petty spirits nurse into a feud.

The ship being in port at the Cape, and two hundred hammers tapping at her, Dodd went ashore in search of Captain Robarts, and made the Agra over to him in the friendliest way, adding warmly that he had found every reason to be satisfied with the officers and the crew. To his surprise Captain Robarts received all this ungraciously. "You ought to have remained on board, Sir, and made me over the command on the quarter-deck." Dodd replied, politely, that it would have been more formal. "Suppose I return immediately, and man the side for you: and then you board her, say in half an hour."

"I shall come when I like," replied Robarts, crustily. "And when will you like to come?" inquired Dodd, with imperturbable good-humor.

"Now: this moment: and I'll trouble you to come along with me."

"Certainly, Sir."

They got a boat, and went out to the ship: on coming alongside, Dodd thought to meet his wishes by going first and receiving him; but the jealous, cross-grained fellow shoved roughly before him and led the way up the ship's side. Sharpe and the rest saluted him: he did not return the salute, but said, hoarsely, "Turn the hands up to muster."

When they were all aft he noticed one or two with their caps on. "Hats off, and be —— to you!" cried he. "Do you know where you are? Do you know who you are looking at? If not, I'll show you. I'm here to restore discipline to this ship: so mind how you run athwart my hawse: don't you play with the bull, my men; or you'll find his horns —— sharp. Pipe down! Now, you Sir, bring me the log-book!"

He ran his eye over it, and closed it contemptuously. 'Pirates, and hurricanes! I never fell in with pirates nor hurricanes: I have heard of a breeze, and a gale, but I never knew a seaman worth his salt say 'hurricane.' Get another log-book, Mr. Sharpe; put down that it begins this day at noon; and enter, that Captain Robarts came on deck, found the ship in a miserable condition, took the command, mustered the officers and men, and stopped the ship's company's grog for a week, for receiving him with hats on!"

Even Sharpe, that walking Obedience, was taken aback. "Stop—the ship's company's—grog—for a week, Sir?"

"Yes, Sir, for a week: and if you fling my orders back in my face instead of clapping on sail to execute them, I'll have you towed ashore on a grating: your name is Sharp; well my name is Damnedsharp; and so you'll find."

In short, the new captain came down on the ship like a blight.

He was especially hard on Dodd: nothing that commander had done was right, nor, had he done the contrary, would that have been right: he was disgracefully behind time; and he ought to have put in to the Isle of France, which would have retarded him: his rope bulwarks were lubberly; his rudder a disgrace to navigation: he, Robarts, was not so green as to believe that any master had really sailed sixteen hundred miles with it, and, if he had, more shame for him. Briefly a marine criticaster.

All this was spoken at Dodd—a thing no male does unless he is an awful snob—and grieved him, it was so unjust. He withdrew wounded to the little cabin he was entitled to as a passenger, and hugged his treasure for comfort. He patted the pocket-book, and said to it, "Never you mind. The greater tarter he is, the less likely to sink you, or run you on a lee shore."

With all his love of discipline, Robarts was not so fond of the ship as Dodd.

While his repairs were going on, he was generally ashore; and by this means missed a visit. Commodore Collier, one of the smartest sailors afloat, espied the Yankee makeshift from the quarter-deck of his vessel, the Salamanca, fifty guns. In ten minutes he was under the Agra's stern inspecting it; then came on board, and was received in form by Sharpe and the other officers. "Are you the master of this ship, Sir?" he asked.

"No, commodore. I am the first mate: the captain is ashore."

"I am sorry for it. I want to talk about his rudder."

"Oh, he had nothing to do with that," replied Sharpe, eagerly: "that was our dear old captain: he is on board. Young gentleman! ask Captain Dodd to oblige me by coming on deck! Hy! and Mr. Fullalove too." "Young gentleman?" inquired Collier. "What the devil officer is that?"

"That is a name we give the middies; I don't know why."

"Nor I neither! ha! ha!"

Dodd and Fullalove came on deck, and Commodore Collier bestowed the highest compliments on the "makeshift." Dodd begged him to transfer them to the real inventor; and introduced Fullalove.

"Ay," said Collier, "I know you Yankees are very handy. I lost my rudder at sea once, and had to ship a makeshift: but it was a curs't complicated thing; not a patch upon yours, Mr. Fullalove. Yours is ingenious, and simple. Ship has been in action I see: pray how was that, if I may be so bold?"

"Pirates, commodore," said Sharpe. "We fell in with a brace of Portuguese devils, latteen-rigged, and carried ten guns apiece, in the Straits of Gaspar: fought em from noon till sundown, riddled one, and ran down the other, and sunk her in a moment. That was all your doing, captain; so don't try to shift it on other people; for we won't let you."

"If he denies it, I won't believe him," said Collier: "for he has got it in his eye. Gentlemen, will you do me the honor to dine with me to-day on board the flag-ship?"

Dodd and Malabre accepted. Sharpe declined, with regret, on the score of duty. And as the cocked hat went down the side, after saluting his nobility, he could not help saying to himself what a difference between a real captain, who had something to be proud of, and his own snivicked cub of a skipper, with the manners of a plot-boat. He told Roberts the next day. Roberts said nothing: but his face seemed to turn greenish; and it embittered his hatred of Dodd the indefensive.

It is droll, and sad, but true, that Christendom is full of men in a hurry to hate. And a fruitful cause is jealousy. The schoolmen, or rather cronies of the schoolmen—for there was much shallower than to speak of all those disputants as one school—defined wrongly, "a fanciless biped vehemently addicted to jealousy." Whether she is more featherless than the male can be decided at a trifling expense of time, money, and reason: you have only to go to court. But as for envy and jealousy, I think it is pure, innocent, antique Cain-and-Abel hate fixed them on the female character distinctively. As a mole-hill to a mountain, is women's jealousy to men's. Agatha and Mrs. Dodd, in fortunes and graces, and yet her female acquaintance will not hate her, provided she pays the modest tuition to abstain from being downright pretty. She may sing like an angel, paint like an angel, talk—write—work like sick—All the world will not rouse the devil in her fair sisters: so long as she does not dress like an angel. But, the minds of men being much larger than women's, and very little greater, they hang jealousy on a thousand pegs. When there was no peg, I have seen them do with a pin.

Captain Roberts took a pin; ran it into his own heart, and hung that social peg on it.

He would get rid of all the Doddites before he sailed. He insulted Mr. Tickell, so that he left the service, and entered a merchant-vessel ashore: he made several of the best men desert: and the ship went to sea short of hands. This threw heavier work on the crew, and led to many punishments, and a steady current of abuse. Sharpe became a mere machine, always obeying, never speaking: every man on board feared for remonstrating against ungentlemanly language: and Bayliss, being at bottom of the same breed as Roberts, fell into the manner, and helped heator the petty officers and men. The crew, depressed and irritated, were continually quiteo pully-hauly-wise. There was no song under the forecastle in the first watch, and often no grog on the mess-table at one bell. The men would come on the quarter-deck without being reminded he was only a passenger, and the ship was ever under naval discipline.

I was reared in the royal navy, Sir," would Roberts say to a second lieutenant aboard the Atalanta: that is the school, Sir, that is the only school that breeds seamen. Dodd bore scores of similar taunts as a merchant-officer put up with a terrier in office: he seldom replied, and, when he did, in a few quiet dignified words that gave no handle.

Roberts, who bore the name of a lucky captain, had fair weather all the way to St. Helena.

The people at this island are under the Admiralty. She had left the Cape a week before the Agra. Captain Roberts, with his characteristic sense of courtesy, sent to anchor in the name of His Majesty's ship. The wind failed at a critical moment, and it became hazy enough. Collier was on his quarter-deck, and saw what would happen long before Roberts did: he gave the needful orders, and it was hardly done when there in half a minute the frigate's guns were run in her ports lowered, her yards toppled on end, and a spring cable cut and hauling taut.

The Agra stuck abreast her own foreshains on the Semiramis's quarter.

(Pipe.) "Boarders away. Tomahawks! everything thing that holds!" was heard from the frigate's quarter-deck.

Rash came a boarding party on to the merchant ship and backed away without mercy all her lower rigging that had not been in the frigate, signal halliards and all; others boomed her off with capstan bars, etc., and in two minutes the ships were clear. A lieutenant and a crew of seamen for Roberts, and ordered him on board the Salamander, and, to make sure of his coming, took him back with them. His foolish, unwordore Collier standing stiff as a ramrod on his quarter-deck.

"Are you the master of the Agra?" (His quick eye recognized her in a moment.)

"I am, Sir."

"Then she was commanded by a seaman; and a commanded by a lubber. Don't apply for your papers this week; for you won't get them. Good-morning. Take him away!"

They returned Roberts to his ship; and a suppressed grin on a score of faces showed him the clear commanding tones of the commodore had reached his own deck. He soothed himself by stopping the men's grog and mastheading three midshipmen that same afternoon.

The night before he weighed anchor, this disciplinarian was drinking very late in a low public house. There was not much moon, and the officer in charge of the ship did not see the gig coming until it was nearly alongside; then all was done in a flurry.

"Hy! man the side lanterns there! Jump, you boys! or you'll catch pepper."

The boys did jump, and little Murphy, not knowing the surgeon had ordered the ports to be dropped, bounded over the bulwarks like an antelope, lighted on the middle port, which stood at this angle \, and glanced off into the ocean, lantern foremost: he struck the water like a stone in the water within a yard of Captain Roberts. That Dignity, though splashed, took no notice of so small an incident: he was gone directly; and, if Murphy had been wise and staid with Neb, all had been well. But the poor urchin instead, with come up again, and shout the lantern. One of the gig's crew grabbed him by the hair, and prolonged his existence, but without any other assistance.

"Where is the other lantern?" was Robson's first word on reaching the deck: as if he didn't know.

"Gone overboard, Sir, with the boy Murphy."

"Stand forward you fool!" growled Roberts. Murphy stood forward, dripping and shivering with cold and fear.

"What d'ye mean by going overboard with the ship's lantern?"

"Och your anr sure some unasy divil dropped the port, and the lantern and me we had no foothold at all at all, and the lantern went into the water, and I went after it."

"Belay all that!" said Roberts; "do you think you can ride a gun, you young monkey? Here, Boson's mate, take a ropeend and start him!—Again!—Warm him well!—That's right."

As soon as the poor child's shrieks subsided into sobs, the disciplinarian gave him Explanation, for Lieutenant.

"I CAN'T HAVE THE COMPANY'S STORES EXPERIENCE THIS WAY.

"The force of discipline could no farther go" than to flog zeal for falling overboard: so, to maintain discipline, he sent Neb, a good man and anchor at daybreak; and there was a south-westerly breeze waiting for this favorite of fortune. All carried back the Admiral's Off Ushant it was westerly; and veered to the northwest just before they sighted the land's end: there was such a distance between them and the Cape. The sailor who had the luck to sight Old England first, nailed his sarboard shoe to the mainmast for contribution: and then had best joyfully: none more than David Dodd's. His life seemed the happiest in the ship: and the first treasure his own ill luck had jeopardized, but Roberts had sailed it safe into British waters; would forgave the man his ill manners for his good luck.

Roberts steered in for the Lizard; but, when abeast the point, kept well to the westward, and opened the channel, and looked out for a pilot.

He was soon seen working out toward him, and the skipper kept well to the southward, from his logger into his little boat, rowed alongside, and, seeing no one to receive him, scrambled in flushing; and in build and manner might have passed for Roberts's twin brother.

"Are you a pilot, what will you take this ship up to the Downs for?"

"Thirty pounds."

Roberts told him roughly he would not get thirty pounds out of him.

"Byye and no higher my Be," answered the pilot, straightening his knees spicing the main brace, and would have answered an admiral.

Roberts looked at him, and then cast a quick a volley in return with admirable promptitude. Roberts retorted, the other rough costumer replied, and the all Billingsgate collected on the Agra's quarter-deck. Finding, to his infinite disgust, his visitor as great a blackguard as himself, and to be answered, Roberts ordered him to quit the ship on pain of being man-handled over the side.

"Oh, that is it, is it?" growled the other: "here's fill and be off then." He prudently bottled that up for the time till he got into his boat: then shook his fist at the Agra, and cursed her captain sky high. "You see the fair wind, but you see no more. And feel a coming, ye greedy gander. Downs! You'll never see them: you have saved your——money, and lost your——ship, you——lubber."

Roberts hurled back a sugar-plum or two, and then ordered Bayliss to clap on all sail, and keep a sailing course through the night.

At four bells in the middle watch Sharpe, in charge of the ship, reported at Roberts's door "Blowing hard, Sir, and the weather getting thickish."

"Wind fair still?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Then call me if it blows any harder," grunted Roberts.

In two hours more, tap, tap, came Bayliss, in charge. "If we don't take sail in, they'll take them themselves."

Furl-to-gallan'sels, and call me if it gets any worse."

In another hour Bayliss was at him again. "Blowing a gale, Sir, and a channel fog on."

"Reef topsels, and call me if it gets any worse."

At daybreak Dodd was on deck, and found the ship flying through a fog so thick, that her forecastle was invisible from the poop, and even her foremast loomed indistinct and looked distant. "You'll be fool of something or other, Sharpe," said he.

"What is that to you?" inquired a loud rough voice behind him. "I don't allow passengers to handle my ship."

"Then do you handle her yourself, captain! is this weather to go tearing happy-go-lucky up the British Channel?"

"I mean to sail her without your advice, Sir; and, being a seaman, I shall get all I can out of a fair wind."

"That is right, Captain Roberts; if you had but the Channel all to yourself."

"Perhaps you will leave me my deck all to myself."

"I should be delighted: but my anxiety will not let me." And Dodd retired a few steps, and kept a keen look-out.

At noon, a lusty voice cried "LAND ON THE WEATHER BEAM!"

All eyes were turned that way, and saw nothing.

Land in sight was reported to Captain Roberts.

Now that worthy was in reality getting secretly anxious: so he ran on deck crying, "Who saw it?"

"Captain Dodd, Sir."

"Ugh! Nobody else?"

Dodd came forward, and, with a respectful air, told him that, being on the look-out, he had seen the coast of the Isle of Wight in a momentary lift of the haze.

"Isle of Fiddlestick!" was the polite reply. "Isle of Wight is eighty miles astern by now."

Dodd answered firmly that he was well acquainted with every outline in the channel, and that he had seen the tower at St. Catharine's point.

Roberts deigned no reply, but had the log hove, and it showed the vessel to be running twelve knots an hour. He then went to his cabin and consulted his chart; and, having satisfied himself, came hastily on deck, and went from rashness to wonderful caution. "Turn the hands out, and leave the ship to!"

This was manned in a trice: expeditiously and ably, and scarce a bucketful of water shipped. "Furl topsels and set the main try-sail! There, Mr. Sharpe, that is much for you and your Isle of Wight. The land you saw was Dungeness, and you would have run on into the North Sea, I'll be bound."

When a man, habitually calm, turns anxious, he becomes irritable: and the mixture of timidity and rashness he saw in Roberts made Dodd very anxious.

He ventured to say: "At all events I should not make a foul wind out of a fair one by heaving to; and if I did, I would heave to on the other tack."

At this sudden facer—one, too, from a patient man—Roberts staggered a moment. Dodd repeated it with an oath, ordered Dodd to go below, or he would have him chucked into the hold.

"Come, don't be an ass, Roberts," said Dodd, contemptuously. Then, lowering his voice to a whisper: "I hope you know the way you want such an order as that to chuck you into the sea?"

Roberts trembled. "Oh, if you mean to head a mutiny——"

"Heaven forbid, Sir! But I won't leave the deck in dirty weather like this, till the captain has been relieved by me."

Toward sunset it got clearer, and they drifted past a Dutchman, who was lying to with her head to the Northward. She hoisted no end of signals, but they understood none of them; and her captain gesticulated wildly on her deck.

"What is that Fantoccini dancing at?" inquired Roberts, brutally.

"It is not a useless ship drift to leeward in a narrow sea, with a fair wind," said Dodd, bitterly.

At night it blew hard, and the sea ran high and irregular. The ship began to be uneasy; and Roberts, more properly ordered the topgallant and royal yards to be sent down on deck. Dodd would have had them down twelve hours before. The mate gave the order: no one moved. The mate went forward angry. He came back pale. The men refused to go aloft: they would not risk their lives to please Roberts' folly.

The officers all assembled and went forward: they promised and threatened; but all in vain. The crew would action together, as the lock on one another, and put forward a spokesman to say that "there was not one of them but thought Roberts a fool, and skipper for them."

Dodd would have had instantly have sided with him against mutiny.

But at this juncture the ex-captain of the Agra was down in the cabin with his fellow-passengers preparing a general remonstrance: he had a chart before him, and a pair of compasses in his hand.

"St. Catharine's point lay about eight miles to windward at noon; and we have been driving South and South-west ever since, through lying to on the starboard tack: and besides the ship has been created as slovenly as she is unsafe. I've seen her allowed to break off a dozen times, and gather more leeway: ah, here is Captain Roberts: Captain, please saw the rate we passed the revenue cutter. That vessel was nearly stationary; so what we passed her at was our own rate of drifting, and that rate: putting all this together we can't be many miles from the French coast, and, unless we look sharp and beat to windward, I pronounce the ship in danger."

A horse-laugh greeted this conclusion.

"We are nearer Yarmouth sands than France, I promise you: and nothing under our lee nearer than Rotterdam."

A loud cry from the deck above, "A LIGHT ON THE LEE BOW!"

"There!" cried Roberts, with an air of "foul of her next! through me listening to your nonsense. He ran upon deck, and shouted through his trumpet, "All hands wear ship!"

The crew, who had heard the previous cry, obeyed orders in the presence of an immediate danger: and perhaps their growl had really relieved their ill humor. Roberts with delight saw them come tumbling up, and gave his orders hastily—

"Brail up the trysel! Up with the helm! in with the weather main brace! square the after yards!"

The ship's bow turned from the wind, and, as soon as she got way on her, Roberts ran below again; and entered the remainder.

"That is all right; and now, Captain Dodd, a word with you: you will either retire at once to your cabin, or will come on board disaffection in my crew, and groundless alarm in my passengers, by inciting your own childish, ignorant fears. The ship has been underlogged a hundred miles, and but for my caution in lying to for clear weather we should be groping among the Fern Isl—"

CRASH!

An unheard of shock threw the speaker and all the rest in a mass on the floor, smashed every lamp, and left every light: and with a fierce grating noise, the ship was fixed and fast on the French coast, with her stern to the sea.

One wild cry, and then silence, then amidst shrieks of agony, the sea struck her like a rolling rock, solid to crush, liquid to drown: and the ship was overwhelmed with the first breaker and rushed in among them as they floundered on the floor; and wetted and chilled them to the marrow; a wave in the dark cried, "Oh God! we are dead men!"

AFTER THE BATTLE OF ANTIETAM.

THE harvest-moon o'er the battle-plain
Shines dim in the filmy eyes of the dead,
And the ghastly wealth of the later grain,
Ground by the millstones of death and pain
And wet with the life-blood of the slain,
Is bonded in the harsh bread.

The dying by twos and threes, as night
Kisses their brows with cooling breath,
Gather, with failing outward sight,
To tell of the inward thoughts bright
That rise like a tender morning light
Over the hills of death.

Two who have stood up hand in hand,
Brothers to-day in the strife,
When, on the slopes of the Northern land,
Was braided closely each separate strand
Of their lives in a perfect, golden band,
Close to each other lie.

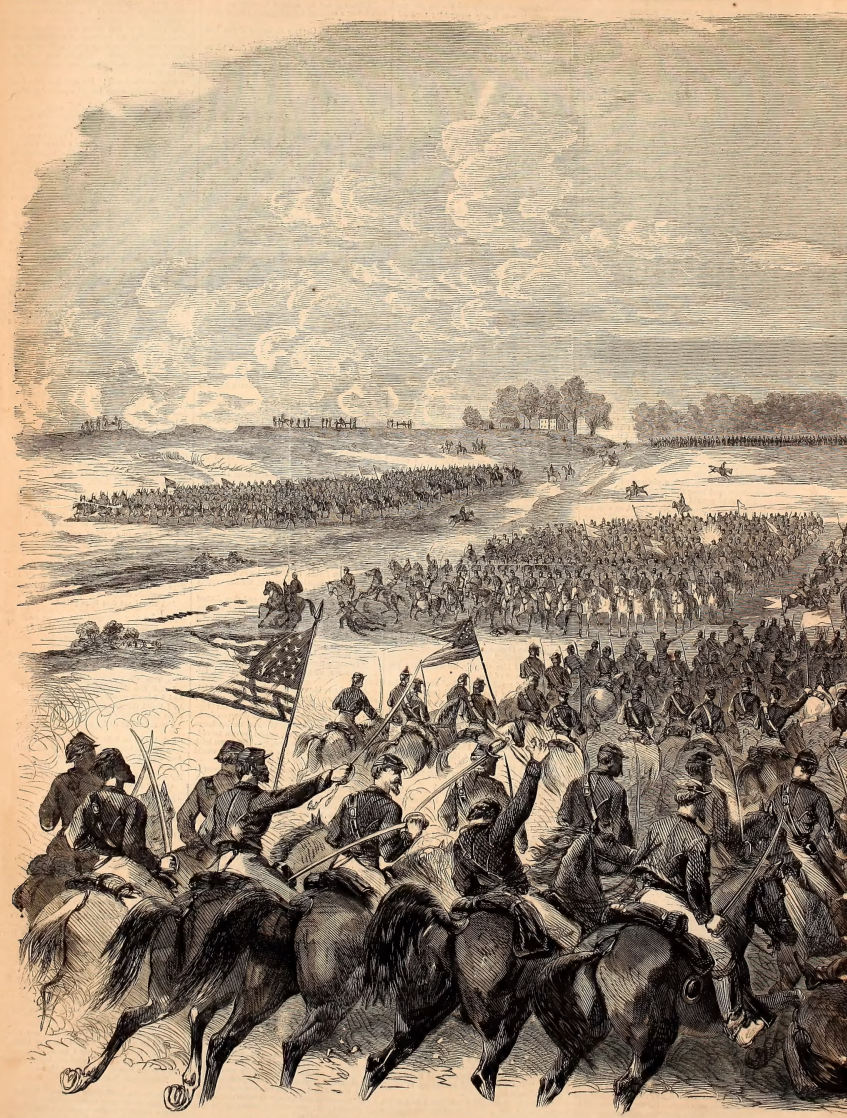
"Tom," says the elder, wiping slow
From his comrade's lips the crimson stain,
"Does the fight go against us?" "Oh no!"
Says the other, with broken voice and low,
"My wounds stopped bleeding an hour ago,
And feel I am free from pain.

"Don't think of my trouble, Ben, for you
Are wounded far worse I know than I;
I am only a little stiff and blue
With lying out in the evening dew;
But Ben, you are shattered through and through:
Do you think you are going to die?"

"No, Tom, the bleeding is almost done;
I shall live this many a day:
And I felt all round to find my gun
As I heard the firing just as the sun
Went down, the rebels I think have run,
The noise was so far away.

"I shall live to fight as never before—
In the battle-front I shall bear my part;
And when I'm over, you know the score,
I shall play with my boy; and by the door
My wife shall sit, with the fear no more
Of war in her gentle heart.

"Oh, Ben! the days of battle appear
A great way off; I'll forget them soon.
I have been thinking while lying here
It was just a year ago to-day
That I went a-hunting with Nellie dear,
Down by the afforestings.



"The hills were as bright as hills could be,
And Nellie, she wore a dress like down,
And under the green old chestnut-tree,
Petted by creeping mist, she sate
Looking up with half-scared eyes at me
As I shook out the chestnuts brown.

"I came down safe, and she kissed me then
With a look that is glad as the hope of heaven;
And she gave me a handful of brown nuts, Ben;
They lay so soft in her hand that when
I took them they slid and got back again
Somehow, so I kept but one.

"I have that nut in my knapsack still:
I shall go for more with Nellie soon:
They are ripe by this time up on the hill.
To-morrow, perhaps, I shall go—I am ill
And its cloudy to-night—but to-morrow will
Be fair in the afternoon.

"I am going a-nutting with Nellie, and you
Will sit with your wife and boy at home;
The day is bright as ever I knew,
And the chestnuts have ripened the warmer through,
Still as the love in your eyes of blue—
Nellie—dear Nellie, come!"

Night on the battle-plain stained with gore,
Night in the eyes now closed for aye;
But a morning bathes a nightless shore
Where a maiden waits and waits for more,
Nor a wife sits mute by a cottage-door,
With a child that forgets to play.

CHARGE OF GENERAL BUFORD'S CAVALRY UPON THE ENEMY NEAR BEVER

LEY FORD, ON THE RAPPAHANNOCK.—Sketched by Mr. A. R. Waud.—[See Page 427.]

THE GUN.

From my bed, quick! roll me out,
  I am choked with this hot sand;
And my throat swells with a shout,
  Gathering, that shall shake the land.

Clear me with your twisted probes,
  Smooth me round with biting steel,
Fit me with your iron globes,
  Set me up on oaken wheel.

Ho! I am the conquering gun,
  Iron son of fire and noise;
Through my frame already run
  Thrills obscure of coming joys.

Come ye men from forge and farm—
  Men of might in arm and knee;
He whose blood takes quick alarm
  Better not companion me.

Wheel me Southward: are those graves
  On the slope of yonder hill?
Yes; but o'er them proudly waves
  The old starry banner still.

Rest me now upon the height:
  What is that before the rim
Of the forest? Look! my sight
  Is a little blurred and dim.

Ah! I see—quick with a shell
  In my throat—boom—there it goes,
With a long-tailed, fiery yell,
  Right among the thickest foes.

Hip! hurrah! they scatter, men;
  Now another—to the right—
Hip! they got it square again;
  This, I think, will be a fight.

Ugh!—no matter—'twas a shot
  Glanced along my iron hide;
And the scratch is rather hot,
  But my bones are sound inside.

Swabber, cool me with your sponge—
  Why lie there and clutch it tight?
Down my throat his blanket plunge—
  He will not need it to-night.

There they come upon the flank,
  Now my bore with grape-shot fill.
Quick—another—while their rank
  Thinly forms below the hill.

Ah! they like the distance best;
  Let me give a parting kick.
See! a dozen stop to rest
  Ere they reach the forest thick.

They have had enough of strife;
  They think this had better cease;
Every unloosed rebel life
  Is a stubborn vote for peace.

Now fling out the victor sound;
  What! you can not shout amain?
Are too many voices drowned
  In the silence of the slain?

What if I am loud and hoarse
  As you count them one by one;
Iron sense is rather coarse—
  I am but a callous gun.

Comrades' tears are holy, sweet—
  Drop them on the faces pale;
While above the angels greet
  Patriot souls with sweet All Hail!

But for me is only joy—
  Iron joy at victory won;
I was fashioned to destroy—
  Ho! I am the conquering gun.

BLIND.

"My dear mother, even the Prayer-Book says a woman may not marry her grandfather."

"Yes, my dear; also that a man may not marry his grandmother. But what has that to do with Mr. Lee?"

"Simply that he is old enough to be my grandfather nearly."

"There is a great difference, certainly; but not quite sufficient for that, Katherine. Mr. Lee is four-and-thirty, and you nearly eighteen."

"My dear mother, I always thought him fifty when I rode his pony years ago."

"Very likely; children's ideas of age are not very correct. They generally think their mother in her dotage at forty. Five years ago he was nine-and-twenty."

"Then such a name, my dear mother. Fancy Michael! It might almost as well be Zedekiah or Nebuchadnezzar at once. I remember your reading a novel with a Nathaniel for a hero; I do not think I could stand Michael for mine; and besides, he is half a widower."

"My dear Katherine, far be it from me to persuade you to marry Mr. Lee, or any one else, only do try and be serious; think quietly about it, and then give me your answer."

Whether it were possible for Katherine to think quietly on any subject whatever just then I don't know; however, her answer was given, and Mrs. Parker told Mr. Lee her daughter could not make up her mind to say any thing but "No." Shortly after Mr. Lee left Oldcourt and went abroad. The only one of the Parker family who bade him farewell was Katherine's little brother Harry, and he announced in the evening:

"I shall be up early to-morrow: I am going up to say good-by to dear Mr. Lee. Will you come, Katie?"

"No, thank you, Harry," Katherine answered, with a look at her mother; "I am not fond of getting up early."

"What a shame! not for once even, and he was so kind to you always. I am so sorry he's going! I hope he won't be long away. I suppose you think yourself too big for his pony now, Katie, as you never ride it. I wonder if I shall be able to have it when he is away."

So early the next morning, a bright one in the middle of February, Harry was off along the lanes and across the fields to Oldcourt. There was a short cut through a wood, which skirted the Pool, to the house. The ground was crisp—just a tinge of white frost—every blade of grass sparkling in the bright sun. There is nothing so beautiful as a white frost, except the spring, when every bud is bursting, and every wood is getting full of wild-flowers, and every bird is singing. They sing altogether, each its own song, yet none is out of tune, even when the rooks join in. How is it, I wonder?

A tall, dark man, with a calm, grave face was looking out on the park and woods at Oldcourt—the park and woods that had been his and his fathers' for generations. He did look old for four-and-thirty. Many men look as young at forty. The Lees all turn gray soon—it seems to run in some families—and there were some white hairs already showing among the black. The face looked almost stern, till two little hands seized hold of one of his, then it looked down with a kindly smile on the early visitor.

"Ah, Harry, my boy, I thought I should not see you again!"

"My dear old Michael, did you think I would let you go without saying a regular good-by? What a brute you must think me!"

"No, I do not, but it is early for you. You shall have some breakfast with me, for I had nearly forgotten it."

So they sat down, and Michael Lee told Harry he was to fish with his keeper, George Mitford, whenever he liked, and Frisky he was to consider his own while he was away; and at that up jumped Harry and threw his arms round his neck and kissed him.

"I can't think why you are going away," said the boy. "I know you're sorry. I saw your face as I came in. Why are you going?"

"Why? Every body goes abroad sometimes, Harry. I shall be home again before Christmas, I dare say. What shall I bring you?—the falling Tower of Pisa, or Mont Blanc?"

"No, no; but I should like some red-hot lava from Mount Vesuvius, and a Mount St. Bernard dog: only a puppy, Michael. Are there any puppies, I wonder? you only read of big dogs, but I dare say there are some puppies sometimes; don't you think there must be?"

Michael Lee thought there certainly could not be always big dogs unless there were puppies occasionally.

"Can you bring some red-hot lava in your portmanteau, Michael? I want it the color of that picture in your bedroom of Mount Vesuvius with the blue sky; will you take an empty jam-pot from Mrs. Wilkins and fill it full for me? It will burn your clothes if you have it loose, won't it?"

Michael Lee thought it very probably would; and then he had to explain it would puzzle Michael Scott himself to bring him red-hot lava the color of Mount Vesuvius in the picture with the blue sky. Of course Harry asked who Michael Scott was? and his namesake had to explain how one word of his had cleft, not Mount Vesuvius, but the Eildon Hills in three, and how when his horse stamped his foot the bells in Nôtre Dame rang; and how he had told the Old Gentleman to mind his own business and carry him across the sea; and just then the dog-cart came round to the door, and Michael Lee said:

"Here comes, not Diabolus, Harry, but Black Rover, and I must mount and fly, or I shall miss the train. Tell Mrs. Parker I was sorry not to see her to say good-by, and I hope she will come and take any flowers she likes; see, here is a note I had written, and was going to send; you take it for me; don't lose it."

"Oh no, I won't lose it; and, Michael, may Katie ride Frisky?"

"I do not think your sister cares for him now, Harry."

There was a change in the tone of voice; a thing children are very quick in noticing.

"Are you vexed with Katie?" said the boy. "She was very fond of Frisky. I can remember, a long, long time ago—I could only have been a little fellow quite, about five or something of that sort, for I had pinafores—when she used to ride Frisky, and she liked it so much! and she used to fish then, and row the boat across the pool. I can't think why she never does any thing jolly now! Can you, Michael?"

Michael swallowed his hot tea without answering; then the boy clung to him to say good-by.

"I'll take you through the park and drop you at the gate, Harry;" and the thought of that brought a smile instead of the salt tears that had begun to come.

"I won't cry, Michael; I shall be nine my next birthday."

(It wanted 345 days to his next birthday!) But when he was dropped at the gate, and he and old Sarah at the lodge had watched the dog-cart disappear, and he saw her shake her head and wipe her eyes, and heard her say, "There goes a good gentleman if ever there was one in this world or the next!" he could not stand it; and, after a good cry, he told Sarah that he was to ride Frisky, and go fishing with George Mitford; but all the fish he caught he should keep for Mr. Lee; he would not let Susan cook one, for he would much rather Mr. Lee had them all! which determination so comforted him that he looked at Sarah's Polish hens, admired their top-knots, and then went on his way home.

Mr. Parker had been Michael Lee's tutor. At his death his wife was left with one daughter of ten and a baby a few months old. Two boys and a girl had gone before him. I may as well say how they died. The fever was bad in the village. John Brown's wife died of it and her two children. William Hodge, the drunken blacksmith, got it next, and he died. Then three or four cottages down that narrow lane with the pig-sties, and that pond which was always green and the water always black, they got it. Then Mr. Harvey, who came from Manchester, and bought a good deal of land in Leamington, and built a large house, and stables, and green-houses, and hot-houses, and ice-houses, and all that (those cottages down the narrow lane belonged to him), "his" little daughter took it. He never let her go out of his own grounds, and thought there was what he called "no chance" of her getting it; but she did; and there is a little tomb with a white cross on it in the church at Leamington: and the cottages are comfortable now, and the pig-sties at the end of the garden (not up against the one bedroom on the ground-floor), and the pond has been drained, and Mr. Harvey is not what he was when the fever began, and he thanks God for it often, on his knees, though he is lonely, very lonely, never hearing her little feet pattering about now, except in his dreams. Many others had it, and Mrs. Parker was frightened. Four children under eight years old she had of her own, and she wished there were some Sisters of Mercy at Leamington, as there were at some places, who could take the good soup and wine to the poor sick ones, without the terrible fear pulling and gnawing at their hearts all the time that she had. That terrible fear! She had it—she could not help it, though her husband said,

"My dear, I change my coat, I wash my hands and face, and then I trust."

She tried to trust too; but somehow the fear clung to her; and on Sunday night Arthur said:

"Mother, my throat is so sore." He was only three and a half, and she tried to hope he did not know where his throat was, and that he would put his hand to his back, or leg, or any where else, only not to his throat, and she said,

"Where, my darling? where is it sore?" And the child put up his hand and said,

"I mean where my dinner goes down, mother." And then she knew her boy had got the fever; and the next day Mary said,

"Mother, just look what a lump there is under my ear, by my cheek, and it hurts me so when I swallow; I hope I am not going to be ill, like papa said poor little Mary Brown was." And she knew Mary had the fever too.

Next Sunday, after the afternoon service, Arthur was buried. They had an old-fashioned way of ringing the bells at Leamington; they do not every where; but it was an old-fashioned place, and old fashions about Church things are best. They rang the curfew at Leamington always from Advent to Lent, and they tolled the bell, when there was to be a funeral, all day, until the mourners and the coffin could be seen coming near the church; and then they rang a joyful peal for a minute or so—not like a wedding or any other peal; and it always sounded like a welcome—like the angels welcoming one more: one more who had passed through the waves of this troublesome world, and had reached the haven where we all would be. So, sitting by little Mary's bed, wetting her hot lips, the mother heard the joyful peal ring out for Arthur, and she knelt down by Mary, and kissed her hot cheek; and Mary heard the bells too, and she opened her eyes and said,

"Arthur will be with the daisies soon, mother; he was so fond of daisies, and those double red ones."

Mary died that evening—Sunday evening; and when all was over, and the little fair thing lay with the little hands crossed on her breast, the mother turned away to change her dress, and wash her face and hands, and to trust—trust to Him who had only taken what He had given. She might go and look at her youngest now; she was no longer needed in the sick-room—it was empty. The little merry laugh as she went along the passage! Baby should be asleep; but babies in summer, in the long days so light, do not always do what they ought to do about going to sleep, and baby was laughing as she reached the door! So strange it sounded to hear a laugh then, even from a baby. Sitting up in his little crib was the two-year-old baby, hugging the kitten which had been beside little Mary, and fondled to the last. By the next Sunday two more were with the daisies beside Arthur, and the eldest, Katherine, the only child left them.

Harry was born a year after, and Mr. Parker died, and then the widow, with her two children, returned to the neighborhood of her old home, where her husband had been curate, and afterward tutor to Mr. Lee. Mr. Lee was one of the first to welcome Mrs. Parker: a sad welcome to the place where her early, happy days had been spent. Michael Lee was then a young man of six-and-twenty. He had had a sincere regard for his tutor, and every little attention in his power he bestowed on Mrs. Parker. There was the quiet old pony for Katherine to ride, his park was open to her and her mother; some of the choicest flowers were always on her table. It was no self-denial; he had plenty of every thing; but he had a way of being kind—he always thought of others—and his way of being kind and thoughtful was never disagreeable; with some people it is. He and Katherine were soon great friends. As she grew older, and the old pony more stupid, a younger one took its place—the "Frisky" of which we have heard—and fishing and boating at Oldcourt were among her greatest pleasures. Then came the news of Mr. Lee's approaching marriage. It was quite true: he told Mrs. Parker of it himself, all joy and happiness; and, two months after, the bells at Oldcourt were tolling for her who was to have been mistress there so soon—tolling for the bride elect.

Katherine was sixteen then, and Mrs. Parker moved to London for a twelvemonth, to give her the advantage of some better masters than Oldcourt afforded. At the end of that time she returned to her favorite cottage, and the pony, fishing, and boating were transferred to Harry, who was delighted with every thing after the confinement of London. A grave, quiet man was Michael Lee now: it was strange a child like Harry should be so devoted to him, yet so it was. Harry was his constant companion through his woods, marking the trees, carrying his fishing basket, perfectly satisfied in his own mind he was of great use and assistance to Mr. Lee, whom he very soon learned to call Michael; and the grave, quiet man grew very fond of the boy, partly on his own account, for all loved Harry, and partly, ere many months were over, for the sake of his sister: and so at last he spoke to Mrs. Parker. Katherine refused him, and he went abroad. Harry begged to write to him, and Michael Lee answered his letters, which contained a great deal of news of various kinds: such as the ewe with the black mark on her leg had three lambs again this year, and one was fed with a tea-pot. There was a blackbird's nest in one of the red rhododendrons. Frisky was in great beauty, but it was very difficult to catch him now, as he would not come for corn when there was so much grass: he found the best way was to blow a cow's-horn trumpet behind a bush, for Frisky came to see what the noise was, thinking the hounds were out, Harry believed, and then he was easily taken. A corn-crake had her legs mown off, sitting on her nest, by Thomas Smith, when they were mowing the mill meadow, and Harry had taken some of the eggs to see if Katie's bantum would hatch them, etc., etc. Then came an account of a bad cold he had caught somehow, he could not tell how; boys never can; but he had not been allowed to go out fishing for some time, nor in the boat with George Mitfort. George had had a bad finger, but it was better, and he had a new baby, and Venus had puppies. It (the baby) was christened last Sunday; it was a boy, which was much better than a girl, as it might be a keeper too some day. They were all beauties, especially one with a black nose; and had he been to Mount St. Bernard yet?

Harry's next letter was finished by Mrs. Parker, and she told Mr. Lee the cold had become a cough, and that Dr. Watson thought it would be more prudent for him to winter at the sea-side. They were going to Beaumaris the end of September; and when Michael Lee received this letter he felt sure Harry was worse than his mother thought. During that winter at Beaumaris Harry had several letters from Mr. Lee. He thought his handwriting was changed, or that he was writing larger for him because he was a child; but he could always read Michael's writing, he said, and was rather affronted. Then he did not hear for a long time, and at last he received a few lines, telling him he had been ill, and that Harry must not think he had forgotten him if he did not hear, for the doctor forbade his writing; it hurt his eyes.

And then came several months, and Harry never heard, and he wanted to know so much how Michael was. His cough had never left him, and they were still at Beaumaris. He used to sit on the beach for hours, or go in a boat when it was fine; sometimes row up past the Menai Bridge to the little fishing island, and land there to see all the sea wonders that are to be found on it; the sea anemones in countless numbers, of every color, hanging on the rough walls under the long masses of sea-weed; the scarlet star-fish; the great purple one, and fish, especially the little white-bait, looking like a sheet of silver, as they glided along at low-water in the weir. Sometimes they went in the other direction toward Puffin Island, but only on warm, dry days. Mrs. Parker's sweet face looked very anxious now, and Katherine was more gentle and loving to her little brother far than formerly.

One day, in the middle of September, Harry came sooner from the beach than usual, through the little garden, into the house, and hiding his face on his mother's knee, he sobbed out, "I've seen Michael, and he's quite blind."

By degrees he told his tale.

"I was on the beach, mother; I was at that shell-stall; I wanted a Venus's ear, when all of a sudden I saw Michael come out of the hotel. I was sure it was he, and Simpson—you remember Mr. Simpson the butler—with him; and Simpson helped him down the steps, and I could not believe it was Michael hardly, but I left the shells and went to meet him, and when I got nearer I saw it was Michael; so I ran up to him, and his eyes were open; but when I had got hold of his hand he did not look at me, only said, 'Oh, Harry, my boy, how are you—are you better?' And I said, 'My cough is not very bobbish; but oh, Michael, what is Simpson doing walking with you?' And then he smiled very quietly, and held my hands, and said, 'Simpson shall go now, and you will take care of a poor blind man.' And I said, 'Oh, Michael, you're not blind; your eyes are quite open, and you must wear spectacles; but I hope you won't look like old Matthew at home.' It was very foolish of me, but I did not like to believe it; and he shook his head, and drew my hand through his arm, and said, 'Now we can take a walk near the sea, and talk about it;' and so we walked a little, and he said he could not write, and he wanted to hear about me, and the doctor said the sea-side would do him good, and so he came here last night. He is at the hotel, the Bulkeley Arms, and he thought I was sure to come on the beach and would see him, and I saw him as he was coming down the steps, so I was not long about that. But he is blind, quite blind, mother, and I am to lead him about: he says he likes to have me better than Simpson, mother. I wanted him to come here now with me, but he did not like to come until I had told you, he said."

Katherine was sitting by the window. She was looking at the hills on the opposite shore, with all the lights and shadows flitting over them. How beautiful they are! She did not see them; and the sands stretching out so far, looking as if you might walk across into Carnarvonshire; and the green sparkling water so smooth and still. She saw nothing of all this now. She did not say a word while Harry was speaking, but she did something else, very quietly, and thought no one saw her—she was mistaken.

Mr. Lee came with Harry in the afternoon; he was quieter and graver than before, and Harry was always with him whenever it was warm enough for him to be out of doors; and Michael Lee would come and sit with him when the weather prevented the boy leaving the house. Simpson brought him to the garden gate, and then he was able to walk up the little garden by himself. Sometimes Mrs. Parker would sit with him, and at times Katherine had helped him, but her hand always trembled as it rested on his arm, and he was angry and grew worse by himself rather than ask her; and then Harry called her stupid for not offering.

It was the 30th of October, a very wild day. Harry was not so well, lying on the couch, looking out of the window, watching the thick muddy waves washing up and down the shore. The ferry-boat was not crossing; it was so very rough. Something was coming, the sailors knew that well. Something was coming, and looked out to sea. It was worse by the evening. How the wind howled! And the tide was in, every now and then dashing over the sea-wall into the road. Harry lay watching the angry waves. He had never seen the Straits so rough before. Michael was out to see it, but he heard the roaring of the waters, and he hummed the line—

And the sailors were rolling up, ragged and brown.

"It will be a terrible night, Harry, I fear," he said.

"It will indeed, Michael. I was thinking you would scarcely get back to the hotel."

Ay, a terrible night it was; one to be much remembered in Dover. As they spoke the big iron ship was rolling about in the thick fog, hoping for a lighter wind to get her through the night; and before Michael Lee reached the Bulkeley Arms the big iron ship was thumping against the cliff, and in a few minutes after the last discount was the harder. The great masts tottered and fell, shivered so that Katherine's little fingers broke off pieces from them afterwards. "The ship's all was over—when the big iron ship was broken to pieces—when "the strong mast ceased, and the sailors were still," some bottles of Champagne and pickles were found unbroken amidst the rocks, which were covered with big trees. "She trenched out of the big iron ship that night of agony!" Scarcely credible if read in a novel—and yet it is true. "Verily" truth is strange sometimes, stranger than fiction!"

So these two sat watching and listening to the storm that night, and at last Harry said—

"Michael, I have been thinking of such a good plan."

And Michael said, "Have you, my boy? What about?"

And Harry said, "About you, Michael. I know you don't like having Simpson with you always; and you see, I'm not strong enough to read a great deal, or you know that it's not fun. Shall I try? I made of sugar, or salt, or something, and that I shall melt; and I've been thinking if you had a wife it would be much better. I wish Katherine would do so nicely, and then, when you go back to Oldcourt, she or I would always be with you."

If mother would but let you could fall back on me. And she reads ever so long without getting tired, and writes as fast too. Do you think it a good plan, Michael?"

"My dear Harry," the quiet voice said, and then stopped.

"Oh, what a monster! It's bigger than my yet. There, it's broke over the pier, I declare; such a wave. Master, you never saw the like, will what do you think about Katie?"

"I think, Harry, for once you have forgotten I am blind," Michael Lee answered.

"No, I have not, Michael; that's the very thing much—that you ought to have a wife to see for you weren't there's no reason for it. You could fish, and shoot, and ride, and read, and write, and do every single yourself, and she might be in the way and want you for something just when you had got your gun, perhaps. I think you'd find her so useful you'd wish you had put it into my head."

"Harry, I thought of it a long time ago, when I was not blind, and the wish could not be more even then. I am glad of it now, Harry, for her sake." But the deep low voice had no gladness in it.

Up started the boy from the couch.

"Oh, Michael, you don't really mean you ever asked Katie to be your wife before!"

"Yes, Harry, I do mean even that."

"And Katie said she would not like to be Michael?"

"Yes, Harry."

"What a shame! Oh, Michael, it makes me almost wish I'd been a girl myself. I'm sure I should have liked it very much." He threw himself back on the couch and continued, Michael could not see how his color went and came. So neither of them spoke. And when he had done coughing for a little; then he said: "I might have been strong enough for a girl, perhaps; there's not much to do, you see, though Katie's more active than I am. She's a great deal older, that's one thing. I wonder if I shall ever be as old as Katie; she's very old for her years, you know. Do you know, Michael, sometimes I think I never shall. You can't see me now, or you would know how thin I have become—a regular monster. I'm a great deal taller, but my hands are so thin, my fingers look so long, and they're so white since I parted to myself long? I see on the beach. Some of the boys from the grammar-school I often watch playing cricket by the castle, and such nice brown hands they've got, I'm quite ashamed of mine. It's not manly to have such white hands. Do you think I ever shall be a man, Michael?"

Michael felt for the boy's hand, and stroked it in his own. He knew it was very thin and soft, though he could not see how white it was. He stroked it a few moments, and then he said:

"Harry, my boy, if you were ill, I remember there is a better Land than this, where you will be strong, and I shall see again. We must both think of that, Harry, and be patient. It is hard work often, is it not?"

"Very; and sometimes I'm so cross when I can't sleep, Michael. I know what you mean. You think I shall never get any better; you mean my cough will go on getting worse, and I shall get thinner and thinner, and weaker and weaker, and then I shall die. I hope I shall go to heaven, Michael. I don't think I have done any thing very wicked; you know I've not been at school much among other boys, so it's not been so difficult. I remember, Michael, I hit a little brown mouse pence. I could not help watching Thomas do it, and then I remember I did one more thing, when I shot a little bird up its poor little head. I can't think what made me, and afterward I remember how old Sir James and mamma and Katie quite scolded them, and I felt so sorry then. Well, Michael, I'll try and be patient, and not be cross any more, and if I die what you've given me. And as to Katie, when you come, Michael; and if I were to live to be a man, you might not, you know, Michael; I should have changed so, and a eighteen months now since you saw me, Michael. But I want to ask you about Katie again. Did she mean she did not like you?"

"Not like me well enough, Harry, she meant."

"Not so well, Michael, then I think she changed her mind, and I'll tell you why. When I came back the first day I met you and told her and mother you were blind, she was quite surprised, but she cried; I saw her, and often I see her eyes full of tears after you've been here."

"Yes; she is very sorry for me, Harry, that is all."

"I don't think it is all, Michael. Mother's very sorry for you, but she cries more when you're not there; mothers going to anchor round the Point: there's a regular fleet of them."

The door opened, and Simpson bowled! It was Katherine, bringing Harry's medicine. She put it down on the little table by him, and smoothed his hair and kissed his forehead. "Is that all, Harry, coming on!" Harry pulled her down close to him, and whispered something. Michael could not hear, but his eye saw that she blushed many times. Then Katherine stood upright, and said:

"Harry, will you take your nasty medicine?" And Michael heard her voice tremble.

"No, I won't take it, Katie, till you answer my question; and you ought to answer it, you know, so I ought to have it at once. Michael says, you said you'd rather not be his wife, and I want to know if you'd rather not now, or if you've changed your mind about it."

"Harry, no more of this, or I shall go back to Oldcourt," said the quiet, sad voice, not quiet or calm now.

"He is too young to know all he is saying; forgive him," he added.

"Oh, Michael, don't be angry with me; but indeed she's going to Oldcourt, and I'll tell you why, and if you would only just ask her yourself, you would see. Dear Michael, you know I shall never be to be a man, and I shall be more and more thinner, and weaker and weaker, you'll have no one to take any care of you, and I feel so sure Katie would like it, only she didn't dare."

"Harry, I told your sister was very sorry for me, nothing more."

"Sorry! I am very sorry when the cat died. I don't mean that. I can see her face, and you can't read her face, and you can't hear her, and you know he doesn't like asking you now he's blind; and, if I were you, I would just put my arms round her neck, and tell her you're sorry for so much, without his asking me."

"No, Harry, you could not, if you were me," said Katherine, whose voice was more than trembling now, it was sobbing.

She put down her head; Harry had tight hold of her hand; and when he talked of growing weaker and weaker, and thinner and thinner, she had knelt beside him, hearing nothing of what Michael said, for the blind man knew by her voice she was kneeling down, and he stretched out his hand, and it rested on her small head and fair curls. Harry saw the arm rise and not pretty; but she was tall and slight, with a small head set on her throat like a lily, and a small head set on her throat like a lily, and that quantities of bright glossy hair twisted round and round. He, Michael, put his hand on it, and said: "Let Katherine," and Harry said: and she did not answer at first, only he felt her turn from Harry's couch more toward him, and then she said, softly:

"Can't you see me the least bit, Michael?"

And he said, "No, Katherine; I would give all I have in the world to look at your face now, darling."

And then Harry said: "I'll tell you, Michael, what the looks like, and don't give Oldcourt and Frisky and all away for nothing but that. She's as pale as she was, but there's a pink spot on each she's hid her face, and I can't tell you what she's like."

She had hidden her face, but it was hidden on Michael Lee's other hand, and he felt her hot tears on it, and he said:

"Katherine if you stay one moment longer I shall believe what Harry told me."

She did not move. He stroked the bright, glossy hair, and then he gently raised her and drew her closer to him, and said something in such a whisper that only could not hear: and Harry watched his hands and said:

"Hurrah! I suppose I'd better take my medicine now, Katie, and you'll be quite happy all day."

So she rose and gave it him with one hand, for Michael had the other; and Harry drank it, made a face, and said:

"I shan't be satisfied till you have put your arms round his neck and told him you are very sorry for ever having said you would not like it; it was such a shame!"

So she knelt down again, and did put her arms round his neck (not Harry's), and said something, too, which Harry could not hear; and Michael kissed her, and said one more to Harry, and with the other gathered her up quite close to him, and said:

"I pray God you may never repent, my Katherine. And Harry, my boy, you can see her face and I can not, as you said just now; and if ever you see her cry, or look unhappy, I trust to you to tell me and help me to find it out. Darling, if ever woman was loved, you are, my Katherine; for now, with that black shoot before me, while makes even your dear face as dark as night, I would not give you up, even to see the blessed light of heaven and the green earth again. I would rather be blind with you than see without you, Katherine."

But no answer, but she lifted up her face to his and kissed it; and Harry brought his white, calm face and rested it on Michael's shoulder, and said:

"Michael, I wish I could make my eyes over to you. There's no use to Oldcourt—only shooting, and you'll never be able to fish without them. I would if I could, Michael, for all my things have been given me. And as to Katie, I hope you'll like her much better than Simpson; and if she isn't happy it's her own fault, that's certain. Fancy her being happy at Oldcourt! And I dare say you'll give her a bigger pony; she can't have a better than Frisky, she's too tall for him, and you'll always let him run in the park, won't you, Michael, when he gets old? Mother would be very cut. He would break his heart, I know it would, Michael. He'd pull it; he'd pull any thing; but I'm certain it would break his heart, Michael."

And Michael Lee promised Frisky should always be cared for as if he were the best hunter in the land; and the little white face looked up lovingly into the poor blind eyes, and then went on to say:

"I think I have given you of Katie everything she would not like it. Don't you, Michael?"

And they both laughed and kissed him, and then the boy said he must go and lie instead, for it was all his doing, every bit. And that evening, after tea, they all sat by Harry's couch, all that time the big iron ship was break, break, breaking, on those cold gray stones, just across the island.

THE CAVALRY FIGHT NEAR CULPEPPER.

OUR special artist, Mr. A. R. Waud, sends us a sketch which we reproduce on pages 424 and 425, representing the cavalry fight near Culpepper, Major Stuart's rebel forces near Culpepper. Mr. Waud writes:

"CHANGE OF A PORTION OF BUFORD'S COMMAND.

"This charge had to be made across a meadow intersected by four ditches, in jumping which some horses fell, their riders being compelled to fight on foot. At the other side of this field the ground rose to the woods, which also extended along the line from the left of the road, upon the ridge, was a house used as Stuart's head-quarters, afterward occupied by Buford. A battery which shelled our men till they closed upon the rebs, the case and canister killing more of their men than ours.

"On the right of the road three battalions were drawn up in column of companies, supported by a battery of six guns, and on the left a fourth battalion was posted. Against them General Buford sent two regiments. These had to come out of the woods and form under fire from the batteries. The Sixth Pennsylvania, formerly Lancers, led the charge, which was directed against the centre battalion. The Sixth fell upon these with great gallantry, and, regardless of the chances of flank attack from the other battalions, rode right through, halted to hand, through the brigade in reserve, and then wheeling about, passed round the battalion on the right, and made preparation for another charge. The regiment on the left advanced as oars charged to take us in flank, but had not the courage to come to hand with cold steel.

THE SIEGE OF VICKSBURG.

On page 420 we reproduce a picture drawn by our special artist, Mr. Theodore R. Davis, and representing

THE REBEL WORKS ASSAULTED BY THE BRIGADES OF GENERAL BANNON AND COLONEL SMITH.

Mr. DAVIS writes:

"HEAD-QUARTERS OF MAJOR-GENERAL M'PHERSON, June 5, 1863.

"The sketch shows the position of the rebels, so gallantly assaulted by the brigades of General Bannon and Colonel Smith.

"The charge of the battalion of the 13th Regulars, who were in the command of Colonel Smith, is said to have been very spirited indeed. Corporate gallantry; Captain Washington, the commanding officer, was killed, and but two or three officers escaped unwounded, five color-bearers were shot, one after the other, two of them being officers, Captains Ewing and Yates. The colors were being placed at the foot of the parapet by Captain Ewing as he was shot.

"I never have seen colors so torn as were these after this desperate charge; in one of the flags eighty shot-holes were to be counted.

"The colors of General Ransom's Brigade were placed by that gallant officer's own hoist at the foot of the opposite angle of the work; in his single brigade the loss was over four hundred killed and wounded. To this brigade is also accorded every credit for desperate valor.

"To the extreme left of the picture is seen Fort Hill, one of the strongest of the rebel works. The name of the fort I am sure of, but of which I have not been able to ascertain. The approach of General Sherman is within a short distance (seventy-five yards). Another fort is beyond.

"To the right of the sketch are the batteries Whitehouse, Hart, and others, under the command of Major Taylor, Chief of Artillery of General Sherman's Corps.

"The brigade of General Ransom is composed of Eleventh Illinois, Colonel Nevin, killed; Seventy-second Illinois, Colonel Starling, wounded; Ninety-fifth Illinois, Colonel Humphrey, severely wounded; Seventeenth Wisconsin, Lieutenant-Colonel M'Mahon; Fourteenth Wisconsin, Colonel Wood, wounded. Each of these regiments was at the foot of the parapet, those of the Fourteenth Wisconsin being placed there by General Ransom."

On page 421 we give a picture of one of our siege batteries, which are thus described by Mr. Davis:

"HEAD-QUARTERS OF MAJOR-GENERAL M'PHERSON, June 5, 1863.

"BATTERY LOGAN.

"From this work the rebel Fort Hill and our work for its capture are in good view.

"The narrow of the work for the line of rebel sharp-shooters has rendered the protection of the gunners in every way necessary. While engaged in working on this work, which is interesting, one is prone to be a little more eager to see than to beware of the sharp-eyed 'reb.' At such times the tip-lip of a shell has its effect.

"Some of the rifle-shot that are found after passing through the embrasures are of the most curious burst. As yet, these diminutive shells have done no damage. Still in advance of this work Captain Powell and General Sherman are building a work of which these works are exceedingly creditable to their builders.

"BATTERY HICKENLOOPER.

"This work, constructed by Major Andrew Hickenlooper, of General M'Pherson's staff, is the work thrown up by the rebels in the most effective and defensive, of any such attempt as yet planned around Vicksburg. Its nearness to the rebel works will be realized by examination of the cut. From this position the opposing forces are within fifty yards of each other's works.

It is not unusual to hear some of our men request an Alabama or Carolina friend to raise his head "just a little bit over the top of the works, in order to have a fair shot. Frequently a hat is raised by a ramrod above our works, to draw the fire of the enemy, when a sharp-shooter from a ample's ace notihg and drawing a fine sight on the rebel marksmen."

THE FIGHT AT MILLIKEN'S BEND.

Mr. DAVIS also sends us a sketch of the sharp fight at Milliken's Bend, where a small body of negro troops, with a few white officers, repulsed by a larger force of rebels. A letter from Vicksburg says:

Twenty-second Day of Siege of Vicksburg, June 5, 1863.

Two gentlemen from the Yazoo have given me the following officer report of the fight at Milliken's Bend, which negro troops played so conspicuous a part.

It appears that on the 6th inst. a force of about 1800 and 500 men of the Twenty-third Iowa, belonging to the Second Brigade, Fourth Division, Sixteenth Corps, had been up the river with prisoners, and was on its way back to the Yazoo, when it was surprised by a force of about 2000 men. The first intimation that the commanding officer received was the sight of the rebels who went into the colonel's tent, and said: "Means, the jig is up." The colonel replied: "Not exactly," and the men load their guns at once. He instantly replied: "We have about the right number." Before the colonel was ready the men were in line, ready for action. As before stated, the rebels were in front of the camp boats, taking colored men prisoners and murdering them. They emerged from the woods in front of the enemy more heroically and desperately than has been recorded during the war. Our men met them with charge, a hand-to-hand fight, that has never occurred to any extent in the western campaign. The fight both sides were not killed with the butts of muskets. White and black men were lying side by side in the ditches. There were many instances recorded to the earth. In one instance, two negroes—one white and the other black—were found side by side, each having the other's bayonet through his body. The fight lasted about an hour. Upon reinforcements, the engagement of Sunday morning will be recorded as the most desperate of the war. Dismounted rebel cavalrymen, the mingling of bodies, all prove that it was a contest between evenly matched men; no rebel was allowed to a race, and on the other, desire for self-preservation, regardless of life, prompted the negro to murder all of their comrades. One brave man took his former master prisoner, and, handing him over to the colonel, asked if a rebel prisoner made a particular request that his own negroes should not be sent after him to the Yazoo. Fortune is capricious! His request was not granted.

The rebels lost, as stated, 200 men killed, 500 to 700 wounded, and about 200 prisoners. Our loss is reported to be 100 killed and 800 wounded; but few of this number were white men.

A RAID AMONG THE RICE PLANTATIONS.

On page 429 we illustrate the recent raid of Colonel Montgomery's Second South Carolina Volunteers (colored) among the Rice Plantations of South Carolina. The object of the expedition was to reproduce, Surgeon Robinson, writes as follows:

"HD. SQRS. SIDNEY'S ISLAND, GEORGIA, June 8, 1863.

"I inclose you a sketch of the recent operations of Colonel James Montgomery (formerly of Kansas), of the Second South Carolina Volunteers (colored), in the interior of South Carolina, among the rice plantations up the Combahee.

"We destroyed a vast amount of rice, corn, and cotton, stored in the barns and rice-mills, with many valuable steam-engines. We broke the sluice-gates and flooded the fields so that the growing crop, which was growing beautifully, will be a total loss. We carried out the President's proclamation to the letter, and brought away, with contrabands, 150 of whom are now serving their country in the regiment which liberated them. The rest were old men, women, and children. The rebel loss from our visit must amount to several millions of dollars. We are now about commencing operations on the Georgia coast.

"We skirmished all day with the rebels, but escaped without the loss of a man. Their cavalry killed and wounded some of the slaves as they swarmed to the protection of the old flag."

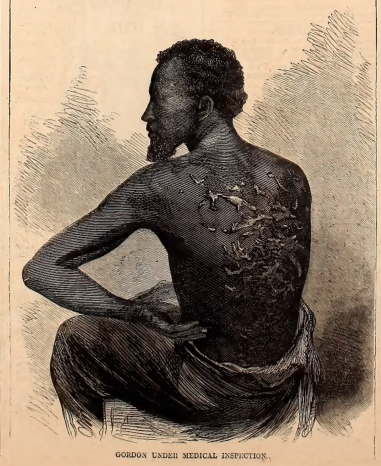
A TYPICAL NEGRO.

We publish herewith three portraits, from photographs by M'Pherson and Oliver, of the negro GORDON, who escaped from his master in Mississippi, and came into our lines at Baton Rouge in March last. One of these portraits represents the man as he entered our lines, with clothes torn and covered with mud and dirt from his long race through the swamps and bayous, chased as he had been for days and nights by his master with several neighbors and a pack of blood-hounds; another shows him as he underwent the surgical examination previous to being mustered into the service—his back furrowed and scarred with the traces of a whipping administered on Christmas-day last; and the third represents him in United States uniform, bearing the musket and prepared for duty.

This negro displayed unusual intelligence and energy. In order to foil the scent of the blood-hounds who were chasing him he took from his plantation onions, which he carried in his pockets. After crossing each creek or swamp he rubbed his body freely with these onions, and thus, no doubt, frequently threw the dogs off the scent.



At one time in Louisiana he served our troops as guide, and on one expedition was unfortunately taken prisoner by the rebels, who, infuriated beyond measure, tied him up and beat him, leaving him for dead. He came to life, however, and once more made his escape to our lines.

By way of illustrating the degree of brutality which slavery has developed among the whites in the section of country from which this negro came, we append the following extract from a letter in the New York Times, recounting what was told by the refugees from MRS. GILLESPIE'S estate on the Black River:

> The treatment of the slaves, they say, has been growing worse and worse for the last six or seven years.
> Flogging with a leather strap on the naked body is common; also, paddling the body with a hand-saw until the skin is a mass of blisters, and then breaking the blisters with the teeth of the saw. They have "very often" seen slaves stretched out upon the ground with hands and feet held down by fellow-slaves, or lashed to stakes driven into the ground for "burning." Handfuls of dry corn-husks are then lighted, and the burning embers are whipped off with a stick so as to fall in showers of live sparks upon the naked back. This is continued until the victim is covered with blisters. If in his writhings of torture the slave gets his hands free to brush off the fire, the burning brand is applied to them.
> Another method of punishment, which is inflicted for the higher order of crimes, such as running away, or other refractory conduct, is to dig a hole in the ground large enough for the slave to squat or lie down in. The victim is then stripped naked and placed in the hole, and a covering or grating of green sticks is laid over the opening. Upon this a quick fire is built, and the live embers sifted through upon the naked flesh of the slave, until his body is blistered and swollen almost to bursting. With just enough of life to enable him to crawl, the slave is then allowed to recover from his wounds if he can, or to end his sufferings by death.
> "Charley Shoe" and "Overton," two hands, were both murdered by these cruel tortures. "Shoe" was whipped to death, dying under the infliction, or soon after punishment. "Overton" was laid naked upon his face and burned as above described, to test the code of his legs and the muscles of the back refused longer to perform their office. He was, nevertheless, forced into the field to labor, but being crippled, was unable to move quick enough to suit "Tom," the driver. For this offence the negro struck him on the head with the heavy stick and killed him.

"Tom" had the consumption, but was forced to work in the cotton-field. One night he was missing from his master in. Two days afterward his body was found in the field, where he had fallen and died on his way home.

"The poor old slave had gone to rest."

Edmond, belonging on the Widow Gillespie's plantation, has been a witness of or knowing to several cases of punishment by the burning process. Two of these were of girls belonging to the Widow G., in New Orleans, and the others occurring on her "island plantation," before referred to. A mulatto, wife of Essex, one of the slaves in the party, related to me the particulars of one case, as follows: Emma was a middle-aged woman in the family named Margaret, who had a nursing child. Mrs. Gillespie ordered Margaret to wean the child. The babe was weakly, and Margaret did not wish to do so. Mrs. G. told her that she would remember her breast the next Monday, and, if she found any milk in it, she would punish her severely. Monday came around, and on that day Margaret went was to spin eighteen "broches"—spools—but she did not finish it; at night the promised examination took place, and the breast of Margaret gave but too convincing proof that, in obedience to the promise of a mistress's heart, she had spurned the threat of the inhuman mistress. Mrs. G. then ordered the hands to the usual stop, and a wash-boat of large size was procured, which had been used for the purpose of drying the sand, but which was now filled with water. Into this Margaret was placed, her breast and back bare, and her feet were forcibly bound.

During this terrible infliction "Jems" came out of his room and remonstrated with his mother for "using the niggers so." He "did not with them [mulatto] in any way." Her answer was, "They won't mind me, and I will do with them as I please." Margaret was a long time in recovering from her wounds. Rose Ann, who was child's nurse, was next upon the occasion to bid and bring home a little boy named Tommy, whom his father had taken down to town with him after breakfast. The child was delivered at Mrs. Turnett's, a "grocer-keeper," living in Camp Street, below Julia. He was found after a second call and brought home. Mrs. G. accused Rose of not trying to find the boy at first. She ordered her husband to come and attend over her hand; she was placed upon her back on the floor, her hands tied to the bed-cords and her feet to the extension table. In this position her person was exposed to view, and the poker heated in the fire. This punishment she more humiliating as well as most acute, the hot instrument was applied to the sacred region par for her body. She then gave her fifty lashes and let her loose.

This punishment was not caused by the child's misconduct of torture with the witness. Amerie, who was and related these facts to me, was in the presence of several of her fellow-slaves, suffered a similar punishment on the plantation, and was then sold to a trader. The punishment she had to undergo was for "impudence." Mrs. G.'s daughter's dress the wrong way. For this offence she was made to lie on a board upon a table, her hands and feet bound to the leather strap and buckle tightly fastened around her stomach and pressed her body. Having procured a pair of tongs in the fire, she ordered them brought and began pinching and burning her about the thighs, abdomen, and other parts until they were baked and stiff. This species of refined torture seems to be a favorite one with her. On another occasion "America" says she was whipped with a new "cow-hide" until her flesh was cut to the bones. Mrs. G. then brought a bottle of "No. 6," and with a small sponge she lacerated parts of the body with the liquid, causing the most intense torture she ever experienced. Likewise, and the next occasion, she was in a very common thing to see a slave carried by force to the residence of Mrs. Gillespie, and there be whipped. She would order him to undress, and with her own hands apply the lash until the human exhausted.

A DUEL OR TWO.

SHORTLY after the battle of Waterloo an unlucky pamphlet found its way into Frescati, the conversation-rooms at the watering-place of Boisgenes. This pamphlet took pretty much the same odd view of the battle of Toulouse as M. Thiers has recently done of Waterloo. An Englishman chanced to take it up, and wrote on the margin that "every thing in it was false; that Lord Wellington had gained a complete victory, and the French men were indebted to his generosity for not having been put to the sword." A hot young Frenchman of the place, named Prince, at once called out the indiscreet Englishman. Every thing was done to accommodate matters; and we are told that even the authorities calculated and considerately acted "precisely so far as moral suasion might be effectual. But all these good offices proved ineffectual, and the representatives of the two nations met on the ground. Poor Prince gave one more illustration of the insufficiency of this mode of adjusting a quarrel. He fell at the first fire he received the Englishman's ball in the stomach, and died shortly after.

The reason after the first abdication of Napoleon, and more particularly after the battle of Waterloo, was, it is well known, very fruitful in quarrels between French and English officers. Every mess-room, gossip, Captain Grouse, has furnished many incidents illustrative of this spirit. In the "Life" of the French spent days and nights practicing fencing; and even resorted to the device of dressing up fencing-masters in officers' clothes, and making them to pick quarrels with the English. It became impossible for these latter to avoid a conflict with men burning with rage and mortification, and determined to insult their conquerors. At Bordeaux, the Frenchmen used to come into the Gironde for the express purpose of picking a quarrel; and as the challenge usually came from the English, the French had the choice of weapons, which generally selected their favorite small-sword. Strange to say, the result was usually fatal to their own countrymen, who, being utterly helpless at cut-and-thrust, and all the niceties of the exercise, unconsciously reproduced the scene in Alexandre Bourgeois, rushed on, in defiance of guards and passes, and cut down their enemy at once. In vain the Frenchmen protested that this was "brutal" and "unchivalrous," that it was a crying outrage against "les règles d'escrime." Stalwart Englishmen stood by their friend, and, producing loaded pistols, threatened to shoot any who attempted to interfere. This system gradually produced a more wholesome state of feeling.

One night a party of English and Irish officers were at the little Théâtre de la Gaîté, where none French officers tried the usual devices to engage them in a quarrel. The Frenchmen had their swords, which they drew at once, with the alacrity of their country; unfortunately, the Anglo-Hibernian party had none. They, however, rapidly broke up all the chairs and tables at hand, and converting the fragments into useful weapons of offense, shivered every sword opposed to them, utterly routing their opponents. In the delicate situation in which the occupying army was placed, there was an inclination to make every allowance for wounded sensibilities; but it was found impossible to break the offensive behavior of the natives, and their studious insults. And the English authorities bore the temper of the nation so well, that none of the surviving offenders were visited with severe punishment.

STOMACH BITTERS.

NOTICE.—HOSTETTER'S BITTERS.—SEA-SICKNESS CURED.—Let us whisper in the ear of all who go down to the sea in ships, that HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS positively, immediately and infallibly cure nausea at sea. Brandy has been tried within, plasters have been tried without.—Thousand anodynes have been recommended for this most depressing and overwhelming malady on the pleasures of a sea voyage. They have all failed—entirely failed. But the proprietor of Hostetter's Bitters will stake their reputation on the efficacy of the preparation as a means of calming and strengthening the nauseated stomach during the stormiest voyage. It is certain to act in one of two ways; it may either stay the first distressing attack at once, and prevent the ejection of food, or it may ensure a discharge of the contents of the stomach, to be followed almost instantly by an entire relief from sea-sickness, and a renewed relish for the good things of life. Then it will effect a permanent cure. Either of these ways is as certain as that morn will follow midnight.

No landsman, above all, no lady, should go to sea without a supply of HOSTETTER'S BITTERS—the purest tonic and the most powerful preventive extant.

Sold by all druggists and family grocers.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can have, are placed in sealed envelopes, well sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and have the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificate, paying postage, and doing the business. In some cases, which must be indicated when the Certificate is sent for, Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those setting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents can sell either 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

Brandreth's Pills.

While Brandreth's Pills are so potent for good to diseased bodies, they are harmless as bread. The babe at the breast, or the man of ripest years and delicate females, can safely receive a curious of health from the use of these Pills, blessed of Heaven.

It has been said by an able physician, that "this medicine operates on the liver and kidneys." Wherein is its superlative quality. The Brandreth Pills have do power or action but upon impure humors in the blood. They carry off the bad matter in the blood around the parts affected by disease; all the parts involved in diseased actions are operated upon, and cleansed from all foulness, and relieved with "Life" and health. Wonderful curative powers contained and inherent of the most justly famed BRANDRETH'S PILLS.

Millions of people whose lives appeared to be at the last ebb, were cut by fever's consuming fires, by consumption's insidious advances, by racking torments of inflammatory rheumatism, have been cured by the use of these pills. The persons are living witnesses, and thousands are residents in every city of America. Principal Office, No. 294 Canal Street, and No. 4 Union Square.

HUBBARD BRO'S
MANUFACTURERS OF WATCHES
NEW YORK.

Are the sole consignees in the United States for that unique novelty the

Railway Timekeepers,

WITH HEAVY STERLING SILVER CASES,

ESPECIALLY ADAPTED FOR ARMY SALES.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper of Feb. 14, 1863, says: "HUBBARD'S TIMEKEEPERS are becoming proverbial for their accuracy and reliability. They are particularly valuable for officers in the army and travelers."

The Army and Navy Gazette, of Philadelphia, in its Number of May 9, reviewing this watch, says: "We are pleased to see that the Superintendent of the Express Baco. are meeting the enormous sale that such extraordinary enterprise as theirs so richly merits. These watches are novelties produced by no other House, far exceeding other manufactures in point of accuracy and elegance. Fidelity and promptness to their patrons render the House a notable example to the trade in the country."

The RAILWAY TIMEKEEPER has HEAVY SOLID STERLING SILVER cases, beautiful white enamel dial, handsome gold hands, with superior regulated movement, and is sold at the low price of $20 each, or $40 per pair. Sent by express, C. O. D., or by mail, $1 65 additional for postage. Should retail readily at from $30 to $50 each. Not to be counted out less than six.

Magic Time Observers.

THE PERFECTION OF MECHANISM!

BEING A HUNTING OR OPEN FACE, ON LEVER'S OR GENTLEMAN'S WATCH COMBINED, WITH PATENT SELF-

REGULATING IMPROVEMENT.

The N. Y. Illustrated News, in its issue of Jan. 10th, 1863, page 54, editorially says: "We have here shown a most pleasing novelty, of which the HUBBARD BROS. are the sole agents, and the importers, it is called the MAGIC TIME OBSERVER, and is a Hunting and Open face Watch combined. One of the most important, convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepiece ever invented and reliable as ever offered. Being within it and connected with its machinery, its own winding mechanism, thereby keeping it constantly wound up. In cases of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outside being of silver and inside gold. It has the regulator rate setting lever movement, and is warranted an accurate timekeeper. The retail price, we understand, is of half that of gold. Simple Watches, in neat morocco boxes, for those preferring to buy at wholesale, $20. If sent by mail, $1 65 additional for postage.

TERMS, CASH IN ADVANCE!

☞ Correspondents in the army advise us of the detention of remittances by reporting our address. The collective proceeding arises from the envy of rustlers, whose avocation and disposition tempts them to open private letters to open our letters and obtain orders. By this ignominious proceeding they obtain information which may injure but the better swindle their customers! The very low prices we are enabled to offer our goods is thereby prevented, solely upon the defrauding projects of the sutlers, until that new method of doing business with the army exists. That this wholesale robbery will soon be brought to a close we have the utmost confidence, as the most successful of the measures of the army to be on their guard against the machinations of these sutlers, and we hope that it be no longer the case that our soldiers, who employ some friend in the city to call upon us and make purchases for them, are not to be subjected to the annoyance of opening an acquaintance living beyond the lines. We send watches to the army on receipt of cash only in all cases. We are at all times ready to wait upon customers, showing them the most polite attention. We invite inspection to our goods. Address

MAJOR-GENERAL GEORGE G. MEADE, THE NEW COMMANDER OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

MAJOR-GENERAL MEADE.

MAJOR-GENERAL GEORGE G. MEADE, the new commander of the Army of the Potomac, was born of American parents at Barcelona, Spain, in 1813, and is consequently forty-eight years of age. He entered West Point from Pennsylvania in 1831, and entered the Third Artillery in 1835. On 26th October, 1836, he resigned his commission and engaged in private pursuits. In 1842 he was appointed to the United States Topographical Engineers, and with that corps served in Mexico, winning several brevets for bravery and good conduct. At the close of the war he was a Captain.

When the rebellion broke out, and President Lincoln called for three hundred thousand volunteers, the Pennsylvania Reserve Corps was raised, and placed under the charge of Major-Gen. McCall, as division commander, and Generals Reynolds, Meade, and Ord, as brigade commanders. General Meade was then placed in charge of the Second Brigade of that division, and proceeded to cooperate in at Tconnallytown.

When the Army of the Potomac began to move upon Manassas during March, 1862, the division in which General Meade served was attached to the First Corps, now under General M'Dowell. With him they remained north of the Rappahannock until after the battle of Hanover Court-House, when they were added to the Army of the Potomac, occupying part of the right wing, with division headquarters in the vicinity of Mechanicsville.

On the 20th of June, 1862, he took part in the famous battle of Mechanicsville, where General Sumner's division made such a terrific dash upon General M'Clellan's right wing, and General M'Call, Reynolds, and Meade were taken prisoners. His noble conduct and bravery on this occasion were particularly noticed.

The next day he was engaged under General Fitz John Porter in the battle of Gaines's Mill, and was so distinguished that he was nominated for a brevet of Lieutenant-Colonel for distinguished services during that battle. He also took part in some of the subsequent engagements of the seven days' fight.

At the battle of New Market Cross Roads he was severely wounded, but, under skilful treatment, he recovered, and almost immediately returned to the army, where he took command of the division until the return of Generals M'Call and Reynolds from captivity in Richmond.

When the rebels invaded Maryland and Pennsylvania, after the defeat of General Pope's army, General Reynolds, who had commanded the division, was then ordered to organize the Pennsylvania militia, and General Meade was placed in command of the division of Pennsylvania reserves. He led these troops during the eventful battles of South Mountain and Antietam, and when, at the latter battle, General Hooker was wounded and had to leave the field, General Meade for a short time had charge of the Ninth Army Corps, formerly under General Reno.

After General Burnside had been placed in charge of the Army of the Potomac, General Reynolds, who formerly commanded the Pennsylvania reserves, after the retirement of General M'Call, was ordered to command the whole of the First Army Corps, and General Meade was therefore placed in command of the division of Pennsylvania reserves. At the battle of Fredericksburg, December 13, 1862, he greatly distinguished himself, and his division lost very heavily, the brigade commanders and several field officers being placed hors du combat during the attack on the rebel right. The severest loss of the division was 1624, being the greatest division loss during the whole of that disastrous fight.

On the 15th of December, 1862, two days after this eventful battle, he was ordered to command the Fifth Army Corps, formerly under General Fitz John Porter, and more recently under General Butterfield. To enable him properly to hold that position he was appointed by the President a Major-General of volunteers, and was regularly nominated to the United States Senate for confirmation January 1863.

During the advance upon Chancellorsville General Meade's corps formed part of the right wing of Hooker's army. The corps started on its march on the 26th day of April, 1863, and arrived at Kelly's Ford on the 28th. The next day it crossed the Rappahannock by that ford and the Rapidan by Ely's Ford. It then pushed on to Chancellorsville, where it arrived on the 30th and engaged the skirmishers of the rebels, taking their rifle-pits and temporary works.

During the fearful contests of the 2d, 3d, and 4th of May General Meade's corps participated in part in the same noble manner that had characterized the troops under his special command since the commencement of the war. It bore the brunt of battle, and in the end covered the retreat of the whole of Hooker's army.

A CHAPTER OF WALL STREET HISTORY.

IN the next generation old men in Wall Street will illustrate their precepts to their juniors by reference to the case of Harlem Railway stock in 1863. Many observant readers must have noticed the fluctuations of this lively stock during the past three months. Few of them, however, living out of the city, possess the knowledge that is requisite to understand the principle of these fluctuations. For their benefit, and likewise in order to afford some modern philosopher with an opportunity of "pointing a moral," it may be worth while to place on record the history of the Harlem imbroglio.

When, last winter, it became evident to all discerning observers that a combination of adventurers had bought up a majority of both branches of the Legislature, and that any Broadway Railroad Charter which those schemers might think fit to demand would be duly passed, and would probably be signed in due course by his complaisant Excellency Governor Seymour, a number of tax-payers, opposed to a railroad in Broadway, set their wits to work to ascertain if there were no method of defeating, or at least before the Legislature, but the Legislature itself.

One of them, some forcting lawyer, discovered an Act of the Legislature, passed in 1832, which, after reciting that the city had empowered the Harlem Railroad Company to run city cars "from the Park to Harlem Park," and that the Company had bound itself to use the privilege, conceded to the Company the exclusive right of running cars on all roads, lanes or streets, or avenues in which the City Council might deem it advisable to have such vehicles.

To understand this Act, it must be borne in mind that, when it was passed, city rail-cars were an experiment, and no one could tell whether the Harlem would not lose money by its large outlay for rails in the Fourth Avenue and Bowery. The additional privilege was given to the Harlem stockholders as a sort of bonus to induce them to make the experiment and to risk the outlay.

Twenty years had elapsed since the passage of this Act. The experiment had been hugely and lucrativeness of city rail-cars had been demonstrated. It was clear that if the Common Council could be got to declare that a city railroad was required in Broadway, the Harlem Company would be entitled, under the Act of 1832, to build it, and would enjoy the right to the exclusion of all rival claimants. Upon this foundation the opponents of the Albany scheme for a Broadway Railroad went to work.

The Common Council was consulted, and it was found, as expected, that members were willing to do any thing if "matters were made pleasant." Allusion was made to the passages in the Gospel which states that the laborer is worthy of his hire. If members were to labor they must have their hire.

In some respects all difficulties on this score were adjusted. A sum was mutually settled upon—shall we say $100,000, besides an interest of 6 per cent in Harlem stock? We don't pretend to know exactly.

Suddenly, at 4 P.M. on an unexpected day, both Boards of the Common Council were called together. The uninitiated had no idea why they met. People who were in the secret whispered that before they rose the Harlem Railroad Company would be entitled to lay rails in Broadway. But the event put them to shame. Both Boards adjourned without even alluding to a railroad in Broadway. Next day, however, it was whispered that the Harlem people had not "put up" the money, and the Aldermen and Councilmen were too wary to do business on credit.

Next day, at 1 P.M., the Council met again, and this time the Harlem Railroad Company had of an ordinance. But again an adjournment was carried; and this time, a little bird said that the friends of the Council required the money to be deposited with them as stakeholders. Another house keeper—whom the Harlem people would not trust—while the friends of the Harlem were ready to deposit with a friend of the City Hall publican, whom the Aldermen would not trust.

There was another brief session that day at 5 P.M., when the Council met for the sole purpose of making progress. Before nightfall, however, the Harlem operators became aware that delay was dangerous; that the Albany schemers were alarmed, and that injunctions had been applied for. Like wise men, they waived their scruples, and the little bird whispered that the money was "put up" by the friends of the gambling-house keeper. At 9 P.M. the Council met. The Sheriff and Deputy-Sheriff were on hand with injunctions against the Harlem people. Albany rogues, who saw their prey escaping them. They served some members, but not a quorum. They served the Clerk of the Aldermen, but that body, knowing that the money had been deposited with their chosen stake-holder, removed the official, and appointed a Clerk pro tem. The Deputy-Sheriff tried to force their way into the Council Board, but were unceremoniously ejected by the door-keeper, assisted by a chosen party of shoulder-hitters. And so, at forty minutes to nine at night, when the tax-payers and parties interested were in sweet unconsciousness, the ordinance was passed granting the Harlem Company the right to lay rails in Broadway, Fulton, and other streets.

It is presumed that the laborers, whether worthy or not, received their hire. Besides the cash in hand, which was fairly paid over by their stake-holder, they did well on their purchases of Harlem stock. On the evening on which the ordinance was passed the stock sold at 58; the next day it commanded 70; and it rose steadily from that point to 118.

So large profits overset the reason of the friends of the Common Council. In comparison with the thousands that made in a day or two, street-cleaning schemes, by which a few hundreds were filched, or the sale of votes at $100 a piece, seemed petty and contemptible. The City Fathers had touched the wands of Pactolus, and longed for another draught.

They were not long in doubt. If they could create, could they not also destroy? Could not he who had given likewise take away? As the Herald beautifully remarked, in justifying the transaction afterward from the point of view of an opponent of a Broadway Railroad, what would become of us if a legislative body could not repeal a measure passed in error, or under misapprehension? What, indeed!

Some friends of the Common Council waited upon Commodore Vanderbilt, and gravely informed him that the Council had a mistake had been made in granting the franchise to the Company of which he is President. They feared the grant would have to be repealed.

What the Commodore's reply was this chronicler is not prepared to state. He believes, however, that in the course of an unusually long and unusually warlike career, the Commodore has never once allowed himself or any concern under his control to be black-mailed. Under these circumstances, the Common Council delegates may possibly not have been met with a spirit of compromise or even Christian forbearance.

One thing they may have been told, and that was that, if they undertook any——roguseries, it might cost them all the money they had previously made by their connection with this affair.

But the City Hall jants, like many other men, are sanguine of temperament, but clear-sighted out of it. They reasoned that if the passage of the ordinance had put Harlem up from 58 to 118, they could put it down to ordinance to 58 down from par to 50. So, in a sweetly innocent way, they "sold Harlem short" all the way from 85—to which point the Commodore had let it drop—to 50.

Now there are 80,000 shares of Harlem. Of these 80,000 the Commodore is supposed to have held 10,000 at the contest commenced, and by his confidential friends, knowing the man, may have taken 15,000 more. In charming ignorance of these facts, the smart Aldermen sellers of the City Hall sold, for future delivery, at prices ranging from 85 to 72, some 50,000 shares more. A little arithmetician can figure the inevitable result. From 80,000 deduct 65,000, and the balance is 15,000. This was all the stock available for the Common Council deliveries of July next. In other words, those clever schemers, these shameless black-mailers, these wretched thieves, who had done so well by passing the ordinance, wanted to do still better by threatening to repeal it, had, in their blind avarice, contracted to deliver 35,000 shares of stock which they did not possibly get except from the very parties whom they were conspiring to rob.

But of this they knew nothing. On 25th, at 3 P.M., extraordinary meetings of the Common Council were held, and both boards went through the farce of repealing the grant to the Harlem Company.

Next morning the Commodore went to work. At an early hour his brokers had orders to take in the Harlem stock offered. It rose 75 this stock rose steadily, in the face of the ordinance of the Common Council, to 97. Next day it went to 105. At noon they had sold 100 shares on 25th at 72, found himself a loser on 37th of $17,500. Never did fierce March sun melt snow quicker than did the rise in Harlem dissipate the illusions of the City Hall jants. They lost thousands in an hour; each minute cost them hundreds.

With more white skin to those of a thief when he feels the handcuffs click on his wrists they went to the Commodore to beg for mercy. The Commodore was inexorably. He was not aware that he had any transactions with them. Having an unusually large balance at his banker's he had invested it in Harlem stock. He knew not who had sold the stock he had bought. If the gentlemen present were the sellers, he feared they had parted with valuable property at a low price. For his part he didn't see that he had had, or was likely to have, any dealings with them; and wished them a very good-morning.

Foiled, exasperated, and sickened, the rogues slunk back to White Hall to find that Harlem had gone up 2 per cent. more while they had been suing for mercy. Nor was loss of money their only sorrow. The public had come to the sentimental conclusion, and fairly reveled in delight at seeing knaves so beautifully caught. No member of the City Hall party could show himself in public without exciting a roar of laughter.

There is no saying how far things might have gone, and how much money the Ring might have lost, and it not occurred to some calm and shrewd observers that it was dangerous to provoke the Common Councilmen too far: that if they were "cleaned out" the result would inevitably be that they would replenish their purses, somehow or other, at the expense of the tax-payers. This suggestion was laid before the Commodore by a disinterested third party.

The victor was disposed to be clement.

"Let matters be placed in statu quo," said he; "and then I will see what I can do with the outstanding contracts."

Accordingly at 1 P.M., on 29th, the Aldermen met. The following is the official report of their action as printed in the Herald:

BOARD OF ALDERMEN.

This Board met at one o'clock P.M. yesterday, President Walsh in the chair.

At a former meeting of the Board a resolution was passed rescinding the grant made to the Harlem Railroad Company which permitted them to extend their line through Broadway.

Alderman Farley now moved to reconsider that action, and to refer the matter to the Committee on Railroads.

City Inspector Smith moved to amend that the Board was in favor of Alderman Farley's motion, and could give many reasons why the matter should be referred. They should act legally. The Board had passed a resolution stating the Company was in error. It is true they have not put down any rails, and that they were not liable for any damages; but the Harlem Company had commenced to lay the rails necessary; and the Common Council, having granted the right, should be very cautious before they insisted their agreement.

Alderman Hardy did not think that the Common Council could rescind their grant to the Company; they were bound by every feeling of good faith to maintain their grant, and for that reason he voted at the last meeting against the resolution to rescind it.

Alderman Smith asked if the grant was to be perpetual.

Alderman Hardy answered that it was perpetual, and the Board, if they had had any objection, should have considered the matter before they granted permission for the extension of the railroad. He believed that they could not violate their first action in the case.

The previous question was then accordingly recommitted, and the whole matter referred to the Committee on Railroads (i. e. has been left where it was).

So the Aldermen ate the leek. Reporters say they grinned in a ghastly manner over it. Their future conduct may possibly be more in keeping of a direct square back down, as, without the concurrence of the Aldermen, their action goes for nothing.

But every one understands that both branches of the Common Council deliberately attempted to black-mail the Harlem Railroad Company; that they were foiled, and sorely punished in purse and prestige; and that finally, to save themselves from utter ruin, they acknowledged themselves to be sneakers, and ate dirt in the face of the people.

After this let no man complain of the pede claudo of Justice.

THE LOUNGER.

THE NEW REBEL POLICY.

JEFFERSON DAVIS has evidently been persuaded to try a policy which he has often denounced. He has been constantly and bitterly assailed by a party among the rebels for persisting in a policy of defense instead of offense. At the time of his inauguration under an umbrella in Richmond he declared that the rebellion had been trying to defend too extensive a border, and that the truly wise course was a retirement from such outstretched lines.

That this policy was the best for the success of an insurrection like his is undoubtedly true. "Let us alone," is the cry of every people that rebels can utter, for it provokes the reply from foreign powers, "Why not?" and conciliates sympathy in advance. Besides, the purely-settled country such a policy concentrates strength, binds the population together, and inspires them with the consciousness that they are fighting upon their own soil for their own homes. To take the offensive and advance, is to risk their communications, to expose their rear, to unite their enemy, and to arouse an overwhelming population to fly to arms and to defend their soil by all the means at command. It is to take from themselves and give to the enemy the heroic inspiration that springs from actual invasion.

The party which favors this policy has at length prevailed. Nor is their success in procuring its adoption surprising. The astonishing failure, the partial success of the rebel armies in the field, the rebel cause itself has not prospered. The strength and the blockade; the passivity of Europe; the adaptation of trade to the loss of cotton; the acquiescence of the loyal States in the long war; their prosperity while it raged; the steady ripening of public sentiment in the matter of conscription and emancipation; the gradual development of military skill and invention; and the gradual but sure reduction of the area of the rebellion, have all been made to appear to the rebel chiefs that their only hope of prolonging the struggle lies in adopting a policy of offense. And they have adopted it. The offensive campaign all along the line from Portland to Pittsburg.

The movement is not to be deprecated by us. It is the surest test they could have applied to the loyalty of the land. It reveals the situation to us and to the world. It is the best way to find it for our veracity. It proves our patriotism. It strips off masks and exhibits realities. It says to us, "If you mean fight, fight." And who does not wish to know exactly where we stand? Who is not glad that now we shall see whether we mean what we say, and what doubtless we sincerely think we mean? If in effect the whole country with paralysis instead of indignant inspiration, we shall know that we are conquered. If it brings the whole loyal land to its feet, demanding that the Government of the United States shall summon every United States citizen to arms, and to see that he is drilled every week, it will do what we believe it will, and secure a unity such as we have not had, and a peace such as good men pray for.

THE LESSON OF THE HOUR.

THE invasion of Pennsylvania is mortifying. A march of the rebels upon Philadelphia would be disastrous. But it will not be without its advantages, if it teaches us that we can make war only in a warlike way. Every lesson that we have learned in this war we have learned by being taken by the throat; but we have learned them one after the other.

It will be so in this case. Looking at the matter plainly, as it stands to-day, there is obviously no reason why any column of trained rebel troops, twenty thousand strong, should not move directly upon Harrisburg and Philadelphia, or Baltimore. Certainly no man doubts that a cavalry troop of five hundred Texans, could ride into New York from the Pennsylvania line in the neighborhood of Elmira, make a sweep around as far as the Canada line, and escape by a different route. What would the chance companies of raw men hurried together to do to effect against a trained troop of desperadoes? What could the regiments of Pennsylvania militia, totally unused to military action, effect against one of Lee's veteran columns?

Thus, if the rebels burn Harrisburg before them words are printed, the alarm will be, not that the city is burned, but that it could be burned. In other words, that Pennsylvania has felt so little the need of a warlike basis of society during a civil war, that she has lain at the mercy of any daring guerrilla. From the stinging nettle let us pluck the flower. Let us understand that we can not cope with a military nation upon our own soil but by becoming ourselves a military nation. Every man should be a soldier; habituated to arms, regularly drilled; subject to sudden calls, and arranging his life with that chance always there. Then the approach of the rebel horde would make the border of every loyal State bristle with skilful soldiers.

But, if we are unwilling to do this, we are unwilling to carry on the war; and we shall learn that, to carry on the war by halves, is to be engaged in worse wars. For the present alternative is not war or peace. It is Civil War, in which, after a little effort, we are spared the ravage of our own homes, or a war in every State, county, and town—an open, bloody war of neighbors and kindred.

APATHY.

A few weeks ago we all said, "When Generals Wadsworth and Banks Port Hudson, the rebellion is mainly conquered." We do not say so to-day. In fact, when it appeared that the opening out of Virginia westward and Banks assaulted Port Hudson with a bloody repulse, and Vicksburg still defied, many saw them who were not with a" impatient despair, "Well, we can't do it!"

Can't do what? If you are fighting for your life what do you mean when you say that you can't do it? Simply that you can't help being murdered. So if we can not subdue the rebels it is because they can murder us, and do we think it worth while what that means? Dissension, separation, humiliation, privation, terrible rule, are each of them. It means war in every town of the land except in the victorious slave States. It means the overthrow of every principle of popular government, anarchy in every State; finally mastered by a military despotism and the establishment of the most intolerable system of social and political caste the annals of mankind.

If, in so solemn and perilous a crisis, men are apathetic, it is because they do not in the least conceive the consequences of apathy. It is because they think that the war ought to open upon any terms, forgetting that it can stop upon no other terms than such as make peace unproductive of all results for which it is desired.

RETALIATION.

It is amusing to remark the righteous indignation of Copperhead patriots at the excursions of Montgomery at the South, and their profound silence over the ravages of the rebel privateers upon our shipping. It is a fruit of the same devoted regard for the Union and the country which compels this kind of patriot to denounce and belie the conduct of the war against rebellion, and to omit all but the most summary reproof of rebellion itself. If the Government of the United States, by means of arms, seeks to weaken its enemy by depriving him of the services of his slaves, Copperhead patriotism explodes at the unconstitutionality, radicalism, fanaticism, and wickedness of the act. But if the rebels devote all their efforts to build fleets which our men may be conveniently slaughtered, or if they keep slaves working in the field to feed the men who are destroying the Government, or if they arm them to shoot us, Copperhead patriotism is dumb. It finds nothing unconstitutional, radical, or wicked in such a course. The rebels have been "irritated"—they feared that justice would not be done to them by black soldiers who "withdrawn;" therefore their fears should be allayed by receiving a solemn promise that they shall always govern the country as they please their wills, and without question or opposition.

Now the war which the rebels have compelled the people of this country to wage against them is like all wars, terrible. But they know and know that retaliation can not be carried beyond a certain end of war. They know, and the whole world knows, that when a company of rebels hang prisoners of any complexion, the friends of those prisoners are perfectly justified in hanging rebel prisoners in turn. When the rebels hang black soldiers the other day in the Southwest, the black soldiers instantly and properly retaliated by hanging rebel prisoners in the hands of the rebel lines. Copperhead Generals think fit to execute his threat and murder the captives in charge of our black regiments, no man in his senses doubts that, man for man, the captured rebel officers in our possession will be destroyed. And this will be in obedience to the first and most essential rule of warfare—that if the enemy wantonly destroy life or property, he must be restrained from continuing to do so in the only practicable way, by retaliation.

The rebels have now for two years devastated the defenseless private property of loyal citizens at sea, and they now complain, through the Copperhead journals of their friends, that their own protected private property is destroyed. The men who own and authorize and defend the depredations of pirates at sea protest with pious horror against what they call piracy on land. But if Jeff Davis authorizes Captain Semmes to burn Mr. Low's ship at sea, why should not the President of the United States authorize General Montgomery to burn Mr. Howell Cobb's house on land? Do we propose to make war without reprisals? Do we mean to allow an immunity of ravage? If there is it said that we ought to stop the pirates by our navy? That is doubtless a good thing to do, and we all hope it will be done. But we are to deal not only with pirates, but with piracy. Our cruizers, let us hope, will take care of the individual pirates, but the Government must take care of the spirit which fits out those ships; and that is most effectually done by retaliation. Retaliation is not always exactly the kind of blow that he strikes us. Nor is the moral guilt the same; for he strikes wantonly, and we to prevent his striking.

HOW OTHERS SEE US.

It is the misfortune of the Administration that it must be judged by acquiescence rather than by intelligence. We are all so anxious to subdue the rebels that we insist upon it as an overpowering force on every point at which they appear; that every pirate shall be at once swept from the sea; that a successful threatened blow is at once overwhelmingly reinforced; that every movement of the enemy shall be baffled, and every battle lost by him; that, in fine, no battle shall be won upon our side, no defeated encounter, and that at every moment the subjugation of the enemy shall seem to be imminent and decisive.

This is natural. We know our power, and we see it in all its forms. We know its resources promptly. We chafe at every moment's delay, and we hasten to ascribe to imbecility what may be more justly attributed to difficulty, view of expediency. And if may therefore comfort some impetuous soul to know that the rebels, who are so constantly praised for ability, for their sagacity, criticize their own authorities just as harshly as we criticize ours, and quite precisely the same qualities that we commend them. Thus in Pollard's rebel history of the first year of the war, in which the loss of the rebel iron-clad ram, the Monitor, and the battle of Shiloh, are claimed as "Confederate" victories, we find this kind of remark upon the rebel management:

"The authorities at Richmond appeared to hope for results without the legitimate means for acquiring them. In the hot-bed of their own vague and undefined sources; and to wait with dull expectation while the next fiscal year, or the next agency than the natural spirit and hardihood of men was necessary in the conduct of a war, in the nineteenth century, against the resources that given such unquestionable proofs as the North had of quick and abundant resource, mental activity, and pliability to events.

"Of the political measures adopted by the South in furtherance of the objects of the war, none deserve more just censure than the policy of a defensive war, adopted the best means for securing specific results.

"It was this precisely the manner in which we are accustomed to criticize the action of the Government, and to applaud the energy of the rebellion? It is impossible that a rebel victory should not seem blundering and imperfect to those who demand success, and that the unsuccessful rebel conduct of the war may be fairly censured in many ways. But it is at its utterly imbecile as our imputations often believed?

ADMIRAL FOOTE.

A coon man, a true soldier, a faithful citizen, an honored officer, is dead. The sad news reaches us as he is about going to a new sphere of duty, followed by the confidence and love of the people, by honor and by the most affectionate and grateful trust his virtues and his services, and sawall the nation's great and historical Foote was early distinguished in the war by his reduction of Fort Henry and the gallant management of the Western flotilla. To the vigor, the ingenuity, the success of his warlike operations gave him a hold upon the popular heart which was only confirmed and strengthened by the purity, gentleness, and love of his religious character. Neither a bigot, a fanatic, nor a zealot, he was—what many a religious bigot is not—a Christian gentleman. He retired disabled, and a sworn officer under the American flag, no officer and gentleman had, and who could wear more specious pretenses, confessed his conscience or betrayed his honor. His friends to-day, and history hereafter, will find no reproach upon the memory of him. They will not be obliged to contrast his heroism with his treachery, nor his religion with his infidelity. He was a brave, true, and honest and bravery and ability will be forever unalloyed.

Admiral Foote died at a moment of chagrin in the war. He died at a time when we can ill spare a tried and true leader. His name is added to the shining list of heroes who have died in the noblest service; cheerfully obedient, full of faith, believing in the cause, in the country, in his countrymen, steadily holding the flag of hope and humanity.

> And if come bear soon dark with doom,
> That sacred banner lifted higher,
> Shall flash away the gathering gloom,
> With inextinguishable fire.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A coroner paper, in recommending early rising and walking, says: "Morning interviews with Nature are delightful." So Bonaparte said a young lady, to whom pa kissed the fire to convince morning upon the window, or if Nature wants an interview she may come in and have it."

ELEMENTARY INSTRUCTION.—On a day of grand popular rejoicing, when the fountains, and the Bengal lights, rockets, and Roman candles, had been all brought into active requisition, a clever little boy, upon being asked which of the two elements he preferred most, he, "Oh, water, to be answered "water;" and this was the subtle reason he gave for it. "Because you can see the fire-works, but the water always plays." That boy, we are afraid, will never be Presidents.

Mulligrubs was asked the reason why, in certain countries, the king and queen were known as Queen of such a place, and not mere barrys before eighteen? "It is," answered Mulligrubs, "because it is more difficult to rule a wife than a kingdom."

A young lady, in a class studying Physiology, made answer to the question, that in six years a man's body became entirely changed, so that not a particle which was at it at the commencement of the period would remain at the close of it. "Then, Mrs L——," said the young tutor, "in six years my wife must be to Miss Lucy." "Why, yes, Sir, I suppose so," said she, very modestly, looking at her book.

Madame R——, who is still a coquette in her quite advanced maturity, went recently to a private evening party. After observing for some time the pale face of a young man sold the mistress of the house to her, rapturously. "I am quite astonished at the beautiful paleness I see, you must be in very slow; she takes more than an hour and a half to dry her face." "Pardon me, madame," said one of his friends, "you are not obliged to stay at home while she is drying it."

"There is a pleasurable sensation," said that great philanthropist, Dr. Snuffitupp, "in hearing the person who has done you a service say, 'Don't mention it, sir!' especially, who overheard the charitable observation, 'Indeed, my dear, you should mention it to the proper party.' It seems to insure the obligation we owe the recal curmudgeon."

A Cockney sportsman being out one day amusing himself with shooting at sparrows, brought a boy down on the other side of which was a man, standing or bending; the sportsman, fearing the latter had been injured, but not missed the bird. "Did you fire at me, Sir?" he bawled out. "No, Sir," said the shrewd sportsman; "I never hit what I fire at."

In the days of the volunteers Mr. Kor commanded a company, which he mustered and paraded on the [illegible] remarks were a particularly awkward squad.—Lively, Sir!" shouted Mr. Kor as he was passing the line, the command "Quick!" he cried one day, holding up his hands in horror as he looked down the line, "why, you're all slow, slow! Just come out, lads, and look at it yourselves."

"Pay me that six-and-eightpence you owe me, Mr. Mulligrubby," said a friend, the other day, to whom he owed it. "Faith, I never had any opinion of you in all my days!"

Why are photographers the most unfeeling of all tradespeople?—Because when we make application for a copy of our portrait they always say with a negative.

An Irish gentleman having a small picture-gallery, one rural person wished to see it at the same time. "Faith, gentlemen," said he, "I'll only go in it will not hold more."

If there is "many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip," with drinking out of the answer is more freedom from such "slips of discourse."

"The impulses of the nonmark," as the sodn-water said to the rum when they were mixed in the cup.

"I can't reconcile differences," said Septimus Hardup. "For instance, there is nothing more regular in its coming round than dinner-time, and nothing less certain than dinner."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE INVASION OF THE NORTH.

In our last number we mentioned that rebel cavalry had made their appearance in Maryland and Pennsylvania. They have since been followed by infantry and artillery, and a large portion of the whole of Lee's army must be on Northern soil. General Ewell, leading the advance, occupied Chambersburg on the 23d, Shippensburg on 24th, and thence moved Northward—his picketz reaching Carlisle barracks, opposite Harrisburg, on 28th. General Knipe fell back from Carlisle on 25th to Kingston, and thence to the Susquehanna at Wrightsville. Meanwhile another rebel force of all arms occupied Gettysburg on 26th. On 27th General Longstreet's army crossed the Potomac at Williamsport; and on the following day General Hill's corps crossed at Shepherdstown and Harpersville. On 28th a rebel force took possession of York and Hanbaugh's Gap, and encamped on the Susquehanna. On the same day Colonel Frick—in command at Wrightsville, opposite Columbia, on the Susquehanna—burned the railroads with the rebel advance, but was driven across the river with his force. On 29th and 30th it retook and burned the bridge, which cost over $1,000,000. In occupying York the rebel General demanded the contribution of a quarter of million dollars on the town in money and provisions under penalty of the destruction. On the morning of 30th the rebels appeared to occupy the whole west bank of the Susquehanna, from Wrightsville to the vicinity of Peach Bottom Ferry—from a short distance north of Harrisburg to the Maryland line. The rebel object was evidently heading to the Susquehanna from Southern Pennsylvania and Maryland, and destroying the bridges over the Potomac and the Northern Central Railroad. Our militia from Northern Pennsylvania, and New York troops, were mustering on the Susquehanna River and at Baltimore. The Army of the Potomac was moving Northward, and by the new contraband line of march. Two new commanders were appointed—Hooker removed, and Meade—and been largely reinforced from the garrisons of Pennsylvania and Maryland. Under Meade, and the militia in Pennsylvania are in the rear and on the flank of the rebel line, and in the rear of the enemy. On the afternoon of 30th the rebel advance fell back, and General Lee appeared to be concentrating his forces. York was evacuated, and so was the country around it. Harrisburg, encouraged by the Gettysburg victory, moved forward. Gettysburgh was occupied by our cavalry, and the rebels were on that day reported as being forced in the neighborhood of Shippensburg, unless they had already effected a junction with the rebels.

GENERAL HOOKER'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

GENERAL ORDER—NO. 66.

HEAD-QUARTERS, ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, FREDERICK, MD., June 28, 1863.

In conformity with the order of the War Department, dated June 27, 1863, I relinquish the command of the Army of the Potomac. It is transferred to Major-General George G. Meade, a brave and accomplished officer, who has nobly earned the confidence of the country and the army on many well-fought fields. Impressed with the belief that my usefulness as the commander of this army has been greatly impaired, I part from it, yet not without the deepest emotion. The circumstances which led to the formation of the battles is relieved by the conviction that the courage and devotion of this army will never cease but fully, that it will yield to my successor, as it has to me, a willing and hearty support. With the earnest prayer that the triumph of its arms may bring success worthy of it and the nation, I bid it farewell.

JOSEPH HOOKER,
Major-General.

S. P. BARNUM, Acting Adjutant-General.

GENERAL MEADE ASSUMES COMMAND.

This order was followed by the subjoined address from General Meade:

GENERAL ORDER—NO. 68.

HEAD-QUARTERS, ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, FREDERICK, June 28, 1863.

By direction of the President of the United States, I hereby assume command of the Army of the Potomac.

I shall offer, in obeying the order, an order totally unexpected and unlooked for, but coming to me at a time when the country looks to this army to relieve it from the devastation and misery inseparable from invasion. Whatever partialities or preferences we may be called upon to entertained towards the late commander, the magnitude of the interests involved must each man determine to do his duty, leaving to an all-merciful Providence the results.

To the Army of the Potomac I have confidence that I relieve in the command of this army an experienced commander and troops who have nearly exhausted confidence in the history of its achievements; but I rely upon the hearty support of my companions in arms to unite me in the discharge of the duties of the important trust which has been confided to me.

GEORGE G. MEADE,
Major-General Commanding.

S. P. BARNUM, Assistant Adjutant-General.

GENERAL ROSECRANS IN MOTION.

The news from Tennessee indicates the opening of a campaign by General Rosecrans. On the 24th and 25th, General Reynolds' division, his whole force moved on 26th. On the 27th, Wednesday, the 24th and 25th corps, with Stanley's cavalry, General M'Cook's column had Brick shire, with a rebel force of 15,000 men, in front of Manchester, which was driven from Wartrace. A eighteen miles south of Murfreesboro no enemy had been encountered, and it was believed he was at Tullahoma, where Rosecrans was moving to attack him.

THE SIEGE OF PORT HUDSON.

Advices from Port Hudson to the 30th had been received by the Department to the effect that on the 14th ult. having established their batteries within fourteen hundred yards of the rebel works at Port Hudson, after a vigorous cannonading, Generals Grover and Weitzel made assaults on his rebels on assault was made, and our forces gained the ditch, but were driven by a hundred feet from the works, which they held. General Paine was severely wounded. General Dwight was also injured and taken prisoner. Our loss in the assault was severe, and our repulse undoubted.

THE SIEGE OF VICKSBURG.

The latest news from Vicksburg, by way of Cairo, is to the 26th. The rebels were shelling the city from the rear, from the army and the gun-boats. At the close of the 25th General Grant was within a mile and a half of occupied the ground. Otherwise the siege was progressing favorably. The rebels surrounded in Vicksburg continuous wreps in mystery. He had gone beyond the Big Black, and was moving on the rear of Vicksburg. All the rifles and streams were rising.

THE RIOT IN PHILADELPHIA.

The greatest alarm and activity prevails in Philadelphia. The Mayor and General Dana have issued stirring proclamations, appealing to the citizens to preserve the public peace.

The coal-dealers held a meeting, and resolved to close their yards on the 30th, in order to prevent the riots of the miners to volunteer. The merchants have resolved to close their stores at 3 P.M. All the militia are to be released the men employed in them forwarded for the defence of Harrisburg. Ten days' pay is to be given to their employment are to be paid their usual salary during the time of service.

The Board of Brokers raised $25,000, to be divided among the men who went to the front. A meeting of the Republican was also adopted to adjourn at 5 o'clock every afternoon. The Democratic committee have left it to the clergymen offered their services to the Mayor to labor on the faithful discharge.

A line of fortifications around the city was commenced on 30th ult.

A UNION RAID TO THE SOUTH ANNA.

From the White House, on the Pamunky River, we learn that a force of Colonel Kilpatrick's cavalry, with the South Anna, the capture of the rebel General Fitz Hugh Lee, a rebel colonel, a lieutenant-colonel, and about two hundred other prisoners. Lee was captured at the house of a friend, to which he was carried severely injured, wound received at Kelly's Ford. A skirmish occurred at Hanover Court House, a troop of rebel cavalry and some sworn. A rebel beggage train on the way to Richmond, and of prisoners. Lee was captured at Ashland, 16 miles over a thousand soldiers. The railroad bridge at White House was burned, and their railroad destroyed for a considerable extent.

UNION RAID IN EAST TENNESSEE.

The expedition recently sent into East Tennessee reports officially to General Burnside, through Colonel Sanders, commanding the cavalry. The expedition left Knoxville, destroyed the road up to Knoxville, and made a descent through Jacksboro and Big Creek Gap, and on the north from above Jacksboro the railroad works, and destroyed the railroad bridge over the Clinch River bridge, three hundred and twenty feet long; also the Big Creek gap bridge, three hundred and twenty-five feet long. They also captured three pieces of artillery, some small arms, a number of artillery equipments, and destroyed prisoners and one thousand stand of arms, and destroyed a large amount of rebel stores, including ammunition, and one saltpetre work and other stores. He found no rebel force in East Tennessee larger than he had supposed.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

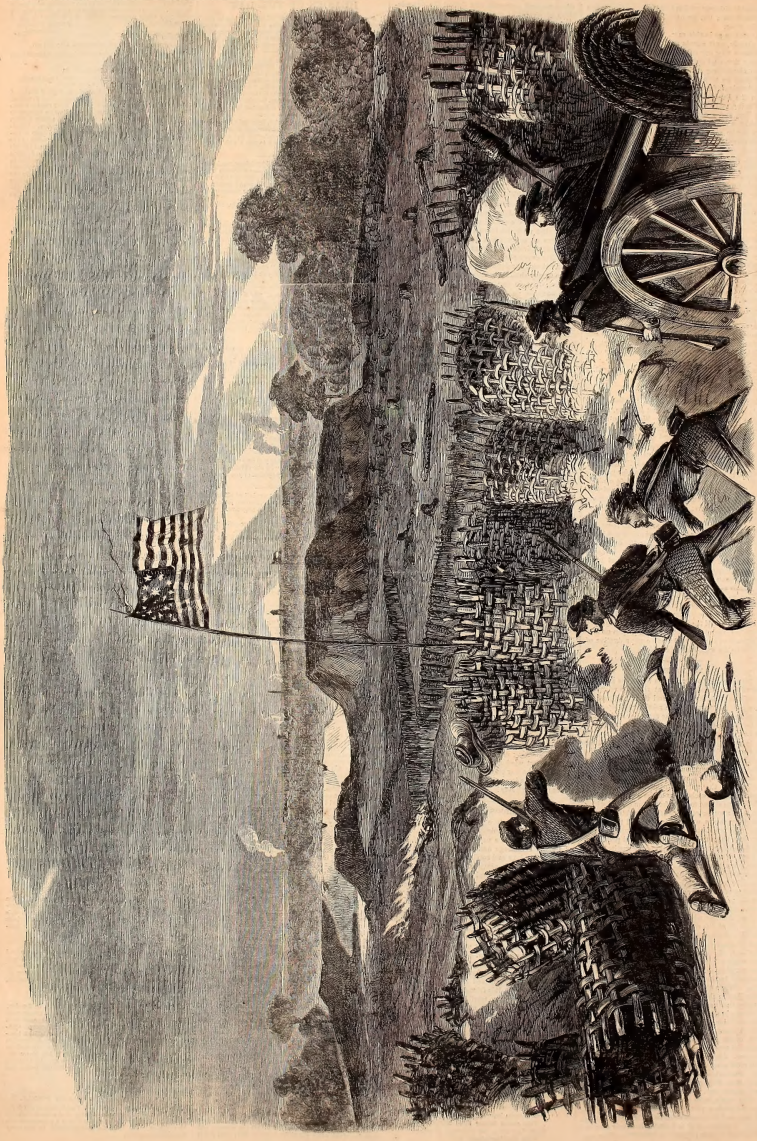
EARL RUSSELL ON THE BLOCK. &c.

EARL RUSSELL, Foreign Secretary of Lord ——, that the blockade maintained by the American fleet was sufficiently effective to justify the seizure of British ships. He said that there was every desire on the part of the American Government to avoid any cause of difference with Great Britain.

APPEAL OF PRO-SLAVERY PARSONS.

A large number of clergymen in the rebel States had joined to an appeal to England, invoking her aid to put down the war. They declare that the separation of the Union is impossible. The London Herald, organ of the Rebel Government, is purchased by the rebels, attributes great importance to the paper.

FRANCE.



MANNY AND EMPEROR.

An American Abolitionist named Conway, in London, attempted to present an address to the Emperor of Mr. Mason, the rebel commissioner, on the ground of a promise of audience given to Mason by the Emperor. It is way said that if this pledge were given the Abolition leaders in the United States would be "the immediate cause of the war," and cause it to cease by the "immediate liberation of every kind of supplies." Mr. Mason did not commit himself or his cause in any way. He inquired for Conway's credentials from the Abolitionist party, and he failed to produce them.

FRANCE.

REJOICING OVER THE FALL OF PUEBLA.

The official report of the fall of Puebla was received by Napoleon. He forwarded a letter of thanks to General Forey, and ordered the Minister of War to communicate it by conquest. The order for reinforcements for the army was countermanded.

A WOMAN'S CHOICE.

LYDIA, standin at the small mirror in her small room, decorat herself in a speculative way with sprays of a scarlet wild-flower, heard her mother calling;

"Lydy! Lydy!"

All the dreams vanished at this sound, and the soft, fair look in her eyes, which accompanied the dreams, vanished with them.

"Lydy! Lydy!" and the second call was slightly more impatient. Even the scarlet sprays from hair and breast. One vivid flower, clinging tenaciously to its lovely neighborhood, was pulled with nervous fingers from an obstinate mare of curls, bringing with it as it fell two or three yellow hairs for company.

And still

"Lydy! Lydy!"

"Lydy! I wish my name was any thing but Lydia. How I hate Lydy!" and, flinging out the last flower, Lydia sprang down the stairs in answer to her summons.

"Where have you been, Lydy? I've called you three times"—in a reproachful tone; added, frig.

"Here, I want you to sprinkle the clothes, and then go down to Miss Larkin's, and get my new net. Now don't, Lydy; you know Hannah always makes a fuss when you throw so much water on. I don't see you want to do it, and I wouldn't have asked you if I hadn't been all least out."

And Mrs. Nelson looked still more injured and unreasonable, as she dandled, while she ran a little crooking rocking-chair by the window, and fanning herself with a branch of palm that Captain Nelson had brought from over sea.

Lydia felt her mother's eye upon her, ready for comment and admonition. This last, as moments made her fold the long linen sheets more deftly, or administer from her slender brown fingers the nicest measurement of water. She was hard to smooth out her brow, too, to part with all her dreams, and seem as willing to do her mother's best as she really wanted to feel, indeed, any virtuist observation. There was such a pile of clothes too, and the kitchen was so sunny and warm, and it was almost six o'clock, and at six o'clock—

And here at this point of speculation she blushed, ran a long line of color down her cheek as waiting for a rose, and as she shook him away went humming over her head of the cool sweet meadows, and the fields, and the flowers, where the bunny was a-hoeing, and one lane in particular, where a wild honeysuckle went running over the wall, and a wild red rose had climbed over. Lydia sighed at this tale of the bee a little low "Ah me!" and, in her preoccupation, dipped a sweep of water dashed from her hand upon one of her brother's shirts, and then she was brought to a sense of her misdoing by her mother's voice again.

"Oh, Lydy! Lydy! why can't you be more careful?"

"Oh dear!" ejaculated Lydia; and, in a moment more,

"Why don't you get one of those patent sprinklers, mother? Mrs. Fish has one; and they are so nice."

Mrs. Nelson looked disgusted.

"Patent sprinkler a good deal!" she retorted. "I don't need my patent sprinklers for my work. Them'll do for lazy folks;" and she jerked her cap a little farther on, and fanned herself energetically with the great leaf of palm. Lydia's suggestion was not a happy one, and silence again fell upon the two, which was presently broken by a voice, hearty and heavy, just outside the window, while the owner of the voice leaned his arms upon the window-sill.

"Wa'al, Lydy, you seem to be hard at it. Good-afternoon, Miss Nelson. Lydy's goin' to be as smart as you 'fore long, I see."

"Lydy's a little work very well," answered Mrs. Nelson, resignedly. "Wants me to get her a patent sprinkler for sprinkling clothes, Cap'n."

"Patent sprinkler, hey!" with a low laugh; "one, Miss Nelson; says it beats all."

Mrs. Nelson knitted and set the corners of Lydia's brown eyes a merry gleam sparkled and danced.

The jolly old sailor caught it, and went on landing the clothes-sprinkler in a manner that would have made his good name stare in amazement; but Mrs. Nelson was not going to stand by and be beaten on her own ground; so she suddenly sent the captain on a more interesting track by asking if the Barcelona had been spoken.

No wonder that this proved a matter of profounder interest to every other; for the good ship Barcelona contained the very pride of his heart, the darling of his old age, young Tom Hale his only son. Tom Hale followed instinctively the two elders now, of and concerning the sea, in which lay so much of the interest of their lives, and while they talked Lydia went on with her dreams.

And by-and-by the last garment was folded away in the basket, and Lydia took her way, with a pail hat, another of her father's foreign treasures, and one which, like the Spanish earrings she wore, came under the mother's disapproval as much too fanciful and fine. It was a pretty hat though, and it shaded a face which was beautiful indeed not its chief loveliness. A face that stopped much more in the earnest, thoughtful eyes and the clear broad brow than the arch lips had ever expressed, or the young heart had ever known.

She was along through the woods, crossed the meadow, and came out by honeysuckle lane; and here she walked demurely and soberly enough, as if she had no interest whatever in that vicinity; but her eyes, those bright brown eyes, as eager as a bird's, kept up incessant but covert watch. At length one swift glance, and they took straight ahead; her watch is over.

He has vaulted a wall and is hurrying to overtake her.

At last:

"Lydia, Lydia, come and look at these roses."

At this she turns, a little quick start.

"Why, Ben, how you frightened me! Where did you come from?"

Ben is a handsome fellow, tall, and straight, and brisk-shouldered, with an imperious way about him that is so taking with young girls, when the possessor is tall and handsome.

As you look at him, as you hear him talk, taking it for granted that Lydia wants red roses in her hat, because he wants them there, that she had rather go round by the old mill, because he declares it the pleasantest, and a hundred other small and large matters that Lydia has no heels, you can readily see what an instinct it was for Lydia to use all her artifices.

"I say, Lydia!" he suddenly exclaimed, as he was sticking the red roses in her hat, "did you know that the Barcelona is in, and Tommy Hale here for the summer?"

"No! oh how glad Cap'n Hale will be! Mother was just asking them about it; and he didn't know that she was in yet. Let us go back and carry him the news."

"Nonsense, he'll be gone by the time we get back; why, it's half a mile or more."

"But if we miss now we may never miss him."

"And that will make a mile and three quarters for your walk. Come, the Cap'n will find it out soon enough without our going on such a runaway."

Lydia hesitated a moment, then her color came over a shade with her eyes. She turned slowly, saying:

"I shall go back."

The young man stood a moment hesitating too. She had gone on a dozen steps when he joined her with an "I'm coming."

"You needn't have come back with me," said Lydia, with a flash of spirit.

"Oh, I know; but I couldn't well stay away, you know, Lydia."

The glance that accompanied these words meant a very thing. The girl's blush roses deepened to a color that matched the wild red cave on her hat, and she was more silent. She had much to say, nothing more? When he spoke again, however, it was not at all in this strain, and there was a shade in his tolerance.

"What a good-natured little goose you are, Lydia!

That's all; and he was idly stripping the bark from a willow branch, as he spoke, and immediately followed the low humming of a tune first essayed a few minutes before. Then he let it was a foreign air, and the words were in a foreign tongue.

Lydia, lifted a moment, looked him as he stood there at her side, full of conscious strength and power.

How handsome he was, and how manly! How much he knew of the world; and, after all, she rather liked his cool autocratical way.

A few papers and book thoughts were broken in upon by:

"Wa'al, Lydy, you've been spry; I guess your ma ain't a-scolding you to-day, is she?"

Then Lydia, fluttering and brimming over with her secret, and, laughing and blushing, aglow with the pleasure she was to confer, exclaimed,

"Oh, Cap'n Hale! I know something that you don't; guess what it is, now."

"Wa'al I guess you know a good deal that I don't, my lass," returned the Captain, regarding her admiringly.

"Oh, but this is something I have only just heard—something I came back to tell you."

"Wa'al, what is it?"

"Yes it is, the Barcelona's got in, and Tom is here. Ben told me."

"Well, I'm no like she'd fetch up till to-morrer. Did you see her, Ben?"

"Yes, I saw her with my glass an hour ago, and just now I saw her putting in for shore."

They were all three walking on in one direction, as this news delivered, and Lydia's face was a rich colour when she landed. And presently the Captain broke out with, "I declare I'm much obleeged to ye, Lydy, for bringing the news, though I'm a-felt dreffil cut up to 'a missed the landing o' the Barcelona."

And the old man cast a look of gratitude on Lydia. And Lydia thought, "If I had known it an hour ago Mrs. Nelson's clothes should have to tell you." She next thought, she was making excuses for handsome Ben Thatcher. Ben never was a little cool, and sometimes a little rude, but so full of other interests.

At last the gratitude is fast at her moorings, and those on board of her come hurrying off. And there is Tom Hale; Captain Tom, who is so glad and proud of his son, Captain Tom, who looks down gayly, and Lydia sees that his father's eyes are blinded with tears. How glad she is for him; but why is that fleeting Captain Tom? A dark, slender stranger, unlike any one she has ever seen. Not handsome like Ben Thatcher, but slight and brown, a full lip that shows white, a pale cheek.

No, not handsome like Ben Thatcher, thought Lydia; but as he came on shore, not hastily like the others, but with a slow serenity of movement and expression, Lydia thought him like one of those soft-eyed Spanish cavaliers who wander, stately and silent, through the stately arches of the old scenery, and she felt herself drawn to him, a little interested, just as she might be about any of the new strange things that had come to her through ever from the strange countries it had touched.

Then she shook hands with Captain Tom, and said, as she say, "How kind you are, Lydia, whom I want you to know. Mr. Mayne, Miss Nelson."

Lydia was the least in the world disappointed that the name was a common English one. She had been expecting to hear some soft southern intonations to match the soft southern air. But home again through the woods and the meadows, dusky with twilight, by the side of handsome Ben Thatcher, whom twilight had changed from a lordly and somewhat voluble youth into a gracious and fascinating companion, she forgot all about the stranger, and thought, as she held down upon her pillow that night, that Ben Thatcher was a splendid hero.

But when she fell asleep she dreamed of the Alhambra, and went wandering beneath its lofty arches with a dark-eyed cavalier, who spoke to her in slow, soft Spanish speech. Then she was standing upon the shore at home waiting for a ship to come in. And she saw it sailing toward her, a Spanish galleon with the royal colors streaming from the mast, and on the deck the soft dark eyes, waving his plumed hat to her, while "—— bands of noble gentlemen"

bore him company.

And from this dream she was awakened by her mother's voice, calling, "Lydy! Lydy!" She sprang up with Lydia's name for eyes, and said,

"And his name is only 'Mr. Mayne.'

At breakfast her mother informed her that Cap'n Hale's 'a had been asked to invite them all to a party at the Hale's, to meet Tom.

Lydia in her soft, fine muslin, with some of her mother's choicest geranium blooms in her hair and on her breast—deep scarlet flowers—was one of the earliest visitors to leave that day; for it was an early summer party, where they strolled in the wood at the back of the house and fed sumptuously on fruit. Among the fruits and dishes. And there her acquaintance began with Mr. Mayne. She stood with Tom Hale and Ben Thatcher picking strawberries and eating with her fingers from the dish she held. Grace Burnham, and Jenny Norris, and a Carrie Lester, were the rest of the group, with their musical names admitting of no such twisting as poor Lydia's. And while she was thinking just that somebody called "Lydy! Lydy!"

She laughed, yet shook her shoulders in vexation.

"Why did they give me that hateful name of all names!" she exclaimed. "I detest it!"

"Lydia, Lydia, do you think that an ugly name?"

She looked up. It was Mr. Mayne who spoke. The rest did not hear; they went on talking their gay, noisy talk, unheeding this voice.

"Lydia, Lydia," he went on, repeating it over for the sound. "I like it."

Lydia, listening to it, was repeating, liked it too. What made him say it so differently from every body else? But she found that he did all things differently from others. She had never seen any one resembling him. He was so quiet, so unassuming, with a thoughtful air about him, even when he stood with the gay nonsense of Grace Burnham. Even when he, in that low, deep-toned voice of his, talked to Tom Hale. And there was a far look in his eyes, too, as if he was half thinking of something else—something beyond that scene, something far away, that responded to some of his interior thoughts. Lydia wondered, as she regarded him, if those distant glances comprehended the people around him. If they saw Grace Burnham or Jenny Norris, as his soft eyes dwelt vaguely upon them. But while she wondered she was not sure. Once. He saw her at least; and was he reading her soul with that intent look?

Before the week was over Ben Thatcher knew that he had a rival. He did not despise him, though all Tom Hale could say about him was that he "stood him at arm's length as an agent, he believed, for a wealthy sugar-planter; but any way the best fellow in the world—a perfect gentleman; and being fond of books, he had a splendid passage in his yawl."

Ben Thatcher was young, was self-occupied; but he knew enough of the world to know the value of a gentleman Mr. Mayne was. Therefore he did not despise his rival. As proof of which all the rest of the season he found himself more devoted—the winning of Lydia Nelson. No difficult task, it would seem, from the preference she had shown; but Lydia was a coquette even in the beginning as she appeared. Another suitor, too, upon the scene—for no one knew quicker than Lydia that Ben Thatcher was her suitor—brought her eyes from a timid wider diversion.

But Ben Thatcher urged his suit more vigorously as the conquest looked more doubtful. He had one powerfully.

Mrs. Nelson, keenly observant of the state of things, gave "Lydy" a piece of her mind occasionally.

"How Lydy could think of looking at that little black jingon of a man, when Ben Thatcher was any where round, was more than she could understand. There was Ben Thatcher, a match for any girl. Why he was twice as handsome as that foreign Mayne was, when you knew how to find him. These foreigners were always uncertain; never knew whether you had a roof to cover you or not; and as for all Thatcher's'll, he'd choose from if the big house on the hill gave out."

And so Mrs. Nelson; her wish for Lydia's marriage with Ben Thatcher, the big house on the hill, which at Squire Thatcher's death would descend to Ben; so she kept her eyes on the main chance, and confidently held the dazzling picture before her daughter.

Ben was much the holder wooer of the two. Perhaps, like Mrs. Nelson, he did not depend altogether upon his personal advantages, for the "worth of the man" was in some way perpetually in the fore-ground. I will not say that Lydia was dazzled by this. She would have declared herself profoundly indifferent to mere money; but the power that it gave handsome Ben, the position it put him in, was a thing that could not escape a young king! Then it was flattering to be chosen by Squire Thatcher's son, independent of this; for the Thatcher family was immemorial and held the first place in Lowbridge.

Why did not Louis Mayne come forward and urge his claims more zealously, at least more persistently? Why, perhaps he thought that nature needed no helping. Perhaps he trusted all to her —and lost.

It was one night in the last of September that the die was cast. They were down to the beach, four of them—Tom Hale and his friend, Ben and Lydia. There was a vessel lying close inshore for repairs—the Barcelona—and some one of them suggested that they should take one of the ship's boats and go out for a sail. The suggestion was acted upon, the boat unlashed, the sails spread; but for some reason it was not easy to bring her round to shore, so the only way was to descend from the ship's side. Lydia gayly declared herself fully equal to the emergency; and so she was, being reared by the sea, and a sailor's daughter. But the night was coming on, and the waves not so readily, and the little swinging ladder missed her foot. She swayed for a moment; and in that moment Ben was across the vessel and held her clinging hand, and she was falling, when, swift and light as a panther, some one caught her—a firm but gentle hold—a lighter grasping; and she was placed in the boat. With eager demonstration Ben Thatcher followed.

"Lydia, Lydia, you have hurt yourself!"

For the reaction of a minute she turned her eyes to him with a look that held not his answer. Louis Mayne. But was the night too dark, or did he fail to interpret that seeking glance? In that instant of time

(to be continued next week.)

And young Thatcher, easy, gay, confident, was bending over Lydia, and expressing all tender concern and care; and Lydia—she had turned to him in a quick, sudden movement, and for a second her head sank to his shoulder . . . Louis Mayne went down to the other end of the boat, and left them together. But in that moment, at that time, for a sure indication, a preference clearly expressed, she loved Ben Thatcher better than she loved him, for she trusted him instinctively. She would Lydia that she had made a profound mistake, and one went forward, and, as Lydia believed, because it was his nature to approach every thing easily and confidently, without particular reverence, and that the other lingered behind with a modesty, his tender deference of women, specially of one whom he held above others, made him slow to intrude upon the privacy of interest, at least enough to be, to approach her nearly; if you had told Lydia this then, she would have denied and changed in any thing that she had said. The question she would have chosen the other side? But as one told Lydia this, and even her mother hinted it in the vaguest manner. And when she turned, half sick from pain, and some faint shadow of disappointment, to the one who was not, but cold, to one who waited with eager demonstration, she was half unaware. There was a little excitement about her which Lydia never wanted. And so for Louis Mayne.

(to be continued next week.)

And that night, after the sail, after the walk with Lydia to her home, Ben Thatcher went triumphantly on his way a successful lover. And the night after that a great happiness came to Lydia —her father came safely in from sea.

Louis Mayne, for when he saw the father, wondered no longer why the daughter was so fine of nature, nor where she got her gentle mien. In spite of all that she had believed in the daughter, but now he believed in Lydia with a thrill of rejoicing for her future.

Captain Nelson might have been placed in the narrowest precincts of poverty, or thrown into dens of infamy, and it still kept that instinct of the gentleman. One looking at him, this captain of a merchant vessel, might have wondered at his place there; and still more as they saw his helpmate. There came sometimes faint old rumors of family ties and birthplace, and worldly defect in the days gone by. And, fainter still, a vague story of a dreary disappointment to a young man in the heyday of life.

It was a week, perhaps, after his return, that he was walking with Lydia down by the beaches. And they walked as he talked with her under her engagement. Though he had given his consent to handsome Ben Thatcher's proposal, he was not so blind with the prospect as Mrs. Nelson of the first match in the country round for Lydia.

"You're going to be married soon, Lydia?" he asked, half smiling, but looking into Lydia's face with serious eyes.

Lydia's head and her bright smile seemed to satisfy him more than her assuring words.

Lydia said she believed she had always been in love with Ben since she was a little girl; but didn't her father feel satisfied with him?

He further answered her:

"I am glad to have my Lydia happy, but young Mr. Thatcher is not the kind of man whom I can appreciate with my head."

A cloud came over Lydia's face. Her father's quick glance saw it, and he added, in a reassuring way:

"But he is young yet, Lydia, and life will teach him a great deal." Then, after a little silence, he spoke again in a musing tone: "Lydia, I wonder you were not pleased with this Mr. Mayne. He's a fine fellow. I like him."

"Mother didn't. She said she was always suspicious of foreigners," answered Lydia.

"Foreigners!" exclaimed Captain Nelson in surprise. "What put that into your heads, child? Louis Mayne a foreigner!"

Then Lydia remembered that this was only a supposition grown into a certainty by want of contradiction.

"Yes, I know he came on with Hale from Jamaica, but that proves nothing——an agent for a sugar plantation did you say? Well, I should be right."

There crept into Lydia's mind from this a spark of jealousy for her betrothed. She was half angry with Louis Mayne for presuming any contrast unfavorable to Ben Thatcher.

And so she fanned this spark into quite a flame, and in constant view of her handsome lover, and the object of all his flattering attentions, which to her inexperienced mind were still more fascinating, perhaps from the rather lordly way he took possession of her as he paid them, she got to taking something the same ground her mother had, and with a secret irritation that she would think of comparing her splendid generous Ben with that dark and silent stranger, whom nobody knew any thing about, and who never expressed any interest in any body or any thing. She had forgotten that she had ever been, however, slightly attracted to this dark and silent stranger.

By November there were brisk preparations going on at Mrs. Nelson's for the marriage which was to take place the coming spring. And Mrs. Nelson's expectations were more than realized by the splendid new house that was rapidly being built on Thatcher Hill. But for this the house at home would have been ready to Lydia's taste, and she had gone away again, and her brother Loring was at school. And who else went with her father? Who but Louis Hale, who, when he said "good-by," bent over her hand and kissed it, saying:

"I hope you may be happy, Lydia."

And Lydia, in spite of herself, thought of the Spanish cavalier.

And Lydia was happy. Now and then a little shock of pain would thrill her as her young lover evinced some thoughtless trait of selfishness; but she pushed it out of her mind by some capricious reasoning, and remembered that her mother always said that men, specially young men, were more or less selfish. So she solaced herself. But the end of all this drew near. It was getting to be the last of winter. March was approaching, and in April they were to be married.

"Another April and you shall be in Rome, and I will show you my old quarters there, where Mrs. Prompton and I were abroad, Lydia. Not in there now, and you must know each other; you'll like Ned, and Ned will like you. You will see a tumble, this yellow hair, Lydia, and want to paint you. And you shall go to Paris, Lydia. The Carey are there with the child of a family misfortune they wanted me to marry; and you shall outshine her, little girl. I should have thought you would have had this figure and complexion, and then they'll see if Ben Thatcher's country wife isn't more than a match for them" — and he said this the young man best and kissed the lovely face.

But Lydia was very silent. This kind of valuation and appreciation jarred upon her. As her lover kissed her cheek, with his confident air of possession, she vaguely remembered that a man was left upon her hand a few months before; the touch, tender, reverent, and unasking.

This was at the close of a fine March day, so fine that they set out soon after to walk to the post-office a mile away.

"Only one letter!" exclaimed Lydia, holding out her hand for the letter the postman took from the box.

"Only one," and the postman turned briskly to another applicant.

But this one Lydia little imagined what influence it was to have upon her life. What change and trial it was to bring her. She had just glanced at the post-mark — Cuba. It was from Cuba, and then. The handwriting escaped her attention.

At home taking it out the strange chirography startled her. As the expression of Lydia's face by Thatcher, standing near, came round and looked over her shoulder. His face changed too, but from different causes than hers.

"Fayal, and not from your father; I wonder—"

But Lydia had broken the seal, and was glancing down the page for the signature. A flush of color suffused her cheek into deep crimson, and she returned quickly to the commencement. With absorbed attention she read on to the end, then, in an abstracted way, thrust it back into the envelope without a word, and, without a word, handed it to Thatcher to hand her it. He had been accustomed to reading Captain Nelson's letters; any letters of Lydia's. What was this? Her face evinced that was not to read this. His color rose, and there was more than anger in his eye as she said to him:

"Not this, Ben: it is a business matter between father and me. He could not have expressed himself, so he got a friend to write for him."

Her hesitation was unfortunate. The color rose higher on her lover's cheek, and his eye grew better at his heart. There was suspicion too in his mind.

"If he was this friend?" he asks, haughtily.

Now Lydia had plenty of softness; she had also plenty of pride on occasion generally, but she lacked itself now. Some proud sense of her own right, as an individual and a lady, made her resent this demand. That only apply then, was utter scorn. The most exasperating of all to an angry man. He beat forward.

"Lydia," he said, in a low tone of suppressed passion, "it has been the custom between us to read or show to each other our letters. You are my betrothed wife, and I think I may say that I have the right to know what this sudden secrecy means."

Lydia backed up.

"Ben, I have told you that it means a matter of business between my father and myself. I have no right to divulge what belongs to another."

"Yes, and you will not divulge the writer's names: that, too, is a secret, I suppose. Do you think I can not guess? Do you think I do not know that it is that soft-spoken hypocrite, Louis Mayne?"

Lydia was fell, and a deeper color possessed her face. This brought conviction and confirmation of suspicion. Ben Thatcher was furious. Obeying a mad impulse he came toward her and laid a violent grasp upon the letter she was still holding.

A little cry broke from her of amazement and indignation; then her supple fingers slipped from his, and the light missive lay upon the burning coals of the hearth.

"So that is the way, is it?" he said, in a hoarse tone, and his look was full of hard, angry determination. "That is your way; that is what I am to expect from my wife. I wish you joy, Lydia Nelson, of your correspondent."

He bowed to her with sardonic passion, and the next moment she was alone.

For a little while her indignation sustained her; then stole into her loving tender heart a gentler tide of emotion. She had been to blame as well as Ben. If she had been more open in her explanation—if she had said at once, "this letter is written by Louis Mayne for my father, because he is unable to write himself, to give me some business messages and directions which he did not wish given to any body else," she was sure it would all have been right. But she had been embarrassed, had hesitated, and finally got angry herself.

No wonder that all looked strange to Ben. Well, he would come round by the next day and then she would explain to him. Yet all the next day she found excuse for not leaving her she was trying to hide the painful fact that he had been ungenerous and ungentlemanly. He did not come round the next day. He was carrying it very far, she thought. Yes, he was carrying it farther than she imagined. By night-fall of the next day they had new fun.

She was sitting by the parlor fire, waiting and wondering, when a step sounded outside. She recognized with a weight of relief his step, and then a wide the door. But the weight settled down again heavier than ever as she looked. It was the father instead of the son. And he was misfortune sent old Squire Thatcher out in that inclement weather, for the skies overhead was shutting down over the hills, with driving sleet and snow? He saw her glance of disappointment, and said:

"No, Ben, Lydia, is ill." Then he had taken her hand, had drawn her into the parlor, and shut the door carefully between themselves and all others.

"Lydia, there's been a quarrel between you and Ben; and—and he's acted mean, but he's a noble child. He's gone off with Jack Bingley in his yacht to the West Indies."

All this after Ben's cheeks.

"But—but—he will come back—he will—" and Lydia stopped her ideas in a vague sense of confusion.

"No, my child, he will not come back. He means revenge by this. The Thatcher devil is riding him now, and he will be relentless, though. He will not come back till long after the appointed wedding-day, Lydia."

She had grown pale, but the look of helpless pain, of wounded womanhood that she lifted to her father pierced him to the heart. Lydia could not have been counted a very soft man; there had always been said to be more of iron than any more plant mixed with his composition; but now, as he stood there, his face was expressive with feeling.

"I wish my father was only with me," faltered Lydia at length, as her tears began to flow.

The old Squire bent down and took her to his breast.

"My little girl," he said, gently, "I can never be to you, even as a friend, what Loring Nelson can be, but I will be as much as he was here, and but I will be to you what I can. Can you tell me about it, Lydia—this quarrel?"

She told him about it, sobbing, taking more blame than she need. But her listener was a clear-sighted man. He saw the truth.

"So, so; it is as I thought," he mused aloud.

Then to her:

"Lydia, as I told you, the Thatcher devil was riding him. You do not know what that means, child; but it is a devil, a cursed devil of selfish pride that has been handed down in the race, like the curse of our family; but I did hope it had spent its force in my own generation. Lydia, my girl, your father knew well what he was about, and he feared us. He was not over-pleased with your choice, child."

She wondered vaguely, in the half-stunned state in which she was, how he knew that. He seemed to read her thought, and, with his head bent, and with melancholy remembrance, while he went on lower of tone:

"Lydia, years ago your father was to have married my sister. In some mad passion of jealousy—for less cause than this between you and Ben—she broke with him. Afterward she never uttered his name with obloquy; and—we were living then in New Orleans—in her relentless frenzy, she involved me in a duel with him. I killed him. It was the Thatcher blood; at some time or other, Lydia, it has risen and will, not unfrequently, to the surface in Ben, and dared for you, but noble soul, he would not meddle with two lives but injustice to himself. He has gone out two hands for good, ing—two hands that cling to his, and she can not and left me to my fate. Lydia, my child, I would have come to you alone, reading your heart and the fatal letter, which was so brief and clear that no word was lost, neither the form of address, nor the close, and have said to you, 'Wait for me, I will remember that I send always my best wishes.'

"And waiting for her father to come, April came, and she was ready for the day of her wedding-day. It rose out of a dark and stormy night, a dark and stormy day, and it was April.

"A hard storm this for vessels on our coast," said old Captain Hale, as he dropped in at Mrs. Newton's on his way past.

Lydia gave a sigh of thankfulness. It was not yet time to expect her father.

"A ugly night for a ship." And the old sailor shook his head at the wild bowling nor'-easter.

"Why, I guess I'll go down to the Hudson Fire and take a look through Meacham's glass."

"Stop a minute, please, Cap'n Hale, and I'll go with you."

"Lydy Nelson, you'll ketch your death," admonished her mother.

"Oh, let the lass go, Miss Nelson. I guess she's been out in as bad weather's this."

Lydia was grateful for this word in her favor, grateful too for the sympathy she knew it proceeded from. The weather-beaten old mariner, as he used to say afterward, knew she was pining on that day. Yes, it was a dreary day to Lydia. She was glad to get away from the lonesome house, full of associations of pain.

"She always would have her own way," remarked Mrs. Nelson, nodding to the Captain as they set out.

"It can't make her out, Meacham, she pitches and rolls as if she was but a tight craft, and it's a good skipper she has to hold on so."

"Yes, my eyes are better'n yours, Cap'n; I'll take a look. Yes, she's gained a little—steady, my hearties: there—there—so, there comes that cursed breaker, I guess!"

Captain Hale came nearer. Meacham bent down and whispered in a low, awe-struck whisper. The old sailor's face glared with something like defiance as he heard,

"I tell you it can't be—she ain't expected for week's end."

But he nevertheless seized the glass from Meacham's hand, and, after steadying a little apart waiting for a chance to look again, wondered why Captain Hale was so long—wondered why he said nothing. And all the time the storm was growing fiercer, and she was thanking Heaven in her heart that it was not time for the Macedonian—her father's vessel. The moments went by, and still the Captain held his place, silent, motionless.

"Can't you let me look, please," asked the soft voice of Lydia.

"It's no use, my girl—it's no use," muttered the Captain, hoarsely.

"But my eyes are better than either yours or Mr. Meacham's, Cap'n."

At this order he broke through the sullen roar of the wind, boom! boom! went a great gun.

"Not a boat could live on this sea," said Meacham.

"Can't our boats they're arter; they know that well enough. Why, you remember, Cap'n, when one o' them little sailing crafts from the banks that'll weather any thing. If they can only hold out till she gets a little nearer, they'll shy with it another breaker don't swallow 'em."

An anxious silence fell upon the three there. Before that Captain Hale's Lydia could see nothing to the beach at that signal of distress. And again, boom! boom! went a great gun.

"Lord ha' mercy!" groaned Captain Hale, turning with a white face from his position. Lydia was just behind him, but he did not see her till she stooped forward. He sprung to her side.

"Don't, don't—take—take—'tain't no use;" and he put his broad palm over the other end of the glass.

"What is it, Captain Hale, what is it you don't want me to see?"

And Lydia's face was perplexed and scared.

"'Tain't no use, 'tain't no use," the old sailor kept muttering. "I'll go and get to know somehow, Cap'n," said Meacham, in an undertone.

Lydia heard all this, and in a strange, bewildered way began to look through the glass.

As Meachum had spoken the Captain's hand had slipped for a second, and she saw—a ship breaking to pieces far out upon the rocks there, and upon the shattered bows were the letters, MACEDONIA.

For a moment a silence like death, then such a cry from Meacham, that white lips as those who listened never cared to remember. A cry that seemed to sweep all the raving of the tempest in its sharp despair as,

——a great ship fell in light
Beat her heart out on the rocks.

She sat by the window sewing; a fragile-looking creature, with a flush on the thin cheeks, and the sad lips but faintly tinged. She who a year ago was full of the warm hues of health and youth. A year ago. It seemed so long, so very long since that time. Then she knew grief and loss only by name, now it sat beside her—a constant companion. Yes, a constant companion since that day of storm when the Macedonia and all on board of her went down. Lydia, watching there she glances up at the shadow that is falling on the path. It is the shadow of some one approaching the house. There is a knock—another step—she rises, and instinctively it stands face to face with—Louis Mayne. Louis Mayne, her father's friend. Her eyes brighten at this thought, they rise out two hands for greeting,—two hands that cling to his, and she can not speak for tears. He does not misunderstand.

"I have come, Lydia. I wrote as soon as I heard; and Lydia, my poor child, I should have come on, but—but I thought you had a better comforter. I did not know of—until—"

She shivered.

"No, no no better than you, Louis; my father loved you. Tom Hale has told me what you were to him."

He sat down beside her, and for the first time since her bitter loss she knew what it was to have perfect calm and sympathy, as she talked and listened.

He told her of her father's restless presentiment of ill, which prompted him to send written directions these messages and directions for her use. How the presentiment grew until it ended in that fatal voyage.

"I must go home; something calls me," he had said.

"And he went home—to God," said Lydia, softly.

A few days sped on, and with her father's friend Lydia found a companionship so kind and untiring, so fine and congenial that rest and peace seemed to shine for her once more.

Her father's friend. She did not know how much more until one day he spoke of going away —going back to Jamaica.

"Going away," she repeated, absently, "I never thought of that;" and the look she cast upon him gave his heart a wild thrill. What if?—

"Lydia," what he said may never be written. It was the story of his love from the first.

And Lydia? Lydia loved him. You shall see how well.

Touching at Cuba Jack Bingley staid for a few days, then, obeying the restless will of his companion, sailed out into the Gulf, and, cruising in the Atlantic, finally landed at Havre, from thence to Paris, where were the Careys with their doll of a daughter whom they wished him to marry.

It was here, while trying to kill time and ease his hungry heart by amusing himself with Juliet Carey, that he heard of that fearful tragedy of the Macedonia. It was long after—an old story when it reached him, but it changed all the hard current of his thought, vainly had he tried to forget Lydia. He could not. Love is not to be killed by scorn and suffering. He seized the opportunity which this seemed to afford him for reconciliation, and without a word of farewell to the Careys started for home.

Arrived there, he heard news that beat back for a moment his own love-trial. To lose Lydia after all? No, she had loved him, she would love him yet. This was the first claim. This was the way he argued in his mind.

Lydia knew nothing of what awaited her, knew nothing of his return, until one night at sunset she was coming home from Captain Hale's, quite alone, and a tall figure suddenly appeared before her. She did not exclaim, but stood regarding him with a half-terrified expression, which he misunderstood. All the trouble of her life seemed to date from him. And there he was—the man she had loved, who suckles clambered in the lane that had once been their favorite tryst, he plead his cause. Passionate pleading, and tender vehemence and eager will.

"Give him up, Lydia. You loved me first. I have the first claim upon your heart. I know I behaved like a fool, Lydia; but I was mad with jealousy. It was because I loved you, Lydia. Oh, Lydia, you can not make me better. I shall be a ruined man without you."

So he went on, now melting into tearful tenderness of love, now resentful with remorse, now intense with eager passion.

Through it all she said no word; but her eyes were full of tears, and a pitying love for the man woo upon her face.

It was her young lover, him whom she had known since early boyhood—whom she had admired, long before she had loved him, as the ideal of her youth. It was Lydia's heart that was pled with by these words, and with the first breathless earnestness for what she only could give, that her heart was troubled. Then came the thought of the shame of him—of his remorse and suffering, and hardly knew how faintly she denied him, as she begged him to leave her then.

But for him, there was confident hope upon his brave as he spoke and kissed the cold, pale cheek. And as he obeyed the letter of her words by leaving her there, he left in triumph to claim her again. She should see that he would not be unpersevere in the smallest requirement now. There were his thoughts. As he turned the bend of the road she leaned wearily against the wall. It was then a voice called, in a low tone,

"Lydia."

That low, clear call she remembered when she first heard its intonations. It had a sound like her father's voice in it—strange she had never heard it before!

"Lydia," the voice went on, "I have been an involuntary listener to all that has passed. I was waiting for you under the oak behind the wall here when I heard him talking. My poor child, how your life is ruined. But this is not what I want to say. It is this, Lydia: If the old love is so strange—if you find it has come back to you in coming—do not let any thing you have said to me fetter your free choice. Be happy, Lydia!—that is better than to die."

He waited for her to speak, but she only stood there with downcast eyes, breathing a little unequally. He thought she looked more pale and give him pain, so again he called her name in even a lower tone than before, as if he would reassure her.

"Lydia!"

Had she ever thought that name an unlovely one? It sounded sweeter than any now.

"Lydia!"

As she raised her eyes she realized that, through much sorrow and pain, she had found reconciliation at last. It was the voice she had waited for all her life—the voice of her dreams. He was the truest gentleman, the best friend of her youth, and that one went down to death in the Macedonia.

"Lydia!"

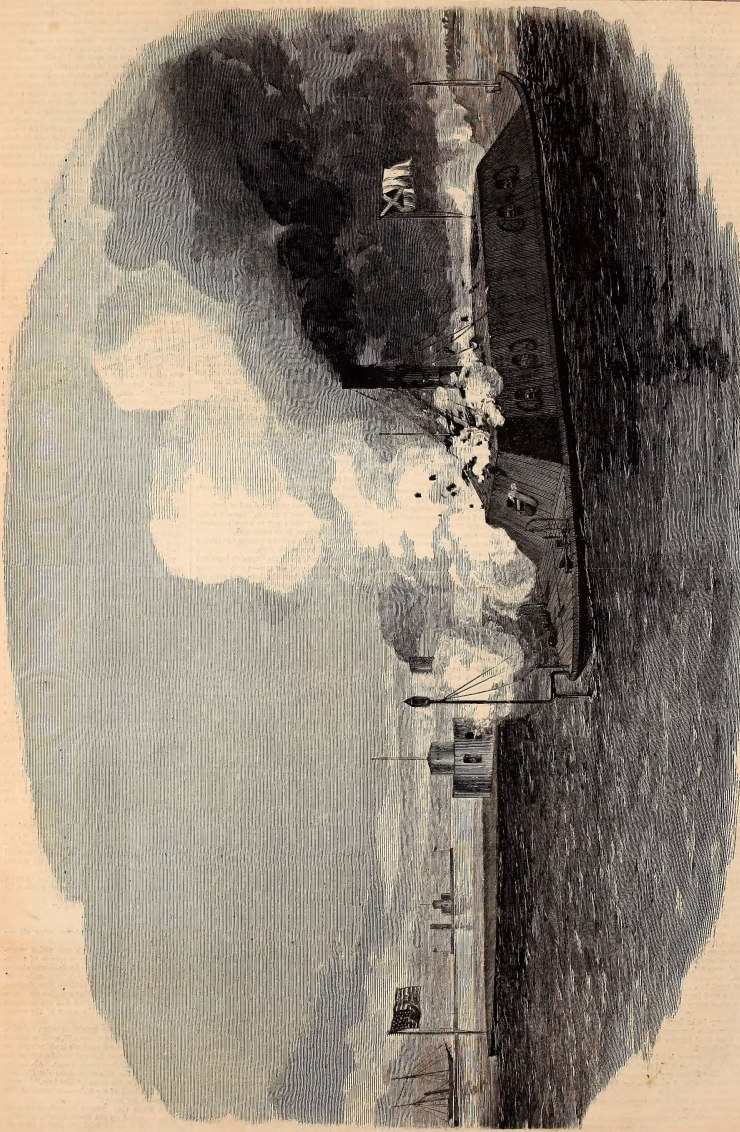
What was it he saw in her face that changed the pain which quivered over his own to a flash of joy? What was it that she expressed by that silent gesture of her slender hand that made him cease all question—that made him exclaim, in his softest, deepest tones, "Lydia, my love!"

As he went home with her through the "purples and the saffrons" of the sweet October weather, he thought continually of that line:

"As I love, loved am I."

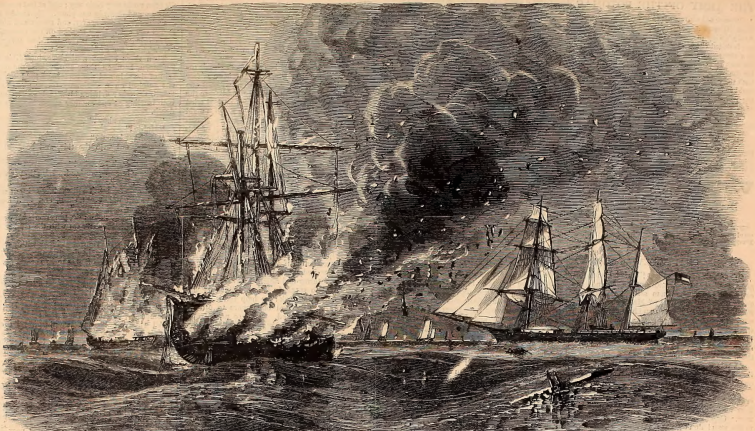
So Lydia made her choice.

"And you're not a foreigner, after all we thought."



"You thought I was both that and a sugar-planter's agent, Mrs. Nelson—a species of undisciplined slave-driver" — and Louis Mayne's laugh was mellow as the old Canary in the glass he held.

"I am not a foreigner, if birth on New England soil and a New England father can give me American nativity; but my mother was the daughter of a Spanish lady, and the sister of the sugar-planter, Mrs. Nelson."



Lydia thought of the Spanish cavalier, and Mrs. Nelson looked at him suspiciously still, until he added:

"The only claim my mother's land has upon me is the charm of association and an old estate on the Guadalquivir. This is much, I own. Ah, Lydia, you shall see the Alhambra some day!" And Lydia thrilled at the name. "But here," he went on, "in the land of my father—in beautiful, free America—is my home!"

And while they roamed beneath those wide arches, or sailed up the Guadalquivir, a selfish, reckless man in an imperial city rushed down the stream of pleasure.

CAPTURE OF THE REBEL IRON-CLAD "ATLANTA" BY THE MONITOR "WEEHAWKEN," CAPTAIN ROGERS.—FROM A SKETCH BY D. J. S.—[SEE PAGE 442.]

THE PIRATE "TACONY" BURNING MERCHANT VESSELS AND FISHING CRAFT.

THE PIRATES OFF NEW ENGLAND.

WE publish herewith a picture of the rebel privateer Tacony burning a merchant vessel, and preparing to make a foray among fishing craft; and likewise an illustration of the explosion of the revenue cutter Caleb Cushing near Portland. The story of these pirates may thus be briefly told:

Lieutenant Reed, who commanded the Tacony, left Mobile in the Florida on 16th January last. From that time up to May 6th the Florida burned eleven vessels and bonded three. On 6th May she captured the brig Clarence, which was converted into a pirate, and Lieutenant Reed was put on board of her. She burned three vessels; then captured the Tacony, to which craft Reed transferred his men and guns, and burned the Clarence. The Tacony fairly ravaged our coast, burning ships, barks, and fishing craft alike. On 24th June, fearing that the Tacony would be recognized and captured, Lieutenant Reed transferred his crew to the schooner Archer, which he had captured. In this vessel he boldly ran into the harbor of Portland in the night, and, with two boats' crews, boarded and cut out the revenue cutter Caleb Cushing. When daylight broke, and the people of Portland discovered the absence of the cutter, they quickly manned two steamers and gave chase. Coming up with her about twelve miles from Portland, fire was opened; but the steamers evincing an intention to board her at once, Reed took to the boats, fired the cutter, and blew her up. The boats were picked up by the steamers, and the pirates safely lodged in Port Preble, where they will have time for repentance.

THE REVENUE CUTTER "CALEB CUSHING" BLOWN UP BY REED AND THE OTHER PIRATES WHO HAD SEIZED HER.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

On page 445 we reproduce a sketch by Mr. A. R. Waud, illustrating the BATTLE NEAR UPPERVILLE, Ashby's Gap in the distance. The square inclosure is called the vineyard; on the right on the rise is a stone-wall; against this a charge was made, the men returning to form again a little to the left. On the extreme left five rebel regiments came out with their large flags to charge our men before they could form; the Sixth and Sixty-first were sweeping round the hill, charged upon them while the band played Hail Columbia.

Captain Tidball and two of his guns are in the fore-ground.

CHAPTER XVII.

"Or deck for your lives!" cried Dodd, forgetting in the awful moment to say not the captain; and drove them all up, Robarts included, and caught hold of Mrs. Beresford and Freddy at the cabin door and hurried them with him. Just as they got on deck the third wave, a high one, struck the ship and heeled her boldly up, caught her round, and dashed her down again some yards to leeward, throwing them down on the hard and smooth deck.

At this tremendous shock the ship seemed a live thing shrieking and wailing, as well as quivering under the blow.

But one voice dissented loudly from the general dismay. "All right, men," cried Dodd, firm and undaunted. "She is bound to come on. Captain Robarts, look alive, Sir! Speak to the men! don't go to sleep!"

Robarts was in a lethargy of fear. At this appeal he started into a fury of ephemeral courage: "Stick to the ship," he yelled: "there is no danger if you stick to the ship," and with this snatched a life-buoy, and hurled himself into the sea.

Dodd caught up the trumpet that fell from his hand, and roared, "I command this ship. Officers come to me! Men to your quarters! Come, bear a hand here, and fire a gun! That will show us where we are, and let the Frenchmen know."

The carronade was fired, and its momentary flash revealed to the ship we were now in a little bay; the sand bream was low and some eighty yards off; but there was something black and ragged near the ship's stern.

Their situation was awful. To windward lurked the reef on which the tremendous waves came rolling, fringed with devouring fire; and each wave, as it charged them, curled up in an incredible height and dashed down on the dismal ship—solid to crush, liquid to drown—with a ponderous stroke that made the poor souls stagger; and not a sheet of water so clean over her that part fell to leeward, and only part came down on deck, foretaste of a watery death; and each of these awful blows drove the groaning, trembling vessel farther on the sand, bumping her along as if she had been but a cockle-shell.

Now it was men showed their inner selves.

Seeing Death so near on one hand, and a chance of escape on the other, some persons proved unable to resist the two great passions of Fear and Hope on a scale so gigantic, and side by side: these were a midshipman, and five sailors, stole the only available boat and lowered her.

She was swamped in a moment.

Many of the crew got to the rum, and stupefied themselves to their destruction.

Others rallied round their old captain, and recovered their native courage at the brave and hopeful bearing he wore over a heart full of anguish. He stood like a horse, encouraging, commanding, doing; he loaded a carronade with 1 lb. of powder, and a coil of rope, with an iron bar stuck in a cable, and fired it to the rope and bar ashore.

A gun now fired from the guard-house, whose light Robarts had taken for a ship. But, no light being shown any nearer on the coast, and the ship sounded every minute as she go in pieces, Dodd asked if any one would try to swim ashore with a line, made fast to a hawser on board.

A sailor offered to go if any other man would risk his life to save him. Instantly Fallalove stripped, and Vespasian neck.

"Two is enough on such a desperate errand," said Dodd, with a groan.

But now emulation was up, and neither Brisson, Yankee, nor negro, would give way: a line was made fast to the sailor's waist and he was lowered to leeward; his venturesome rivals followed. Fallalove was swallowed whose three like crumbs: and small was the hope of life for them.

The three heroes, being first-rate swimmers and divers, and going with the tide, soon neared the shore on the ship's lee quarter; but a sight of it was enough: to attempt to land on that rock, with such a sea on, was to get their skulls smashed like egg-shells in a moment. They had to coast it, looking out for a soft place.

They found one; and tried to land; but so irresistible was the suction of the retiring wave, that, whenever they got foot on the sand and tried to run, they were wrenched out to sea again, and pounded black and blue; and were less by the curling breaker they met coming in.

After a score of vain efforts, the negro, throwing himself on his back, went in with a high wave, and, on touching the sand, turned, dug all his ten claws into it, clenched his teeth, and scrambled like a cat at a wall: having more power in his toes than the Europeans, and luckily getting one hand on a firm stone, his prodigious strength just enabled him to stick fast while the wave went back; and then, seizing the moment, he tore himself ashore, but bleeding and bruised all over, and with his hands nearly broken by clenching in the convulsive struggle.

He found some natives dancing about in violent agitation with a rope, but afraid to go in and help him; and no wonder, not being sequlls. By the light of their lanterns he saw Fallalove washing in as like a log. He seized one end of the rope, dashed in and grappled his friend, and dragged him ashore all together, both breathless, and Fallalove speechless.

The negro looked round for the sailor, but could not see him. Soon, however, there was a cry from some more natives about fifty yards off, and lanterns held up; away he dashed with the rope, just in time to see Jack make a last gallant attempt to land. It ended in his being flung up like a straw into the air on the very crest of a wave fifteen feet high, and out to sea with his arms uplifted, and a shriek of agony which was echoed by every woman within hearing.

In dashed Vespasian with the rope, and gripped the drowning sailor's hair, and with his teeth: then jerked the rope, and they were both pulled ashore with infinite difficulty. The good-natured Frenchmen and women all threw their shivats and brandy and pats on the back: and carried the three heroes to a flag-staff on the rocks nearer the stern of the ship.

The ship began to show the first signs of breaking up: hammered to death by the sea, she discharged the oakum from her opening seams, and her decks began to show rents and fore and aft. Corpses of drunken sailors drowned between decks now floated up amidships, and washed and rolled about there, with the movement. These, seeing no hope, went about making up all quietness and decency for the rites of a Christian end. One or two came to Dodd with their hands out.

"Avast, my hibbers!" said he, angrily; "do you think I have time for nonsense? Folkses shop! axes, and cut away the weather shrouds!"

It was done: the foremast fell to the beach directly, and fell to leeward: a few blows of the axe from Dodd's own hand sent the mainmast after it.

The Agra rose a streak; and the next wave carried her a little further ashore.

And now the man in charge of the hawser reported with joy that there was a strain on it.

This gave new spirit to the crew. Dodd hustled and had the hawser carefully payed out by two men, while he himself secured the other end in the manner known to all British seamen standing on purpose.

There was a fearful bray; but great heavy black clouds flying about with amazing swiftness extinguished the moon at intervals: at others she glimmered faintly through a rent in the scud travelled, and gave the poor souls on the Agra a dim peep of the frail and narrow bridge they must pass to live. At such times the sea itself went down from the mizzen top, bellying toward the yawning sea, and soon lost to sight: it was now rising again and rushing toward the rock ashore: but what became of it in the middle? The ship's length, perhaps, or the bed of the sea to swallow it. Yes, to get from a ship going to pieces under them, the sailors precipitated themselves headlong into the sea, instead bellying to the sea and flickering in the wind. They went down it, one after another, and anxious eyes straining after them saw them rise again; but this was seen, that scarce one in three emerged into the lights ashore.

Then Dodd and Robarts stood in the top, and threatened to brain the first man who attempted to go ashore.

"We must make it taut first," said he; "bear a hand here with a tackle."

Even while this was being done, the other rope, whose end he had fired ashore, was seen moving to windward. The natives, it seems, had found it, and hurried it over.

Dodd mistaken the end from the bulwarks and carried it into the top, and made it fast; and soon there were two lines of communication shoreward and waving in the air side by side.

The sailors scrambled for a place, and some of them were lost by their own rashness. Keenly waited coolly: and went by himself.

Finally, Dodd was left in the top with Mr. Sharpe and the women, and little Murphy, and Ramsglom, whom Robarts had liberated to show his contempt for him.

Here Dodd was most troubled.

Mrs. Beresford sank down, and prayed, holding Vespasian by the knee.

Fortunately, as the mast vessel wrecked long ryne on Meiita, "the hind-part of the ship stuck fast and remained immovable."

But for how long?

Each wave now struck the ship's weather quarter with a sound like a cannon fired in a church, and sent the water clean into the mizzen top. It hit them like strokes of a whip. They were drenched to the skin, chilled to the bone, and frozen to the heart with fear. They made acquaintance with an hour with Death. Death itself has no bitterness that forlorn cluster did not feel: only the insensibility that ends that bitterness was wanting.

Now the sea, you must know, was literally strewed with things out of the Agra; masts, rigging, furniture, tea-chests, bundles of canes, chairs, tables: but, of all this jetsom, Dodd's eye had room for only one fixed object: a live sailor drifting ashore on a large wooden case: it struck him after a while that the man made very little way; and at last seemed to go up and down in one place. By-and-by he saw him nearer and nearer, and recognized him. It was one of the three washed off the bowsprit.

He cried joyfully: "The tide has turned: here's Thompson coming out to sea."

Then there ensued a dialogue, inaudible at times between these two sailors, the captain of the ship and the captain of the foretop; one perched on a stationary fragment of that vessel, the other drifting on a piano-forte; and both bawling at one another across the jaws of death.

"Thompson ahoy!"

"Hal-lo!"

"Whither bound?"

"Going out with the tide, and be d—d to me."

"What, can't ye swim?"

"Like a brass figure-head. It's all over with poor Jack, Sir."

"All over? Don't tell me! Look out now as you drift under our stern, and we'll lower you the four-inch hawser."

"Lord bless you, Sir; do, pray!" cried Thompson, losing his recklessness with the chance of life.

By this time the shore was black with people, and a boat was brought down to the beach, but to attempt to launch it was to be sucked out to sea.

At present all eyes were fixed on Thompson drifting to destruction.

Dodd cut the four-inch hawser, and, Vespasian aiding him, lowered it with a line, so that Thompson presently drifted right athwart it:

"All right, Sir!" said he, grasping it: and amidst thickening acclamations he contrived to land full of salt-water and all but insensible. The piano landed at Dunkirk, three weeks later.

In the bustle of this good and smart action, the tide perhaps escaped us.

By-and-by the sea struck lower and with less weight.

At nine P.M. Dodd took his little party down on deck again, being now the safest place; for the mast might go.

It was a sad scene: the deck was now dry, and the dead bodies lay quiet round them, with many eyes, grotesquely horrible, the long hair of two or three was stiff and crystallized with the saltpetre in the ship.

Mrs. Beresford clung to Vespasian: she held his bare black shoulder with one white and jewelled hand, and his wrist with the other, tight. "Oh, my dear," said she, "how the tears you are! It is incredible. Why you came back! I was fond a brave man was dead, but now I shall die. Your skin is nice and soft too. I shall never outlive this dreadful day."

And, now that the water was now low to wash them off the hawser, several of the ship's company came back to the ship to help the women down.

By noon the Agra's deck was thirty feet from the sand. The rescued ones wanted to break their legs and jump: but Dodd would not permit even that. He superintended the whole manœuvre, and observed, for the first time in the living, not omitting the poor goat, who was motionless and limp with fright.

When they were all safe on the sand, Dodd stood alone upon the poop a minute, cheered by all the sailors, French and English, ashore; then slid down the rope and joined the companions.

To their infinite surprise, the undaunted one was found to be swiveling.

"Oh dear, what is the matter?" said Mrs. Beresford, hysterically.

"Poor dear Agra, ma'am! She was such a beautiful sea-boat; and just look at her now! Why, she's going to pieces, and I can't do a little crank in beating, I can't deny it: but how she did fly with the wind abeam! She sank a cable in the sands, and weathered a hurricane off the Mauritius; and after all for a lubber to go and let her bones ashore in a fair wind: poor dear beauty."

He meandered thus, and kept turning back to look at the ship, till he was roused to by his hand on his breast. He stopped in the middle of his ridiculous lament, wore a look of self-reproach, and cast his eyes up with a look of gratitude.

The companions saw many adventures disappear.

A hospitable mayores entertained Mrs. Beresford and party: and she took to her bed: but she fell seriously ill as soon as ever she could do it with impunity.

Colonel Beresford went off to Paris: "I'll gain that any way by being wrecked," said he.

If there be a lover of quintropeds here, let him read Bill Billy's wonderful speech and strength. Being brandied by a good-natured Frenchman, who winked his eye, and then added greatly he staggered up; and butted his benefactor, like a man.

Fallalove's dry clothes and a blazing fire ready for Dodd at a little rude auberge: he sat over it and dried a few bank-notes he had upon him, and examined his pet chronometer, his children's. The pocket-book was much stained, but no harm whatever done to the contents.

In the midst of this employment the shadow of an enormous head was projected right upon his treasure.

Turning with a start he saw a face at the window: one of those vile mugs which are found to perfection among the canaille of the French nation: bloated, bleared, greasy, and wild-beast-like. The ugly thing, on being confronted, passed slowly out of the sun, and Dodd thought no more of it.

The owner of this sinister visage was Andry

Thibout, of whom it might be said, like face like life, for he was one of those disconsolate creatures, who feed upon the misfortunes of their kind, and stand on shore in foul weather hoping the worst, instead of praying for the best: briefly, a wrecker. He and his comrade, Jacques Moinard, had heard the Agra's gun fired, and come down to hasten on the wreck: but lo! at the turn of the tide, there were guns of armed soldiers lining the beach, and the Bayonet interposed between Theft and Misfortune. So now the desperate pair were prowling about like hungry, baffled wolves, curses on their lips, and rage at their hearts.

Dodd was extremely anxious to get to Barkington before the news of the wreck; for otherwise he knew his wife and children would be off for a year's agony in a single day. The only chance he saw was to get to Boulogne in time to catch the Dover packet sailing from that very day. But then Boulogne was eight leagues distant, and there was no public conveyance going. Failure, therefore, would ruin his feelings, was gone to look for horses to hire, aided by the British Consul. The latter, who was up stairs clearing out with a pin two holes that had fallen into decay for want of use. Those holes were in his ears.

And now, worn out by anxiety and hard work, Dodd began to nod in his chair by the fire.

He had by now only subsided into the hideous face of Thibout reappeared at the window, and watched him: presently a low whistle was uttered outside, and soon the two villains entered the room, and, feeling the landlady there as well as Dodd, called for a little glass apiece by absinthe: while drinking it they cast furtive glances toward Dodd, and waited till she should go about her business, and leave them alone with him.

But the good woman surprised their looks, and knowing the quality of the men, proceeded to a cup of coffee from a great metal reservoir by the fire, and asked Dodd without ceremony, "Will you vote only, Monsieur?" making believe he had ordered it.

"Merci, madame!" replied he, for his wife had taught him a little French.

"One may sleep mal à propos," muttered the woman in her own tongue. "My man is not to fair, and there are people here, who are not worth any great things."

Dodd rubbed his eyes and saw those two foul faces at the end of the kitchen: for such it was, though called a parlor. "Stranger," said he; and instinctively buttoned his coat.

At that Thibout touched Moinard's knee under the table.

Fullalove came in soon after, to say he had got two horses, and they would be here in a quarter of an hour.

"Well, but Vespasian, how is he to go?" inquired Dodd.

"Oh," we'll send him on ahead, and then ride and tie."

"No, no," said Dodd, "I'll go ahead. That will shake me up. I think I should tumble off a horse; I'm so dead sleepy."

Accordingly he started to walk on the road to Boulogne.

He had not been gone three minutes when Moinard sauntered out.

Moinard had not been gone two minutes when Thibout strolled out.

Moinard kept Dodd in sight, and Thibout kept Moinard.

The horses were brought soon after; but unfortunately the two did not start immediately though, had they known it, every moment was precious. They wasted time in argument. Vespasian had come down with a grimmed ing in one ear, and a ruby in the other. Fullalove saw this refreshing sight, and cried, "Here you washed but half your face, or—is this a re turn to savagery?"

Vespasian wore an air of offended dignity.

"No, Sar, these yar decorations come off a lady ob i cibilization: Missy Beresford donated em me. Says she, 'Captain Black'—he's Jim Pratt, always nicknamates his child Mass Black—'while I was collecting Gossamer's and your pickaninny, I seen you out of one corner of my eye admiratining my rings: den just you take em,' says she at confidencey: 'I'm sure I had no admirtanize em none, I've been shipwrecked. So I took em wid incredible condescension; and dat or beautiful says to me, 'Oh, go and wash wid your nonsense about colored skins! I have inperceinated your conduct, Massah Black, and likewise your purchases on de beach, and you says she, 'in time of shipwreck: and darn me, says she, 'if you are a man, you'll wash 'em.' 'Yes, Missy,' says I, superciliously, 'dis child am not a man, if you please, but a colored gemman.'"

Fullalove: "And, of course, the next thing, you'll ring your small bell for a cup of Patagonian; there, come along, ye dawn'd Anomaly."

He was going to say "Cuss," but remembering his pupil's late heroic conduct, softened it down to Anomaly.

But Vespasian always measured the force of words by their length or obscurity. "Anomaly" ent him to the heart: he rode off in moody silence and dejection, asking himself sorrowfully what he had done that such a mountain of vituperation should fall on him. "Anomaly!"

They cantered along in silence; for Fullalove was digesting this new trait in his pupil; and asking himself could he train it out; or must he cross it out. Just outside the town they met Captain Roberts walking in; he had landed three miles off down the coast. "Hallo!" said Fullalove.

"I suppose you thought I was drowned?" said Roberts, spitefully: "but you see I'm alive still."

Fullalove replied: "Well, Captain, that is only one mistake more, I reckon."

About two English miles from the town they came to a long straight slope up and down, where they could see a league before them; and there they caught sight of David Dodd's tall figure mounting the opposite rise.

Behind him at some little distance were two men going the same way, but on the grass by the road. Fullalove, David was on the middle of the road.

"He walks well but Jack Tar!" said Fullalove.

"Is Sar," said Vespasian, sulkily; "but dis lazyboy" (for he not yet got so far as those two behind him, cos they catch him up."

Now Vespasian had hardly uttered these words when a huge mustard-and-cress, and charming, that the speaker's eyes protruded, and he was dumfounded a moment; the next a loud cry burst from both him and Fullalove, and off they set, and they lashed their horses to the gallop and went tearing down the hill in a fury of rage and apprehension.

Mr. Fullalove was right; I think: a sailor is seldom a smart walker; but Dodd was a cricketer, you know, as well: he swung along at a long pace, and was not to be caught. He heard the galloping, but a few clothes, and a quadrant, and a chronometer: it was a cheap wreck to him, and a joyful one: for peril past is pleasant to delight. He had saved his life; and what he valued more, his children's lives and his wife's. The dread companion of his perils so precious to him as now. One might almost fancy that, by some strange sympathy, he felt the intense devotion of his daughter depended on it. Many in my day believe that human minds cast thin communicate, and that people at a distance are often moving in can't say. However, no such solution is really needed here. All the members of a united and loving family feel together, and work together—without specific concert—though hemispheres lie between: it is one of the best features of true family affection: now the Dodds, father, mother, sister, brother, were more one in heart and love than any other family I ever knew, or ever shall be: they had not.

David, then, walked toward Boulogne that afternoon a happy man. Already he tasted by anticipation the warm caresses of his wife and children, and mingled with them the caresses with those beloved ones clustering close round him. How would he tell them its adventures—its marvellous escapes? Why, in the first recovery—its wreck—its coming ashore dry as a bone: and concluding by taking it out of his bosom, and showing it to the children with cheerful boys cheer!

Dodged on in this delightful reverie, his eye detected a pit pat at some distance behind him: he looked round with eye slightly curious, and then with some coming on. But his fleeting glance he recognized the foul face of Andrè Thibout: a face not to be forgotten in a day. I don't know why it was, but the sight of the figment that face was after him to rob him: and he naturally enough concluded it was their ob ject.

And he was without a weapon; and they were doubtless armed. Indeed Thibout was swinging a heavy cudgel.

Poor Dodd's mind went into a whirl, and his body into a cold shiver! Those moments were live a year. To gain a little time he walked swiftly on, pretending not to have noticed them: but the road here is a torrent below, and the sides scantily clothed with fir-trees and bushes: he was in the midst of them, and the road turned round called "le mauvais côte," on account of a murder committed there two hundred years ago.

Presently he heard the men close behind him. At the same moment he saw at the side of the road a fallen fir-tree about as thick as his leg. He made but three swift strides, snatched it up, broke from the stem, whipped off his hat and held it before his head: "but Dodd was what is called "bat" fashion: "and bandaging and fling the stone in Thibout's face with perfect precision, and that bitter impetus a good thrower lends at the moment of delivery. Thibout received at that moment shot out his right hand and caught Moinard by the throat. The lawyer and fierce pallision was never seen than of these three.

Thibout's face crushed; his blood squirted all round the stone: and eight yards off lay that assailant on his back.

Moinard was more fortunate: he got two inches of the fir-tree into Dodd's shoulder, at the very moment Dodd caught him in his right hand vice. And now one vengeful hand or iron grasped him felly by the throat; another seized his knife arm and twisted it back like a child's: he kicked and struggled furiously: but in half a minute the mighty English arm, and iron fingers, held the long body of Jacques Moinard, with its knees knocking, temples bursting, frontal eyeballs eye protruding, and livid tongue lolling down to his chin: a few seconds more, and with the same stalwart arm that kept his relaxed and sinking body without falling, Dodd gave him a fierce whirl round to the edge of the road, then put a foot to his middle, and spurned his carcass with amazing force and fury down the precipice. Crunch, crunch! it plunged from tree to tree, bush to bush, and at last rolled into a dark brambly and there stuck in the fork of two trees. But Dodd had no sooner sens him headlong by that mighty effort, than his own sight darkened, his head swam, and, after staggering a little way, he sank down in a state bordering on insensibility.

Meantime Fullalove and Vespasian were galloping down the opposite hill to his rescue.

Unfortunately David Thibout was not dead: nor even mortally wounded. He was struck on the nose and mouth, and was blind for the first of his life, and half his front teeth were battered out of their sockets: but he fell, not from the blow, but because he had the body driven to earth by the mere physical force of so momentous a blow: knocked down like a nine-pin. He was not killed, but he found himself in a pool of blood, his own. He had little sensation of pain; but he had to feel for his face and found scarce a trace of his features; and his hand came away gory. He groaned.

Rising to his feet, he saw Dodd sitting at some distance: his first impulse was to fly from so terrible an antagonist: but, as he made for the road, he saw that Dodd was in a helpless condition: wounded perhaps by Moinard. And where was Moinard?

Nothing visible of him but his knife: that lay glittering in the road.

Thibout, with anxious eye turned toward Dodd, kneeled to pick it up: and in the act a drop of his own blood fell on the dust beside it. He smelled the blood like a tiger; spun out half a dozen teeth: and crept on tip-toe to his safe revenge.

Awake from your lethargy, or you are a dead man!

No. Thibout got to him unperceived, and the knife glittered over his head.

At this moment the air seemed to fill with chattering teeth, fierce eyes, and a pistol-and rang. Dodd heard and started, and saw his pistol. He put up his left hand to parry the blow: but fatally, for the point of Thibout's knife was now turned another way, and glaring with stupid terror out of his mutilated visage: a gibrattic, a horrible mask. The fierce face and white gleaming, rolling eyes, was coming at him like the wind, irresistible. Then Dodd, throwing himself at the precipice with a shriek of dismay, and went rolling after his comrade: but, ere he had gone half way, he caught across a young larch tree, and hung balanced. Up came the foaming horse: Fullalove dismounted hastily and fired three chambers of his pair of Adamant from his revolver. He rolled off, and never stopped again till he plashed into the torrent, and lay there, staining it with blood from his battered face and perforated shoulder.

Vespasian rolled off, and with glistening eyes administered some good brandy to Dodd. He, unconscious of his wound, a slight one, relieved their anxiety how it was, by assuring them he was not hurt, but that, ever since that "tap on the head" he got in the Straits of Gaspar, any angry excitement, and with him, made his head swim, and his temples seem to swell from the inside.

"I should have come off second best but for you, my dear friends. Shake hands over it, do! Lord bless you! Lord bless you both! As for you, Vespasian, I do think you are my guardian angel. Why, this is the second time you've saved it. Thank you for it's the third."

"Now you git along, Massa Capn," said Vespasian. "I'se berry good man, ridiculous good at cook: and dis child can't be parted from me all: he ar a darned Anatomy" (with such a look of offended dignity as Napoleon I.).

After examining the field of battle, and comparing notes, they mounted Dodd on Vespasian's horse, and Fullalove led Dodd's head gear better; and then they cantered on three abreast, Vespasian in the middle with one sinewy hand on each fellow-creature's; and such was his manly valour power that he often relieved his feet by lifting himself clean into the air: and the rest of the time his toe but touched the ground: and he sailed like an ostrich: and grinned and chattered like a monkey.

Sad to relate neither Thibout nor Moinard was ended. The guillotine stood on its rights. Meaning, when any of them came over again to the town staff and sore; and supped together —Moinard on liquids only—and vowed revenge on an wrecked people.

The three reached Boulogne in time for the Dover, and got safely aboard: the pair decided to go to the Yankee Paradise—Paris.

They parted with regret and tenderly like old friend, Fullalove and Vespasian: but Dodd, with the tears in his eyes, that, though he was in point of fact only a darned Anatomy, he felt like a friend and Gemman at parting from his dear old Captain.

The master of the Nancy knew Dodd well, and gave him a nice cot to sleep in. He tumbled in with a bad headache, and quite worn out, and never stirred till next morning.

And when he did wake he was safe at Barkington.

He ate and landed on the quay. He made for home.

On the way he passed Hardie's Bank; a firm synonymous in his mind with the Bank of England.

A thrill of joy went through him. Now It was safe. When he first sewed It on in China, It seemed secure nowhere except on his own person. But, since then, the manifold perils by sea and land It had encountered through being on him, had caused a strong reaction in his mind on that point. He longed to see It safe out of his own hands and in good hands.

He made for Hardie's door with a joyful rush, waved his cap over his head in triumph, and entered the bank with

Ah!

THE CAPTURE OF THE REBEL IRON-CLAD "ATLANTA."

We illustrate on page 440 the capture of the famous rebel iron-clad Atlanta, alias Fingal, by the monitor Weehawken, Captain Rodgers. Our picture is from a sketch by an intelligent amateur now at Admiral Du Pont's head-quarters. A letter to the Washington National Intelligencer thus graphically describes the affair:

FROM BEAUFORT, June 19, 1863.

The capture in Warsaw Sound of the rebel iron-clad Atlanta, alias Fingal, by Captain Rodgers, of the Weehawken, is a splendid affair, and reflects important naval credit of the war. She is the finest and most powerful vessel the rebels have ever built, and the only one formidable than was the Merrimac; and the result of the action has proved her advantages and terrible efficacy of the 15-inch gune, and fully sustains the Department in its introduction of these guns, notwithstanding the great opposition to them.

The Atlanta came down with the most confident expectation of promptly capturing our iron-clads—the Weehawken, Captain Rodgers, and the Nahant, Captain Downe. She was first discovered approaching in the gray of the morning, and the alarm was instantly given. The Nahant stood down the Sound, but soon turned toward her gigantic opponent, coming up with her about seven miles from the mouth of the river. The first shot was fired by the Atlanta about 7 A. M., and was followed by a rapid fire of shot and shell from both vessels; that first shot virtually decided the fate of the day. The terrible missile struck the Pilot House, shifting, instead, the twenty-four inches of solid timber, as if it was a mere pine board, about four feet from the rear, some two inches. Just in front part by the same concussion, without being personally struck, Captain Rodgers was thrown to the floor and down by it, and, though untouched, he could not get up for ten minutes. The next shot struck the side of the gunstoppers, knocking it into fragments, and wounding seven men. The next struck the pilot-house on the side, throwing two of the pilots, and stunned the two men at the wheel, and penetrating the whole iron floor of the pilot-house. The fourth shot struck her on the backside; this cut away the iron covering of the stern, caught the iron plating of the side; and the fifth shot went through the pilot-house, and struck the Nahant in the vicinity of her being admirable. The first gun was pointed by Captain Rodgers himself, and the first gun was fired down her flag, and run up a white one. The whole firing, from the first to the last gun, was only fifteen minutes, and never were men so utterly confounded and surprised as a crew of rebels by the result. Indeed, they were they of success that two steamers came down to tow the prizes into the Savannah, but they were met with bullets to witness the fight and certain victory.

The Atlanta cost the rebels the enormous sum of a million of dollars—of our money, not Confederate paper—and she is filled with valuable stores. Their shot struck the armor-plating the Weehawken and Nahant, to join the iron-clads in Charleston harbor, but were the heaviest of the rebel 15-inch guns; for they consider her as a sea-going cruiser. What ridiculous nonsense the rebels have to invent, to say nothing of its great moral effect by demonstrating the immense efficiency of the 15-inch guns, and the folly of rebels in their future movements with their iron-roofed floating forts.

The prize crew to the Atlanta was selected from the ship's crew almost alongside the Atlanta, so as to give her no chance to run away. The prize crew was ordered to destroy her if she attempted to escape, and they were within a distance where the gunners knew that if they fired shot would not penetrate the iron-plating of the Atlanta, but the ship was so promptly settled that he had not the opportunity to fire a single shot from the Weehawken only five.

The machinery of the Atlanta is untouched, and she will be at once added to this squadron; for her other injuries are so inconsiderable as to be nothing.

This vessel has been a perfect thorn in the flesh; for she has required constant watching, and night at sea has often taken advantage of the absence of the iron-clads on their service to run down the blockade in our very eyes, sail out sixty-mile ships and transports, but also our vessels, in search of which she would return. She is also to be credited for they handled their vessel with consummate skill, and the result is a cause of great and general congratulation throughout the squadron.

A correspondent of the Philadelphia Inquirer gives the following elaborate account of the Atlanta:

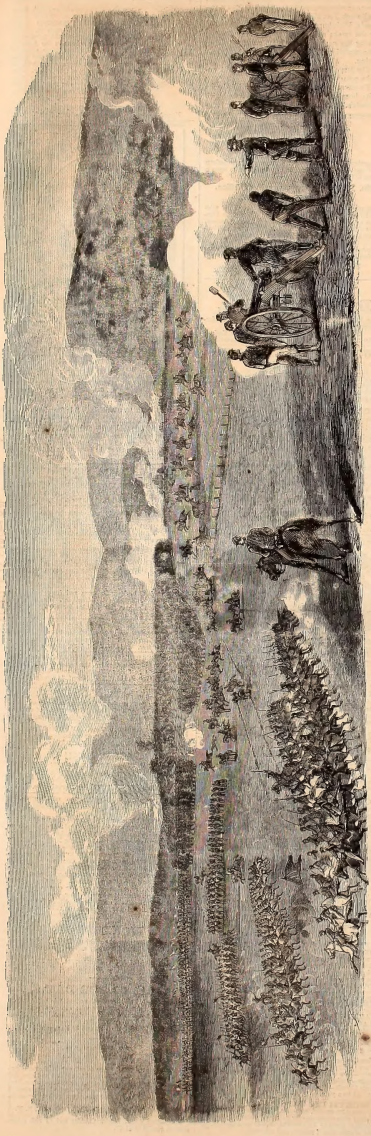
The Atlanta is armed with six guns, one 7-inch pivot gun fore and aft, and two 6-inch guns on each broadside. These guns are all in Brooke mountings, which, in our opinion, made such good execution against our iron-clads in the late attack on Charleston. They are rifled, and throw that long steel-pointed missile of English manufacture. The Atlanta is also provided with a ram of the most effective kind, and, from the sloping line of the deck, it is admirably adapted for the use of that weapon. The other magazine is supposed to contain the same amount, and, indeed, the whole interior of the ship is of the most elaborate kind. When you are older that one hundred pounds is a ship's allowance of powder, and you will conclude that the Atlanta's crew intended some damage. The ship is built of heavy timber, with double bulkheads, cellulose, boarding piles, guns, revolvers, etc. Her armament is as follows:

She has, inside, three decks; first, the gun-deck, 202 feet long by 75 feet wide, and protected by a deck of 250 feet long, which is subdivided into the captain's cabin and, wardroom, the petty officers' quarters, and forward the men's quarters. Below this deck in the third, the orlop deck, is the ship's store room and the engineer's department, etc. Immediately fore and aft of this deck are the magazine and shell rooms, and this is protected by a deck of 2 inches of iron, except the centre of the deck, which is 4 inches thick, and the sides of which are run the bulwarks to the height of eight feet. They are made of 2 inches of iron, backed by solid oak timber, and are very strong.

First and last there are outside very wrought-iron bars, six inches wide by two inches thick, running perpendicularly from the deck to the gunwale, and they hold solid oak timber, by rivets and bolts. Across these bars, horizontally, and on the inside, are bars of the same material and pattern, fastened to the outside layer by the strongest rivets. Within this bar-work, and between it and the inner planking of five-oak iron-clads, also running perpendicularly and horizontally, are solid oak timbers, and the whole forms similar thickness of Georgia pine plank, forming the last portion of her armor. This is 10 feet wide, and the sides of the roof are twelve inches thick, and pierced for the guns. The roof is also made of four layers of wrought-iron, four inches of iron-oak, and four of Georgia pine.



The pilot-house is very heavy and extremely strong. Extra layers of iron and pine, etc., so that the embrasure apparatus, from the deck to the roof, is 20 inches thick.

Her length from bow to stern-post is a small fraction over 200 feet. Her extreme breadth of beam is 48 feet, her best long and 40 feet in width, and at the top 36 feet. She draws 14 feet forward and 15 feet aft. Her height from her keel to the roof does not exceed 12 feet.

The height of the gun-deck to the roof the perpendicular height is 8 feet, and the sides of the roof sloping at an angle of forty-five degrees, the standing height is 6 feet. The lower edge of the roof is 10 inches above the gun-mark, so that she stands above the water about 8 feet. From her aft roof edge it is 20 feet to the stern-post, and from her fore roof edge it is also 20 feet to her bow. The distance from her gun-deck to her keel is 16 feet and a fraction over. Her steering apparatus is perfect, and her rudder entirely submerged in the water, thereby being in the safest place imaginable. Her iron casting extends 2 feet below the water-line.

REVEILLE IN CAMP—5 A.M.

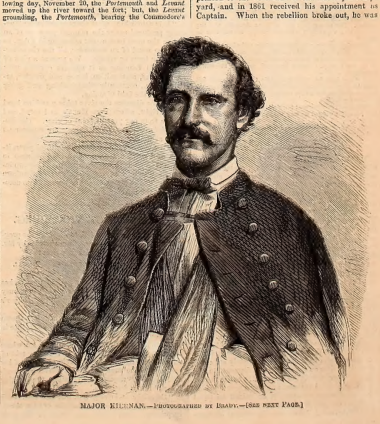
THE LATE REAR-ADMIRAL FOOTE.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

THE LATE ADMIRAL FOOTE.



WE publish herewith a portrait of the late Rear-Admiral ANDREW HULL FOOTE, who died in this city on 26th June.

The Admiral was born in New Haven, Connecticut, on September 12, 1806, and was consequently nearly fifty-seven when he died. He entered the navy in 1822, obtained a warrant of Midshipman in 1824, passed Midshipman in 1827, and Lieutenant in 1810. His services on board the John Adams, Cumberland, and other famous vessels of our navy are well remembered. In 1849 he obtained the command of the brig Perry, and was sent to the coast of Africa, where he took an active part in suppressing the slave-trade. In 1850 he took the command of the Portsmouth, and sailed for the East Indies. It was on that cruise that the affair of the Barrier Forts took place, which we find thus detailed in the Herald:

While retiring in his gig, on approaching the Canton barrier forts, mounting one hundred and seventy-six guns, the Chinese opened fire upon his boat, which Commodore Foote returned only with his revolver. A brisk fire was kept up upon his boat; but after passing the first fort he returned to his ship, rather than have his boat destroyed, as it otherwise would have been, and reported the outrage to the Commodore, urging him to vindicate the honor of our insulted flag by an attack upon the forts. On the following day, November 20, the Portsmouth and Levant moved up the river toward the first; but, the Levant grounding, the Portsmouth, bearing the Commodore's flag, anchored under a brisk fire four hundred and ninety yards from the nearest fort, and for two hours and twenty minutes withstood, and finally silenced, the fire of the fort commonly known as the "Barrier Fort." The Commodore, who had been suffering from illness, was carried upon the next day and returned to Whampoa, and ordered upon the following day to the assistance of the United Commissioner of Canton. The Levant, getting afloat, ran up to the Portsmouth on the following day, and the two ships were kept in position ready to act as circumstances might require.

Early in the morning of the 21st the two ships opened fire upon the remaining forts, which was returned with a dint of spirit for the space of an hour, when Commander Foote, with Commanders Bell and Smith, headed a force of two hundred and eighty men, taken from the ships of the respective captains, and stormed the nearest and strongest fort. The following day the third and fourth forts were stormed and captured. The Chinese defended their forts with five thousand men, and in the first attack had killed and wounded about four hundred, while the Americans only numbered a few of forty-four killed and wounded. These fortifications were built of granite, nine feet in thickness; but the famous 8-inch gun of sixty-three hundred weight, with the 8-inch shells, made a breach in the first fort through which the storming party could easily enter and take possession. The English and French were loud in their praises of the squadron for the result of this pluck fight; and as the Portsmouth dropped down the river, the British Admiral, Sir Michael Seymour's ship, as well as his Commodore's vessel, manned the rigging, and gave three rousing cheers for the Portsmouth, while their bands struck up "Hail Columbia" and "Yankee Doodle."

On his return to the United States he was appointed to the command of the Brooklyn Navy-yard, and in 1861 received his appointment as Captain. When the rebellion broke out, he was charged with the duty of fitting out the Mississippi Flotilla. How well he did that the history of the war is there to tell. The Herald says:

The fleet under Foote attacked and took Fort Henry on February 6, 1862, entirely unaided by the land-forces; captured the rebel batteries at Donelson on the 14th; hotly engaged for two hours, took possession of and occupied Clarksville, without the presence of a land-force, and, by the subsequent appearance before Columbus for several days, forced the rebels to evacuate their boasted Gibraltar, reaching as far as Moodies victory, Island No. 10 was engulphed to Governor Harris from Donelson, on the afternoon of February 14, '62, when the gun-boats appeared at its helpful, "The Federal gun-boats are destroying it. For God's sake send us all the help you can immediately! I don't care for the land-force of the enemy: they don't hurt us; but if you can keep down the iron-clads, do so."

On the Sabbath after the capture of Fort Henry quite a large congregation had assembled at the little Presbyterian church in Cairo. They waited a long time for the regular preacher to come and open the services, but waited in vain; and it soon became apparent that he was not to go home somewhere. Just then the old Puritan God-fearing spirit of Foote arose within him. He arose and opened the service with prayer.

The audience to entertain their surprise when he appeared on the platform, coming as he did from the scene of battle, and in his stead, coming to hear those merits were upon every tongue, but the fact of wounded men, the engagement fresh in their minds, and the more marked because of the strangeness of the coincidence. Having for several hours before the old veteran was hotly engaged in dealing death and destruction to the enemy of his country, and he stood before the people in the character of a preacher of the Gospel of peace. But the prayer was offered, and after the hymn had risk his text from Acts xiv., 9, and proceeded with a sermon so full and heart-felt before for many. Clear, calm, logical, he proved, in truly eloquent diction, that the happiness of man was dependent upon the welfare of the heart, and not upon worldly prosperity or adversity. After the sermon the congregation visited the fifth ship and endeavors to reach him to congratulate him upon his success in the late battle; but the old veteran was not to receive a peculiar look, as much as to say, "This is the Sabbath-day, and this God's house, and is the enemy of his people over the downfall of an enemy."

Throughout the whole time Admiral Foote commanded the Mississippi squadron its organization was perfect and its achievements brilliant. At the attack on Fort Henry, in February, 1862, he received a severe wound in the foot, from which he never fully recovered. He was obliged to keep up, for a long time, despite the advice of his physicians, against the dictates of his own indomitable command, until it became apparent to himself that he must relinquish the charge of the squadron, and retire to the officers, who so devotedly loved him. He was relieved by Captain C. H. Davis (now Admiral), and sailed for home to permit his inspired health.

He received a host of thanks from Congress, and his commission as Rear-Admiral bore date 4th July 16, 1862.

Notwithstanding his feeble health he was constantly desired active employment, and was appointed chief of the Bureau of Equipment at Washington, which post he was held by discomfort, and his appointment to supersede Commodore Dupont in command of the South Atlantic Squadron. He was on his way thither when he was taken sick, at the house and died. The writer, from whom we have already quoted, thus describes his death-scene:

He lay on a sofa, and as calm and easy a complainant as a man in the bloom of life, and but for the peculiar sound of his breathing one could have scarcely believed he was in the passing away. It did not seem like the chamber of death. His life had been so exemplary, his trust in God so sure and steadfast, that one could but feel that this was but the journey to a better and a brighter land.

He left his room long after the daylight had darkened the passage, and when the earlier worship was over was listening to their various stations, full of the pleasant thoughts which a review of his life had brought to him. He was a man who never entered a battle but he, previous to undergoing the work, counted upon the cost of his offences and men; a man who held himself responsible to God for every life there swept away; a man solicitous of peace: pure in heart, living always a godly life, and one of the strong lights of our naval service. He was not long going to meet that Judge who would say, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

Later Saturday morning he rapidly failed; but others he was conscious to the last, and was minister to by prayer up to the middle of the day. His eldest son arrived during the day, and he was by his bedside at the last father during the whole of the day. During the earlier part of the evening the Admiral seemed to have gained considerable strength, and at times talked considerably, but his mind still wandered. Chaplain Brownell was upon his knees during the last, and watched him with tenderness and care. His feet were turned toward the door, but his head was on the pillow. It was thus he passed from the rough ship to land.

From Saturday last up to the time of death the Admiral changed but little, save that he had difficulty in speaking at times brightening up, and in a few hours afterward sinking. His voice was one of quiet strength, and his disease had a powerful will and strong constitution to master.

Yesterday, however, he failed rapidly, and after sundown it was known to the household that he was not to live through the night. The writer was present at his death-bed; which was surrounded by his family, Captain Scudder, and a few confidential servants.

At ten o'clock he took to rapidly that all present felt that his time was numbered by minutes. In appearance he was much worn away, except upon the brow, which was calm and peaceful.

At eighteen minutes past ten o'clock he ceased to breathe, and his spirit winged its way to the God who gave it.

MAJOR KIERNAN.

MAJOR JAMES L. KIERNAN, whose likeness we give on page 445, is a New Yorker, a graduate in medicine of the University of New York, and before the war editor of the New York Medical Press, and Professor of Natural History and Physiology in the Public Schools.

He entered the army as surgeon of the 69th New York, and subsequently was in the 5th Kentucky, on General Frémont's staff; in the 3d Missouri cavalry militia; a volunteer attached to the 1st Missouri cavalry; and had the advantage of Curtis's pursuit of Price into Arkansas; and was, for services rendered, appointed on the 1st March, 1863, to the position which he now fills since March the 6th Missouri cavalry.

When Major Kiernan entered this regiment, he was informed by Colonel C. Wright that though he was commissioned as Surgeon, yet he must fight as Major also; that he would have more than enough to do in his regiment, as the military necessities of frontier warfare required it."

Major Kiernan so well obeyed that Wright afterward declared that the only difficulty he had was in keeping him back from recklessly exposing himself. Now on the wild scout, foremost in the dashing charge, or in the midst of the battle, again the kind, skillful surgeon, as many a gallant young Western soldier can testify, he gained an equal name as surgeon and soldier.

Although, last November, the scene of his operations shifted from the barren hills of the Ozark range to the alluvial swamps of Southern Arkansas, Louisiana, and Mississippi, and with his regiment he was constantly on the scout on both sides of the River Mississippi, from Helena, Arkansas, to the country around Vicksburg.

Subjoined is an incident which is taken from the St. Louis Democrat of 9th ult. It is an extract from their Vicksburg correspondent, and speaks for itself:

It would be difficult to chronicle more bravery than has been shown, unofficially and collectively, by both officers and men. In the different battles from the time of the operations against the rear commenced, but there is one exploit worth, for its great endurance and sacrifices, I will here record.

On the 6th of May five ambulances having been captured by the enemy, convoy to the rear of prisoners of war, Fort Gibson and Rodney, Mississippi, six companies of the 6th Missouri cavalry, Colonel Benton commanding, were ordered from Rocky Springs to recapture them or die. In one of Grierson's raids the same regiment was in the neighborhood where they were taken as hostages for the hands of his return.

This cavalry scout, proceeding through Port Gibson, Willow Springs, Oakland, Rocky Springs, and Rodney a distance of forty miles from where they started, the crossing of the same day; they were in the advance guard, and followed him up for some time, when they learned from a citizen authority that the rebel cavalry, ever fearful their strength, were attempting to surround them. Having overtaken the guard of prisoners and ambulances, the command of Adjutant Gillespie (whom four miles from Jesse Creek, which it was ascertained the rebels were crossing. They fell back toward Port Gibson. Colonel skirmishing by wing to the wings, and Major Kiernan, Surgeon, in front, scout cavalry, was thrown from his horse, severely wounding in the shoulder. Having rallied, he charged with three out heavy pickets, and held it from the time they arrived, two o'clock, till the 10th, when the 10th, with the Major Kiernan was, during this time, lying almost insensible at his head, and a clock interval between the charges by Colonel Wright that a superior force were stealing around on the left flank, in a hollow square formed by bivouac, when he left with its force to reconnoitre on a hill to the left, after which the 10th charged. The 6th accurately reached them when the rebel cavalry dashed into the 10th, and, after a short but desperate struggle, routed them, as well as their foe. Scout skirmishing took place, and after a short pursuit the 6th returned to the battle-field, to convey the wounded. This rebel cavalry visited the 6th on the 6th, and declined; a rebel surgeon was attending him at the time.

It is the third time Major Kiernan has been wounded, and overheard a conversation between a rebel officer and a citizen, the latter remarking, "Why, that fellow is a doctor." The rebel officer replied, "Yes, he is a doctor, but a damned fine fighter." Major Kiernan, though severely wounded, still continues to perform the duties of his office, and is now on the scout.

THE SIEGE OF PORT HUDSON.

On page 437 we reproduce three sketches by Mr. Theodore R. Davis, showing the progress of events at Port Hudson. Mr. Hamilton writes:

"The progress of the war is perpetually bringing into notice new and important points, which, however by name, beyond the few residents in their immediate vicinity. Springfield Landing is one of these. This spot is situated some seventeen miles above Baton Rouge, on the left bank of the river, and at present serves as a depôt and landing for our troops, and a rendezvous for the varying fluctuations upon Port Hudson.

"If in unfortunate changes are instantaneously produced under the magical presence of an army; the most barren spot assuming in a day, as by the wand of enchantment, all the characteristics of a town or village. We present a view of Springfield Landing as it appears covered with tents, and the various evidences of camp life, military, etc., constantly disembarking and going onward to the front of the siege.

"In the distance the river takes a sudden bend to the right, where Port Hudson is located, and wreaths from our present position. The Monongahela, Richmond, and Genesee are represented firing at the forts.

"On the other sketches are faithful portraits of two places selected as head-quarters in General Banks's present campaign. They are interesting only as representations of the Southern scenery, and of places suddenly brought into notoriety by the war."

THE SIEGE OF VICKSBURG.

We continue, on page 436, to illustrate the progress of the siege of Vicksburg, from sketches by Mr. Theodore R. Davis. Mr. Davis writes:

"THE SAPE AND PARALLELS OF GENERAL MCPHERSON'S CORPS.

"Each hour's labor of our gallant men makes such a change in the scene that it must be a busy pencil that keeps before the reader all the changes. Weekly the workings of this regular siege.

"The skill of General McPherson has shown him as an engineer officer given a general confidence in the result.

"Men digging, day after day, under a sun whose scorches says seem to give color to the story told of the maternal Africa, 'who, having left one of her progeny on the sunny side of a convenient sandhill, found it necessary to gather the melting Pleiads' into a wash-tub.

"Certainly it is very hot, but our men work steadily, and with a comprehension of plan that is surprising. But to the description of the scene sketched. In the centre of the sketch, and directly over our advanced battery, is Brickenridge's, the 'rebel work Fort Hill; still over this, and in the distance, Vicksburg is seen; too, in the distance, rises the smoke of our transports and gun-boats, marking the course of the great river for whose uninterrupted navigation this mighty labor is progressing.

"The trench or sap is at the moment just under the corner of the rebel work.

"To-morrow will see another sap. Maybe its result is borne by telegraph, will be published with this sketch."

HOSTETTER'S
CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS.

HABITUAL CONSTIPATION.—HOW TO EFFECT A CERTAIN AND PERMANENT CURE.—Some complaints of life predispose to costiveness, especially those which alter the mental faculties. Costiveness is the most unfortunate habit of body, under such circumstances, might possibly be relieved by changing their accustomed employments for others of a more active kind; but this is by no means practicable. Habitual constipation is a very obstinate disorder. All the ordinary so-called remedies invariably aggravate it. Nothing can be more injurious than the continued use of strong aperients. They at first irritate, and finally almost paralyze the bowels—rendering them so torpid that enormous doses of cathartic medicine have no effect upon them. A mild aperient, combined with a gentle stimulant, is the true remedy; and a preparation in the happiest proportion, of these ingredients, is found in HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS. This famous vegetable invigorant, in the whole intestinal canal, while quickening from its convolutions all impurities as it forces them through them. No more sanative has this double operation. No ordinary stimulant effects the desired object. Dose of constipation seldom done as hopeless by distinguished medical men have been cured in a few weeks by the Bitters. Those who have been tired all the medicines of the discovery in vain, we say that HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS is the only one that can reasonably or contingently claim the cure of the needs of sedentary habits. HOSTETTER'S BITTERS, by imparting vigor which would otherwise be derived from exercise, will in all cases enable the system to perform its accustomed functions without inability. Few physicians even make proper allowances for the exhilaration in some cases, and depression in others, caused by despair, in others, which are frequently the accompaniments of the disease of females. The trials to which ladies afflicted with these vibrations often make heroic efforts to conquer them, and fail for the want of just such a stimulant and corrective as the "Bitters" afford. If the true nature of woman's constitution were better appreciated, it would be seen that no blame attaches to her for these aberrations, but that, on the contrary, the afflicted reader the object of a tender sympathy and a finder care.

HUBBARD BRO'S
CHRONOMETERS & WATCHES
NEW YORK.

Are the sole consignees in the United States for this unique novelty the

Railway Timekeepers,

WITH HEAVY STERLING SILVER CASES,

ESPECIALLY ADAPTED FOR ARMY SALES.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper of Feb. 14, 1863, says: "HUBBARD'S TIMEKEEPERS are becoming proverbial for their accuracy and reliability. They are particularly valuable for officers in the army and travelers."

The Army and Navy Gazette, of Philadelphia, in its Number of May 9, reviewing this watch, says: "We are pleased to find the importation of the HUBBARD BROS. are meeting the enormous sale that such extraordinary enterprise as theirs so richly merits. These watches are no novelties produced by no other House, for exceeding other manufactures in point of accuracy and elegance. Fidelity and promptness to their patrons render it unnecessary to dwell upon the merits of the house."

The RAILWAY TIMEKEEPER has many solid silver cases, beautiful white enamel dial, handsome gold hands, with superior regulated movement, mounted on heavy silver plated nickel, and is sold for one half of gold prices, $30. By express, $1 00 additional postage. Should retail readily at from $50 to $60 each. Not sold by counties of less than six.

Magic Time Observers,

THE PERFECTION OF MECHANISM!

BEING A HUNTING OR OPEN FACE, OR LADY'S OR GENTLEMAN'S WATCH COMBINED, WITH PATENT SELF-WINDING ATTACHMENT.

"The N. Y. Illustrated News, in its issue of Jan. 19th, 1863, on page 347, voluntarily says: "We have been shown a most pleasing novelty, of which the HUBBARD BROS. of New York, are the sole importers. It is called the MAGIC TIME OBSERVER, and is a Hunting and Open Face Watch combined. One of the problems most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepiece for general and reliable use ever offered. It has within it and connected with its machinery, its own winding attachment, rendering it free from the annoyance of key. In case of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outside being like 18 carat gold. It has the improved ruby action lever movement, and is warranted an accurate timekeeper. The manufacturers are now turning out 5,000 of these Watches, in most sections of the world, and those proposing to buy at wholesale, $35. If sent by mail add postage 1 dollar.

TERMS CASH IN ADVANCE!

☞ Correspondents in the ARMY advise us of the detention of remittances heretofore sent us. The extra safeguarding processing arises from the envy of sutlers, whose avocation is threatened by home trade. Express officers do open our letters and detain orders. By this ignominious process we have no remedy except to request you to buy the better swindle their customers! The very low prices we quote will be a sufficient guarantee to every discriminating upset the defrauding projects of the sutlers, and this we intend to do, and will do, if our correspondents will be careful. Without a letter of advice from you, a check there can be no doubt; meanwhile we must respectfully refer to our terms, which are cash in all cases, regardless of the machinations of these adroit rogues. Now that it is no longer safe to send money by express, every wise friend in this city to call upon us and make the purchase in person, or if he does it impossible, send the money through an acquaintance living beyond the lines. We send nothing by mail, and will not depart from this rule of business! We are at all times ready to wait upon customers, showing them the watches free attention. We invite inspection to our goods. Address

GETTYSBURG.

SHROUDED the story wrought, on the murderous field of battle;
It has wiped the stain of defeat from every soldier's brow:
Mid the clash of steel on steel, and shouts, and the harsh death-rattle,
The Army of the Potomac has won a victory now!

Honor to ye brave men, from the battle wounded and gory!
Honor to ye brave men, whom the angel of death passed by!
Ages on ages hence shall others rehearse your story,
And pray that when duty calls like you they may live or die.

Though your worldly lives be obscured in the night with dimness and dreary,
Angel voices shall call to your resurrection morning:—
God Himself in your Captain, and He will leave no man out!

He, who for weary months have suffered loss and disaster,
Going from love and home to scenes of hatred and pain,
Gaze on your flag with pride, and press toward the mustering Heaven!
Rock every brow with laurel, and lift up your hands again!

Then kneel reverently and call on the name of Jesus.
Be every head uncovered—each heart in silence adore.
He can crowned us with His love—He has blessed His erring creatures!
Him be the power and glory forever and ever, more!

SATURDAY, JULY 18, 1863.

THE GOOD NEWS.

AFTER a long period of gloom and disquiet, a cheerful, we can again congratulate our readers upon good news. On Sd July, at 9 P.M., the broken masses of Lee's rebel army, retiring from the shock of Meade's veterans, were flying to the mountains, throwing away their guns and cartridge-boxes, and strewing the plains of Southern Pennsylvania with the material of victory while on the one side the Army of the Potomac, flushed with victory and believing in its commander, was hotly pressing the fugitives in their retreat Northward; and on the other the masses of New York and Pennsylvania, under Couch, fresh from peaceful pursuits, but as steady as veterans, were pressing down on their flank, and converting their attempted retreat into a rout. Not only did the rebels leave dead and wounded in our hands. The skulkers and stragglers from Lee's army—who fill every farm-house and thicket in Southern Pennsylvania and Maryland—are alone said to number one-fourth of the effective force with which he entered Maryland. Of the guns lost by the rebels, and taken by us, the reports are thus far so conflicting that we do not care to repeat them. It is enough, however, that Lee must have lost in his hasty and disorderly retreat a great portion of his artillery; and if, as is reported, Meade came up with him at or near Williamsport on 7th, and engaged him while he was preparing to cross into Virginia, the loss of guns will probably be incalculable. Men may ford the river even in its present swollen condition, but guns can not; and without an adequate artillery force Lee's forces will never get back to Richmond as an army.

Within twelve hours after the defeat of the rebels under the apparition of Vicksburg surrendered to General Grant. We have as yet no details of the event—nothing, we may say, but a very brief dispatch from Grant himself to Secretary Welles. On this account the authenticity of the news has been questioned by some rebel sympathizers. We can see no good reason, however, for assuming its incorrectness. On the contrary, the last letters from Vicksburg, dated up to 28th ult., all foreshadow the early surrender of the place, partly from the effect of our bombardment and mining operations, and partly from the want of provisions. Before these lines are read all doubts will be removed by the receipt of fuller intelligence, and we take for granted that that intelligence will confirm the pressed belief that we have taken Vicksburg with all its garrison and artillery.

It is assumed by some of our papers and many of our people that the defeat of Lee's army and the fall of Vicksburg involve the collapse of the rebellion. This may be so in one sense, inasmuch as the reopening of the Mississippi which follows as a matter of course from the capture of Vicksburg, and the overwhelming defeat of the rebel army in Northern Virginia, render the further prosecution of the contest by the pro-slavery insurgents absolutely hopeless. The capture of Vicksburg secures the capture of Port Hudson, bisects the rebel country, and leaves General Grant's army free to operate in conjunction with Banks against Mobile, or, in conjunction with Rosecrans, against Chattanooga—the geographical and strategical centre of the Confederacy; while on the other hand, the defeat of Lee uncovers Richmond, and the railroad system of Virginia, and, if properly turned to account by our people, will compel the so-called Government of the Confederacy to seek refuge in the Gulf States, where, according to last accounts, they are not very likely to be welcome. In this point of view, the victory which we have, it appears, may be said to involve, sooner or later, the collapse of the pro-slavery insurrection, and the cessation of the authority of the United States Government over the whole of the territory of the United States.

But it will probably prove a mistake to expect the active surrender of the rebels, so long as Bragg, Beauregard, and Johnston have armies under their control. By falling back into the spirals of the Carolinas and Georgia, by concentrating their forces and their supplies; by increasing their cavalry force and devoting their energies to cavalry raids into the North, and the destruction of the long lines of communication which we shall have to maintain with our armies in the heart of the South; by distributing guerrillas and bushwhackers along the banks of the Mississippi and the other great rivers of the Confederacy; a contest may be carried on for years with a though hopeless and ineffectual to produce any good result, may yet avail to prevent our being able to claim that a rebellion has been crushed or peace restored. This, we take it, will be the policy of the rebel leaders. They are not the men to give up the ghost. They know that they have nothing to gain by patience. Disgrace and exile are the mildest reward they can expect. A halter from their own outraged people will be the reward of all to their career. The authors of the greatest rebellion in history—a rebellion equally remarkable as having a rebellious birth and a rebellious government of their country, but against the plainest principles of truth and justice and Almighty God himself—they will not, they can not sue for terms as other vanquished combatants might. They will fight to the bitter end: fight so long as they can persuade a single deluded white man or wretched negro to shoulder a musket in their cause.

If the news received within the past two days be confirmed, the crisis of the rebellion is ended. The power of the Government of the United States to maintain its authority is demonstrated. The power of the rebels to establish an independent government is disproved.

It now remains to accomplish the work by suppressing the bands of rebels who, for some time to come, may be expected to infest the country in which the war has been waged, by hunting down guerrillas on the Mississippi and bands of organized insurgents in Virginia; by destroying the fortresses built to resist the authority of the Government, and the railroads by rebel country with other forts garrisoned by loyal black men, whose business it shall be to keep down the few traitors who were their masters, shattering every semblance of an army which the remaining insurgents may muster; and, finally, by administering to the rising generation at the South such a thorough lesson of the cost and inconvenience of war.

This is the work now before us. Though less brilliant than that which has been accomplished, it will still task our energies severely.

THE LOUNGER.

THE FOURTH OF JULY, 1863.

Our great national day broke this year in clouds and storm. The public mind had never been seduced more than at other times to believe that decisive battle of the campaign, if not of the rebellion, was always near. Every morning we reached the city was conflicting and doubtful. That our brave brothers in the field were fighting as heroes fight was clear, but how the battle would avail to victory was yet to be known. The field of battle just a year before was upon the peninsula of Virginia. It was near Richmond. Again Meade's army was the flag of civil order, constitutional liberty, and national unity between the Mississippi and the Lakes there was a hardy people enrolled as militia, but neither trained nor massed as an army. They could not hope to withstand the furious onset of triumphant rebels; and Lee's success would be the mortal peril of free, popular, democratic institutions.

So dawned the day, with this solemn consciousness in the breast of every loyal American citizen. The historical Fourth of July, 1776, was not a day more precious to this country, and therefore to mankind. It brought this year—under the circumstances it could bring with it—but one supreme, overpowering, religious, and patriotic duty. The whole land should ring with the chorus of sympathy, encouragement, and resolution for the army. On this day that army was America. It was the Government, the Union, the constitution, the flag. It stood for all that we love and believe as Americans; our glory in the past, our hope in the future. That glorious army was on this day the van of human civilization.

And on this day a body of people who call themselves "the Democracy" held a mass meeting in the Academy of Music, in New York, under the auspices of a political society known as the Democratic Young Men's Association, which is the Copperhead club before which Vallandigham, James Brooks, G. Tucker Curtis, and their associates, have furiously denounced the war, or craftily undermined public confidence in it without cause. The building was filled. The crowd was enthusiastic, after the manner of crowds upon the Fourth. The speakers were chiefly Governor Seymour of New York and Mr. Seymour who is not Governor of Connecticut. They made long and emphatic harangues. Governor Mr. Seymour, who says that he will let the Union go rather than slavery, complained that we give a full assent to the doctrine of human equality set forth in the Declaration, and therefore we ought to let men who rebel in arms to perpetuate slavery have their own way. He informed us that our national authorities are despots and tyrants; that the fundamental principles of our Government, all our securities, all our rights, are in mortal danger from—the Government of the United States. The arrest of Vallandigham was the mere sign of the loss of all things precious to an American citizen, and every man must resist himself to oppose the Government, for anarchy and military despotism were at hand. Mr. Seymour of Connecticut said, as usual, that we are asses; and Governor Seymour said we could not hope to beat a gallant race of gentlemen who whip the mothers of their infants and sell their own children. We must show our power by asking them what they wanted, and doing precisely what they said. Mr. O'Gorman followed by declaring the Government of the United States a despotism like that of the Bourbons in France and the Stuarts in England. Fort Lafayette was a Bastile. The war was wicked. He had opposed it always, but since the enemy was in a neighboring State they must be put out, and then his voice was for giving them the victory.

While these speeches were making, while this party of Democrats was holding at the summary arrest of men whose sole hope and effort are to help the enemy, while they were vociferously applauded by the rebel sympathizers and sympathizers, far away at Gettysburg, and Vicksburg, and Port Hudson the air was thick with rebel smoke, the ground was soaked with heroic blood; charge upon charge was making; advancing and receding in wrest and agony. The rebel masses against heroic rebel assaults stood the strong lines of men who live by their own labor and respect the rights of other men, dashing on them with all the arguments the world has struck at law, order, humanity, and the country. It was the day, the moment, of glorious death, of sharp agony for the loss of thousands of our brothers—of inestimable woe to the hearts and homes of the bereaved—and in all this crisis of life and dying, pervish, partisan haranguing, in all this contempt heaped upon the Government of the United States and the men of the country, by the Seymours, Seymour and Company, there was not a solitary word of sympathy, of cheer, of faith, of hope, or of gratitude for the brave men who were fighting. Not one word spoken at the Academy would have brought solace to any wounded soldier lying in his trenches before Port Hudson or Vicksburg; and no one would have soothed with friendly recognition the fallen hero of Gettysburg.

By their works and their words ye shall know them. These are the moaning party hacks who affect to be alone anxious for the security of the rights of citizens, invaded, as they insist, by the Government, but who see no danger to those rights, so far as appears, in their speeches, in the hideous and perjured hands of Davis and his confederates. These orators forget the soldiers who are dying for the right to speak freely, in their eager haste to howl over the wrongs of a man summarily arrested for giving aid and comfort to the enemies. Thank Heaven that the Fourth of July, 1863, disgraced by the speeches of men who call themselves Democrats, has been neutralized by the heroism of those who prove themselves Democrats, or the true friends of human equality and a just government, by defending with all the force in which the talkers sit to surrender. Between the deadly earnest of a soldier and the noisy subordination of party law to the public safety and the national salvation, and the false mask of Democracy which, in its thirst for power, is willing that the Union should perish rather than slavery should be touched, the people of this country will decide, and decide forever.

"HALL, KING THAT" WOULD "BE!"

THE record of the present Governor of New York is plain. It is not useless nor untimely to recall it, for whenever he speaks what he says must be interpreted by the light of what he has uniformly professed. When the rebellion menaced the country, Mr. Seymour declared that the rebels had been provoked, that the constitution began its war against the Government and the constitutional authority of the President in full silent. When the leagth he spoke, it was to say that "If it is true that slavery must be abolished to save this Union, then the people of the South should be allowed to withdraw themselves from that Government which can not give them the protection guaranteed by its terms." The difference is between slavery and the Union, says Horatio Seymour, let the Union slide!

Nominated for Governor by the consent of Fernando Wood, Mr. Seymour spoke again. His speech was an elaborate assault upon the principles of human liberty, upon the Government established to extend and confirm it, and upon the war waged by that Government against the traitor effort of slavery to overthrow the Union. It was a speech heartily applauded by the rebel journals, and entirely in the interest of the rebellion. But admonished by shrewder friends that, although the non-voting of the soldiers and the public discontent with the slow progress of the war, were facts most favorable to his election, yet that the State of New York was still as sound as ever upon the great question of Union and Liberty, Mr. Seymour spoke once more in Brooklyn. This time he said that the war must continue, but constitutionally. His halting, languid, protesting expression of interest in the mortal peril of the country, while every man knew his sympathies, could not be forgotten by the historian of these times.

Mr. Seymour was elected Governor, and sent a message to the Legislature. We do not speak of one loyal citizen, was the hand of one faithful soldier lowered or unnerved by it. It was full of the same bitter denunciation of the Government, the same sneering at the freemen of the North for not representing in all things their rights as citizens and their dignity as men, and of the same monstrous misstatement of history as all his other speeches. His first official act was to summon for trial the Police Commissioners whom Fernando Wood hated. His second was to pass complacently at a Legislature which Fernando Wood's men were trying to dissolve in anarchy, and politely decline to keep the peace.

The shrewd men stepped in again and warned this aspiring gentleman that the road to the White House did not lie in that direction. Thereupon the proceedings against the Commissioners disappeared from sight. Order grew in the Legislature; and Mr. Seymour, for the present, lost his musings. The Governor was thenceforward not conspicuous until the last days of May. Then he promptly sent off troops, and took measures to organize a force at home in the State, which is an imperative necessity. And finally, last week, he was absent every other meeting at which he was announced to speak, since his election, he made a speech in New York upon the 4th inst. of July.

This speech is in two parts. In the first he says that, if we had compromised with the rebels before they took up arms, there would have been no war. In the second he says that military necessity is a plea which every people urge as well as a government, and therefore his "Republican friends" had better take care how they set the example. To these points he adds a remark that no such compromise could have prevented the war, and that none was possible or honorable; and that the second proposition is plainly stated because every function and power of a lawful government may be simulated and assumed by a mob.

These are the sentiments and speeches, and this, during the mortal struggle of the country for its existence, is the career of a gentleman who proposes, if possible, to be the next President of the United States. In the novel of "Ten Thousand a Year" there is a smooth humbug whose name is, upon the whole, the best thing in the book. But when that name is mentioned it carries no impression of weighty reasons, steady, consistent statesmanship, honest conviction, ability, or generosity. It suggests merely a bland plausibility, a low cunning, a smiling selfishness, a something to be steadily avoided, or to be trusted at your peril. In the same, in its gentle reader will remember, is Sidney Smith.

MESSRS. CONWAY AND MASON.

ALTHOUGH Mr. Conway made a great mistake in representing himself as an agent to Mr. Fugitive Slave Bill Mason, who is notorious as the rebel emissary to England—and although his deception was almost peculiar to himself, for certainly it is not the view of any considerable number of persons in this country—and although, in short, he has done the cause harm, as indirect friendship always does, yet he has done it no more than the English people a signal service by showing that the rebel agent will not agree to emancipation as the condition of separation and peace.

Mr. Conway, as every man in England will see, asked Mr. Mason a plain question, and Mr. Mason evaded a clear answer. His evasion was diplomatic and skilful, but it was none the less an evasion, and an evasion is an indirect answer. He declined to answer the question first, upon the ground that he did not know Mr. Conway's credentials; and second, because he had no choice to, and because the Northern States will never be in a condition to ask the question. Possibly that may be so. And his conversation was not a condition to ask the question, and asked it. He needed no credentials to authorize him to ask; nor did Mr. Mason need to see them in order to answer. Before entering upon any kind of treaty it would have been right to require that credentials. But the question implied and answered by the correspondence to the British mind is—knowing very well that Messrs. Conway and Mason were negotiators—whether, to secure independence and peace, the rebels will consent to emancipation. Mr. Mason's evasive reply is, distinctly, No.

Ingenuous John Bull may smile at the ardent and sincere young man measuring a force by the older, craftier hand. But the craft that shows to battle can not conceal the wound. The ardent adventurer has made himself the dealt a mortal blow. He has revealed the truth, that slavery is dearer to the rebels, whom England befriends, than their independence or peace, and he has thereby unmasked the character and purpose of the rebellion.

FROM A DIARY.

WE sat at the Club the other evening, discussing people, as clubmen sometimes do. Bores drew by.

"There goes a man who prefers to crawl to the tally to waiting on his wife," exclaimed X——, earnestly.

"That's a strong statement," said Y——.

"It is a true statement," said X——, emphatically; "and I will tell you why it is true. In the early days, before Sumter, when the rebellion was hatching, there was a private meeting of certain gentlemen in this city, some of whom were afterward conspicuous as the Democratic Copperhead Committee, and others of whom are now and always have been the most faithful and energetic supporters of the country and the Government. The meeting was held at a house upon the Avenue; and when it was clear that all were present that K——, whom you just now pass, rose and spoke of the condition of the country, and of the evident determination of the Southern leaders to go to extremity. This, he said, must be avoided. But it could be prevented in one way only, and that was by accepting at once the Montgomery Constitution, and according to every demand those leaders had made or might still make. He proposed a total, unqualified, abject surrender in advance of all national and individual honor that the Government should be overthrown without an effort to save it, and the country ruined by the deliberate craven cowardice, treachery, and meanness of leading citizens. So entirely unconscious and shameless was this speech was never made to decent men as this Dr. greasy pet fool, and after hearing him sat down. After a little time ——— spoke, and absolutely supported B——'s proposition. Then ——— got on his feet. He said that in a manner he protested against the suggestion, which was so unqualifiedly ignoble and commonly that it was incredible it should be seriously meant. As long as the Union man can do what every other people in history, however wretched, has done, and at least vote with his ballot for our own losing, our own Government, and the rights and privileges of which it is the protection, so long we can resolve that the system of popular government shall not be proved by our conduct to villainous and imbecile as its enemies declare it to be impracticable. We can make one stand, however short, against single anarchy. We can, in the Southern field, try a fall with them. To conquer at such abject treachery is definitely to relinquish and surrender. He spoke very earnestly, and very eloquently. ——— rose after him, and said that peace was the object. We must have peace at all hazards and costs. Fine sentiment was very well, but hard-headed men understood that country. Every boy knew that the Southern leaders would whip us and do just what they pleased, and we had better make a merit of necessity. ——— spoke from his pocket, as he had a large roll of paper filled with the South. Then ——— stood up. "I have a million friends in the North," he said, "and I will fight them as long as peace is honorable. I am for finding a method of fair understanding, if it can be found, and if we have been taken up arms; if they send this Government and insist that the Union is forever dissolved, and that we, and every other dollar I own in the world, to maintain the Government of the United States." The utter hatefulness of treason was the thing to be met, and not being dissolved; and having discovered that many of the most important and influential men present were in full progress to lie in the need to receive terms from a deadly foe when they had even tried to resist, the formation of the Committee, which was afterward spurned at Delmonico's, was proposed. Mr. Bryant ——— said [illegible] beg the history of the war, and he will take good care that he, and all such men, shall see their names as pitifully printed for our contempt as our fathers saw that of the name of Benedict Arnold was printed for us. The men who fixed the meaning of this will have, whether they whatever maske, the enemies of the Union, of the country, and of society and free government, as they will have known privately saw as history will make them publicly known hereafter."

I died yesterday at ———'s, and Treadwell was one of the company. Now if Treadwell makes a man happy, and grants him not only nothing of the spirit, but forbids him also the appearance of a grievance, he does seem an excess of unkindness not to make him in the best sense of the word "Treadwell." The unfortunate vulgar-looking man is his misfortune. That he dresses like a bar-keeper at a flash dog-fight is another of his misfortune also. That he is certainly what Miss I——h calls "a wo'ful crying-looking man" is the one point about him which he knows to every body. He is not another well-known fact. He is rich. He is not clever: he is not well-bred: he is not well-educated: he is not handsome: but he is also rich. Now certainly it is pleasanter to be rich than poor. What other consideration could have persuaded Mrs. Treadwell to marry him? She, too, was an heiress. Her fond was something "wo'ful" —upon the outside at least.

She began to talk to me about the "gentlemen" from the South who are supposed to miss from society. I told her that I had seen a great many people from that part of the country, but that I had yet to meet with a gentleman. I have met plenty of persons who dressed well, and spoke in a low voice, and knew Byron; I have encountered women very prettily, and talked horses, and dogs, and boats with other men, but I had not seen the gentlemen.

"Why, how funny!" said she, "we used to meet so many every summer at Newport."

"I know them," answered I.

"And yet you say you never met any gentlemen from the South."

"I do."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean that those men knew that women were inhumanly whipped in order that they might dance and flirt in Newport and elsewhere; and they did not protest, but insisted that it was necessary and right. Now, Mrs. Treadwell, I do not think women-whipers, either personally or by proxy, can possibly be gentlemen."

"Dear me," said Mrs. Treadwell, "what an awful Abolitionist you are!"

"I suppose I am, dear Madame, and I suppose it's confoundful thing to be, artificially, I should be an Abolitionist than a gentleman who whips women."

At this point Treadwell spoke from the other side of the table.

"Are you talking of gentlemen? Well, let me tell you a story. Some of the London Punch fellows were bragging that you had to wear a dress-coat, etc., but dressed as I am when I go in the opera box. They were invited to the door and sent me back, saying that, to get in there, a man must be dressed like a gentleman. So I went home and changed my clothes. But when I returned the imperious fellow at the door was just going to turn me away again; but I shook my coat-skirts at him, and he was in the midst of saying again that to get in a man must be dressed like a gentleman when he let me pass. Now that is remarkable that people, whose business it is to be on the look out, like the gentleman whose name I forget, —"

"Perhaps they do," ejaculated X——.

There was a moment's pause, and then simultaneously every body turned and began to chatter with his neighbor.

THE LOCOMOTIVE AND THE COG.

THE men who made the Constitution of the United States were fresh from the experience of war and its consequences. The President of the Convention was also the commander-in-chief of the army. He and his companions knew the dangers, the difficulties, the risks of all action based upon what is called "public necessity" and "public safety." They knew that the most summary action was often essential. Washington had himself recommended its exercise upon various occasions during the war.

In making a Constitution of Government for the new nation these men had to deal with the question of supreme, irresponsible power. What did they do? They surrounded the exercise of that fearful power with the most solemn security; and with the same common-sense and clear perception which led them to do that, with equal solemnity, they authorized, in case of supreme necessity, the most summary deprivation of personal liberty. The protection which they gave to the personal liberty of every citizen, as a rule and in time of tranquillity, they just as distinctly and explicitly removed from him in time of public danger. The words they used were these: "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it."

There stands the provision. It is simple, clear, indisputable. It vests in the Government of the country authority to deprive citizens of personal liberty, and refuse them the benefit of the writ. It makes the Government the judge of the public necessity; and it declares the public safety to be the ground and limit of that necessity. Now, if this power as done this would have deprived arch which, in times of war, are essential to the public welfare of all conditioned men. If the Framers would have seen assumptions of arbitrary power, to be justified only by the evident necessity of the case. But doing this, the framers of the Constitution still guarded a necessity with which their experiences of war and knowledge of human nature had already acquainted them. They coupled with the exercise of the fundamental law itself whatever temporary power its cessation might require. They provided that it might be necessary to preserve the law itself from destruction.

And yet, to adopt a plain provision of the Constitution, established by Washington, Madison, Hamilton, Rufus King, Sherman, Benjamin Franklin, the Morrises, Pinckneys, and Rutledges, to throw the disapproval of Mr. Horatio Seymour, who informs us in his speech on the 4th of July that the exercise of public necessity is "the most treasonable, and revolutionary."

But a clear choice we must make a choice. On one side we have the Constitution and its framers. On the other Mr. Horatio Seymour. When this Mr. George Bancroft, Mr. Everett, Mr. Peter Cooper Stuyvesant Committee, which had no faith in railroads: "Mr. Stephenson, it is all very well to talk about your rails and your locomotives; but we set ten and fifteen miles an hour, but suppose your engine meets a cow on the rails, how then, Mr. Stephenson?" "Why, then, gentlemen, the Grand Yorkshire dialect, responded, simply: "Wall, gentlemen, it will be varra bad for the cow."

MRS. KEMBLE'S "JOURNAL IN GEORGIA."

THE simplicity, directness, and pathos of the remarkable book of Mrs. Kemble, now published by Mr. Bentley, will make it one of the most touching and valuable aids of the good cause. There is nothing strained or extravagant in it. It is the plain story of the most hideous form of society that has existed any where in a nominal Christian land. The tragedy of a fellow-being in the most human rights of a majority of the population were utterly despised saddened the mind and sobered the heart of one of the most brilliant women of her national effects. No man and no woman who wishes to understand the character and necessity of the war can read this book of Mrs. Kemble's without. Those who, under an infamous cry of peace, are trying to excuse the Government from the hands of men who repudiate and loathe the fundamental doctrine of our Government, will deeply shame of their treachery when they look at the workings of a society which such men control. Those, too, who hideously call themselves "Democrats," and who are ready to make the Christmas cry appeals to excite the most ignorant of our population against the most unfortunate, and whose unfortunate condition is rendered so by the selfish oligarchy and aristocracy in the land, will try to answer the plain statements of Mrs. Kemble's witness by shouting that niggers were made for slaves. But every loyal, honorable American citizen, as he lays down Mrs. Kemble's book, must close reasoning with pain his share of tacit assent to this iniquity hitherto, will see, as he sees that God is just, that there is no power in the universe that can offer except the peace of death which comes by the universal domination of this system, or the peace of life which comes by the total extinction.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WHEN is a lady's neck not a neck?—When it's a little bare.

"Will you have it rare or well done?" said an Englishman to a Yankee who was dining with him at a coffee-house. "I love it well done ever since I ran in the country," replied Jon, "for I was run enough we used to eat it [rinsed]."

An officer in the French army, lying, left a widow, who had made a vow never to remarry unless to a person acknowledged. Her lawyer, annoyed by her pertinacity in applying for the hand of every one she met, said to her, "Why not not apply to the King? He will grant your petition; he is the father of his people." "Monsieur," replied she, "the King and shower her claims. While he was constantly receiving her petitions, he would say to her, 'Why do you make that noise?' he inquired. 'Sire,' said the widow, 'they call that noise my tongue.' 'Then I was right to call it to turn the air.' The King, pleased with her wit, granted her request.

The second Duke of Buckingham, talking to Sir Robert Viner, in a melancholy mood, about his own personal extravagance, "I know," said Sir Robert, "that you are in a jaggar at last—the most terrible thing in the world." "Why, Sir Robert," said the Duke, "you are in the right; there is another thing more terrible, which you have reason to dread, and that is that you will live a beggar, as the rate you go on."

An Irishman, who had blistered his fingers by endeavoring to draw on a pair of new boots, exclaimed, "I believe I shall never get them on until I wear them a day or two."

HOW HE KEPT HIS WORD.

"TOO much drinking has caused me pain;
I'll never look at a glass again."
He kept his word and never died,
And yet he never lived to drink.
"How could he do it?" Only think:
Why, he shut his eyes when he took a drink.

A declamatory council, who despised all technicalities, and tried to storm the court of the East India Company by the force of eloquence, was once uttering these words. "In the book of nature, my lords, it is written"—when he was stopped by the question from the Chief Justice (Lord Ellenborough), "Will you have the goodness to mention the page, Sir, if you please?"

A traveler, among other narrations of wonders of foreign parts, declared he knew a cave a mile long. The company, with one exception, said it was evident how he was prepared to swallow it, even should it have been a rogue tale. "Pray, sir," said the exception, "how do you get them out?" "Why, a hurricane," replied the traveler.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM'S father was full of anecdote of that veritable politician, Andrew Fox, and loved to tell how some one, praising the conjugal peace enjoyed by a gentleman, said, "I have been told that you had had even a longer moment with his wife for more than thirty years, appealed to Andrew Fox, who replied, with a significant nod, "Ay, ay, sir, that's the very truth; they call me the 'Yes' man."

"Why is the ruddier of a steamboat like a public pleasman?—Because it has a stern duty to perform.

An old gentleman, who was always boasting how folks used to work in his young days, one day challenged his two sons to prove that it was not so. "Why, father," said he, "the challenge was accepted, the boys were driven to the field, and the old man was left alone. He sat down and had his own way cruelly, calling out. "More rail, more rail," and struggling to keep up with the work. Suddenly he heard a prolonged hoop, it began first to roll, then to slide, and finally to fall. "Why, father, you said the rail was to roll, and what are you doing down here?" cried the boys. "I came down after rail," answered the old man, stoutly.

AT a dinner near Grantham, where London porter was on sale, the landlord was a big specie of Britannia in a reclining posture as if greatly fatigued. Underneath in the bill was the following inscription: "Here I am, waiting for you."

"I hope to live to see the day," said Lord Brougham, "when every peasant in England can understand Newton's principia." "Wouldn't it be better that they had a little brown flint?" inquired Sheridan.

A runaway thief having applied to a blacksmith for work, the latter, suspecting his business instead, and asked if he understood such kind of work. "Why, yes, Sir," said the other, "I guess I've had a hand in 'em often."

MR. Partington, when she heard the minister say there was to be a fair in the new church, observed that "she knew well who the party was."

If you wish to offer your hand to a lady, choose your opportunity. The best time to do it is when she is getting out of an omnibus.

A new member rose to make his first speech, and, in his embarrassment, began with his head. "Well, then, sir," exclaimed Sheridan, "he has got something in his head, at all events."

How many horses are required to "draw a conparison?"

When "pride has a fall," is it from the "height of stupidity?"

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE FALL OF VICKSBURG.

The following dispatch has been received:

UNITED STATES MILITARY TELEGRAPH, }
WASHINGTON, July 4, 1863. }

Hon. Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy:

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that Vicksburg has surrendered to the United States forces on this 4th of July.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. D. PORTER,
Acting Rear-Admiral.

ITS UNCONDITIONAL SURRENDER.

A Signals, Artillery, Infantry, Cavalry, Navy, July 7, 1863.

The glorious deed has just arrived here from Vicksburg. The letter is dated the morning after the fall.

The correspondence announces that General Pemberton sent a flag of truce, and desired to know on what terms he could effect to surrender if his men were allowed to march out.

General Grant replied that he would have replied that he should leave except as prisoners of war.

General Grant then had an interview in consultation with his commanders, unconditionally surrendered.

The news is perfectly authentic.

THE BATTLES OF GETTYSBURG.

The following is General Meade's official report:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, }
NEAR GETTYSBURG, July 5—12 P.M. }

Major-General Halleck, General-in-Chief:

The enemy opened at one o'clock P.M. from about one hundred and fifty guns, and immediately commenced a general engagement, continuing without intermission for about three hours, at the expiration of which time the enemy made an assault upon our lines, being upon both occasions handsomely repulsed with severe loss. The assault was made in our main centre by three strong columns of infantry.

The first was led by Brigadier-General Armistead and many colonels and officers of lesser rank.

The second was led by Major-General Pickett and a large number of wounded in our hands.

The loss upon our side has been considerable. Major-General Hancock and Brigadier-General Gibbon were wounded.

After the repelling of the assault, indications leading to the belief that the enemy might be withdrawing, an armed reconnaissance was pushed forward from the left, and the enemy found in full force.

At the present hour all is quiet.

My cavalry fought a successful all day on both flanks of the enemy, harassing and vigorously attacking him with great success, and considerably delaying the contraband upon their numbers, both of cavalry and infantry.

The army is in fine spirits.

GEORGE G. MEADE,
Major-General Commanding.

THANKS TO THE ARMY.

GENERAL ORDERS—NO. 68

HEAD-QUARTERS, ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, }
IN CAMP GETTYSBURG, July 6, 1863. }

The Commanding General, in behalf of the country, thanks the army for the glorious victories won by it in the recent operations. Our enemy, superior in numbers, and flushed with the pride of a successful invasion, attempted to overcome or destroy this army. Baffled and defeated, he has now withdrawn from the contest. The privations and fatigues the army has endured, and the heroic courage and gallantry it has displayed, will be matters of history to be ever remembered.

Our task is not yet accomplished, and the Commanding General looks to the army for greater efforts to drive from our soil every vestige of the presence of the invader.

It is right and proper that we should, on suitable occasions, return our grateful thanks to the Almighty Disposer of events, that, in the present struggle for our liberty, he has thought fit to give victory to the cause of the just. By command of

MAJOR-GENERAL MEADE.

S. WILLIAMS, A. A. G.

THE PRESIDENT TO THE COUNTRY.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Saturday, July 11, 1863.

The President announces to the country that news from the Army of the Potomac, up to a late hour of the 3d is sufficient to cover that army with the highest honor, to promise a glorious success, if not already a victory, and to call for the condolence of all for the many gallant fallen; and that for this he expresses his heartfelt gratitude to Almighty God, and not ours, should ever be done, to every where remembered and reverenced with the profoundest humility.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

SINCE THE BATTLE.

There was no fighting on the 4th or 5th. Lee appears to have employed those days in trying toward the Potomac the way of Hagerstown. Meade was collecting his troops for pursuit. The number of prisoners taken by our forces is estimated at over 15,000, and the number of the enemy's army swarm in Maryland and Pennsylvania. Our cavalry upon the flanks of the enemy, and the rebels on the front on the same day General Couch, with his militia, is reported to have come down from Harrisburg to the junction with Meade. Meanwhile General French and other commanders are reported to be destroying the railroads between the Potomac and thieving obstacles in the way of the Rebel hosts. Another later dispatch from Meade is force attacked Lee at Williamsport on 10th, and that a great battle was then in progress.

GENERAL DIX AT WORK.

The reported approach of General Lee upon Richmond has caused the most intense fright in the rebel capital. The Secretary of War, Randolph, has resigned, and the Mayor of Richmond has all issued proclamations calling upon the citizens to arm and defend their homes. They are reminded of the fate of New Orleans, and cautioned not to allow their city to fall into the hands of "woman Butler." The appearance of General Dix's forces on the Peninsula has been thoroughly severed the communications, and a universal turn-out of the citizens was the consequence.

THE SIEGE OF FORT HUDSON.

A New Orleans letter of the 30th ult. says that "matters at Port Hudson remain unchanged, except in strength and energy. The grand point of the rebel stronghold, the 'Citadel,' is being fortified with immense earth-works. They are reminded of the fate of New Orleans, and cautioned not to allow their city to fall into the hands of 'woman Butler.' The appearance of General Dix's forces on the Peninsula has thoroughly severed the communications, and a universal turn-out of the citizens was the consequence.

REPORTED ATTEMPT TO SMOOTHAIR.

The Herald has the following: News of an important character reaches us from sources beyond all question as to the truth of the statement. On the 4th of July, one of the rebel government, Alexander H. Stephens, and Mr. Campbell were sent by Jefferson Davis to Washington to used the rebel gun-boat Drayon on Saturday, under a flag of truce, and requested permission from the authorities to proceed to Washington, in order to present in person an important communication to President Abraham Lincoln. Admiral Lee at once dispatched to Washington for instructions, but the message was unnecessary half an 6th, and it was decided that permission should not be granted to them to proceed to the city of Washington, whatever it was, to Washington. Admiral Lee was instructed to inform them of the decision, and that any further communication would suffice for the transmission of any message they might have in mind to Mr. Lincoln. Meantime the rebel gun-boat had steamed up the James River, while awaiting the reply from Washington.

RUMORED DISAFFECTION IN NORTH CAROLINA.

The probability of the return of North Carolina to the Union is foreshadowed in the following dispatch of the 8th, which says: "Reliable information has been received here that a movement has been made in the Union to an event which, may be daily expected. A disaffection toward the Confederate Government has been widespread, exists in the State, and overtures have been made to General Foster which will shortly lead to important results."

ENGLAND.

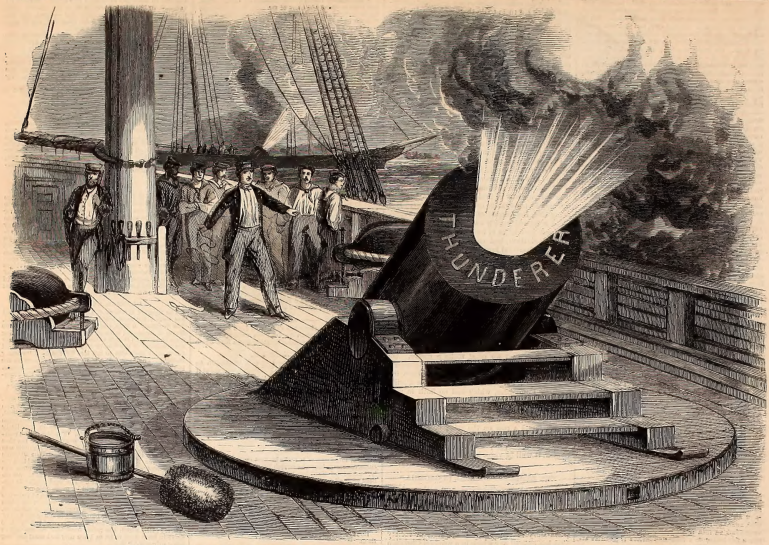
THE AMERICAN QUESTION.

The report that a proposition was submitted by France to unite with her for joint intervention was officially denied by Earl Russell, in the House of Commons, on Friday, and a motion for the recognition of the Southern Confederacy. A report says that Lord Palmerston will succeed the Duke of Newcastle as arbitrator in the American war.

ALABAMA.

The case of the pirate Alabama was tried in the Court of Queen's Bench, London, involving against the owners a charge of breach of the foreign enlistment act. A great many witnesses were examined for the prosecution. An engagement of the Alabama with the Kearsarge is known about Captain Bullock and the persons who were concerned in equipping the vessel were represented by Captain Semmes. Sir Hugh Cairns, for the defense, said that the law of foreign enlistment was passed in 1819, at the instance of a foreign Minister or the originators of a foreign State. The Attorney-General replied that the Government was informed by the United States. The Court adjourned till the 3d day and questions still as quiz-petitioners with rebel privacy.

FRANCE.



THE POLISH QUESTION.

An interview has lately been accorded by Napoleon to Mr. Bidell, the United Commissioner to Paris, and he induced the belief in some quarters that the Emperor was about to take some decisive action in the Polish question, with a view to mediation between the American belligerents. This is contradicted by the Paris correspondent of the fact that Messrs. Roebuck and Lindsay, of the English Parliament, had also had an audience of his Majesty in France, they being active sympathizers with that cause.

RUSSIA.

THE POLISH QUESTION.

The notes of the Three Powers were presented to Prince Gortschakoff on the 25th of June, and the Russian reply was ultimately accepted. The French government is decreasing its artillery by about 100 guns. In Austria, both houses of the Reichsrath have by a large majority in favor of Poland. The Poles have gained an important victory, capturing six guns.

SONG.

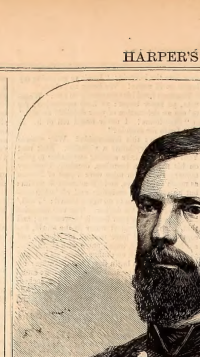
I'm lost to joy; I'm lost to love;
I'm lost to all would make me faiñ:
I lost my way in the light of day—
God send that I find it soon again!

I'm lost to peace; I'm lost to ease;
I'm lost to all would make me blest:
I lost my way in the light of day,
And I'm weary now, and long to rest.

I'm lost to gladness and to mirth;
I'm lost to all that's good to find:
I lost my way in the light of day,
And left the good things all behind.

I wander West, I wander East,
And know not which is East or West:
I lost my way in the light of day,
And I seek it still, and never rest.

The sun went down an hour ago:
I wonder if I face toward home?
If I lost my way in the light of day,
How shall I find it now night has come?



THE LATE GEN. REYNOLDS.

WE publish herewith a portrait of the late GENERAL REYNOLDS, who was killed at Gettysburg on 2d inst., from a photograph by M'Clees, of Philadelphia.

General John Fulton Reynolds was born in Pennsylvania in 1821, entered West Point in 1837, graduated in 1841, and entered the Third Artillery. In 1846 he became First Lieutenant, and served in the Mexican war in that capacity. For gallant conduct at Monterey he was brevetted Captain, and for Buena Vista he was brevetted Major. After the war he became one of General Wool's aids.

At the outbreak of the rebellion he was appointed Lieutenant-Colonel of the Fourteenth Infantry. He was afterward, on 20th August, 1861, appointed Brigadier General of the First Brigade of Philadelphia Reserves. This and the other brigades of Pennsylvania Reserves constituting M'Call's Division, were, on the movement of the Army of the Potomac, in March, 1862, placed under General M'Dowell; but after the battle of Fair Oaks were detached and sent to General M'Clellan. They took part in the Seven Days' Battles; and when M'Call was wounded and taken to Richmond, Reynolds assumed the command of the division until he also was taken prisoner. On his release, which occurred simultaneously with the first invasion of Maryland by Lee, he was again appointed to the command of the Pennsylvania Militia; and after the battle of Antietam received a letter of thanks from the Governor for his zealous conduct. He was then appointed to the command of the First Army Corps, which he led at the battle of Fredericksburg. His corps bore the brunt of that terrible battle, and lost 3000 men. In January, 1863, he was appointed Major-General, and was confirmed in March. At the Chancellorsville fight he was not directly engaged, but made several false attacks with skill and success. On 31th June he was ordered to take the left wing of the army to the Potomac, which he accomplished with remarkable celerity: the march, considering the heat of the weather, is one of the most rapid on record.

The last of Hooker's army crossed the Potomac on the 26th of June, and pushed on to overtake the enemy. After a number of cavalry skirmishes the First Corps was advancing upon the enemy, and, without really expecting a battle, were marching steadily through the town of Gettysburg when they were attacked. At this time it was only possible to bring the infantry into action.

THE LATE MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN F. REYNOLDS.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY M'CLEES, OF PHILADELPHIA.]

Finding that he could not place his artillery in any good position so as to be made available, General Reynolds, with his staff and escort, went to the front in search of a knoll or eminence where he could favorably plant his pieces. While he was thus engaged he and his party were saluted with a shower of bullets, which made his horse restive and unmanageable. This exposed him to the unerring aim of the sharp-shooters, and a rifle-bullet struck him in the neck, severing the vertebræ, and causing his instant death. When he fell General Doubleday took charge of the forces until General Howard came up with the Eleventh corps, when the former resigned the chief command to the latter.

Thus died General Reynolds on the soil of his native State, which at the time of his death he was defending.

VERY HARD CASH.

CHAPTER XVIII.

CHRONOLOGY.

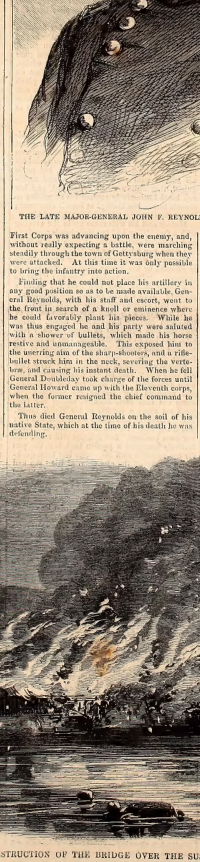
The Hard Cash sailed from Canton months before the boat-race at Henley recorded in Chapter I.; but it landed in Barkington a fortnight after the last home event I recorded in its true series. Chapter IX.

Now this fortnight, as it happens, was fruitful of incidents; and must be dealt with at once. After that, "Love" and "Cash," the converging branches of this story, will flow together in one stream.

Alfred Hardie kept faith with Mrs. Dodd, and, by an effort she appreciated, forbore to express his love for Julia except by the pen. He took in Lloyd's shipping news, and got it down by rail in hopes there would be something about the Argent: then he could call at Albion Villa; Mrs. Dodd had given him that loop-hole: meantime he kept hoping for an invitation: which never came.

Julia was now comparatively happy: and so indeed was Alfred: but then the male of our species likes to be superlatively happy, not comparatively; and that Mrs. Dodd forgot, or perhaps had not observed.

One day Sampson was at Albion Villa, and Alfred knew it. Now, though it was a point of honor with poor Alfred not to hang about after Julia until her father's return, he had a perfect right to lay in wait for Sampson, and hear something about her; and he was so deep in love that even a word at second hand from her lips was a drop of dew to his heart.



So he strolled up toward the Villa. He had nearly reached it, when a woman ran past him making the most extraordinary sounds; I can only describe it as screaming under her breath. Though he only saw her back he recognized Mrs. Maxley. One back differeth from another, whatever you may have been told to the contrary in novels and plays. He called to her: she took no notice and darted wildly into the gate of Albion Villa. Alfred's curiosity was excited, and he ventured to put his head over the gate. But Mrs. Maxley had disappeared.

Alfred had half a mind to go in and inquire if any thing was the matter; it would be a good excuse.

While he hesitated, the dining-room window was thrown violently up, and Sampson looked out: "Hy! Hardie! my good fellow! for Heaven's sake a fly! and a fast one!"

It was plain something very serious had occurred: so Alfred flew toward the nearest fly-stand. On the way, he fell in with a chance fly drawn up at a public house; he jumped on the box and drove rapidly toward Albion Villa. Sampson was hobbling to meet him—he had sprained his ankle, or would not have asked for a conveyance—to save time he got up beside Alfred, and told him to drive hard to Little Friar Street. On the way he explained hurriedly: Mrs. Maxley had burst in on him at Albion Villa to say her husband was dying in torment: and indeed the symptoms she gave were alarming, and, if correct, looked very like lock-jaw: but her description had been cut short by a severe attack, which choked her and turned her speechless and motionless, and white to the very lips:

"Oho," sis I, 'Brist-pang!' And at such a time, ye know. But these women are as unreasonable as th' are unreasonable. Now Angina pictoris, or brist-pang, is not curable through the lungs, nor the stomic, nor the liver, nor the stays, not the sauce-pan, as the bunglitinkeringdox of the schools pretind; but only through that mighty mainspring the Brain: and instid of going meandering to the Brain round by the stomick, and so giving the wumman lots o' time to die first, which is the scholastic practice, I went at the Brain direct, took a puff o' chloroffin, put m' arm round her neck, laid her back in a chair—she didn't struggle, for, when this disorder gits ye, ye can't exercise hand nor foot—and had my lady into the land of Nod in half a minute; thin off t' her husband; so here's th' Healer between two stools—spare the whip-cord, spoil the knacker—it would be a good joke if I was to lose both pashtins for want of a little sheepcuity, wouldn't it?—Lash the lazy ragabin! —Not that I care: what interest have I in their lives? they never pay: but ye see custom's second nature; an d'Eve formed a vile habit; I've got to be a Healer among the killers: an d'a Triton among—the millers: here we are at last, Hiven be praised." And he hopped into the house fearful that most people can't do a good errand. Alfred flung the reins to a cad, and followed him.

The room was nearly full of terrified neighbors: Sampson shouldered them all roughly out of his way: "Now, on a bed, lay Dodo's gaunt figure in agony.

His body was drawn up by the middle into an arch, and nothing touched the bed but the head and the heels: the toes were turned back in the most extraordinary contortion, and the teeth set by the rigor of the convulsion; and in the man's white face and fixed eyes were the horror and anxiety, that so often show themselves when the body feels itself in the grips of Death.

Mr. Osmond the surgeon was there: he had applied a succession of hot cloths to the pit of the stomach, and was trying to get laudanum down the throat; but the clenched teeth were impassable.

He now looked up and said politely: "Ah! Dr. Sampson, I am glad to see you. As the seizure is of a cataleptic nature, I apprehend. The treatment hitherto has been not epithems to the abdomen, but—"

Here Sampson, who had examined the patient keenly and paid no more attention to Osmond than to a fly buzzing, interrupted him as succeeding to the abdomen, but—"

"Poisoned," said he, philosophically.

"Poisoned!" screamed the people.

"Poisoned!" cried Mr. Osmond, in whose little list of recognized maladies poison had no place. "Is there any one you have reason to suspect?"

"I don't suspect, nor conjiect, Sir: I know. The man is poisoned; the substance strychnine; now stand out of the way you raping gabies, and let me work by myself, Oxford"; you are a man; get behind and hold both his arms, for your life." That's you."

He winded off his coat laid hold of Osmond's epithems, chucked them across the room, saying, "You might just as well squirt rosewater at a house on fire;" drenched his handkerchief with chloroform, sprang upon the patient like a mountain cat, and chloroformed him with all his might.

Attacked so skillfully and resolutely, Maxley resisted little for so strong a man: in a few moment poison within fought virulently: as a proof, the chloroform had to be renewed three times before physician could have any fingers in the patient yielded to the fumes, and became insensible.

Then the arched body subsided, and the rigid muscles relaxed and turned supple. Sampson kneaded the man like dough, by way of sustenment.

"It is really very extraordinary," said Osmond.

"Mai—dearr—Sirr—nothing's extraordinary t' a man that knows the reason of every thing."

He then inquired if any one in the room had noticed at what intervals of time the pains came on.

"I am sorry to say it is continuous," said Osmond.

"Mai—dearr—Sirr—nothing on airth is continuous: every thing has paroxysms and remissions—from a toothache t' a cancer."

He repeated his query in various forms, till at last a little girl piped out: "I 'ave, Sampson."

Sir, the throes do come about every ten minutes, for I was a looking at the clock; I carries for her his dinner at twelve."

"If you please, ma'am, there's half a guinea for you for not bein such a n' iljit as the rest of the world, especially the Dockers." And he jerked her half a sovereign.

A suspect fell on the assembly. They awoke from it to examine the coin, and see if it was real; or only yellow air.

Maxley came to, and gave a sigh of relief. When he had been sensible, yet out of pain, nearly eight hours by the clock, he had been chloroformed him again. "I'll puzzle ye, my friend strych," said he. "How will ye get your perriched jaws open when the pain comes back ye like? The Dox say y' act direct on the spinal marrow. Well, there's the spinal marrow where you found it last now. Act on it again, and I'll give ye leave—if ye can. Ye can't; bekase ye must pass through the Brain to get there: and I occupy the Brain with a sentry-box and a sentry, and mean to keep y' out of it till your power or to kill ourselves, been a lyin'-down."

With this his spirits mounted, and he indulged in a harmless and favorite fiction: he feigned the company were all students and he their students, Osmond included, and he the lecturer: "Now, gentlemen, I am told," "observe the great Theory of the Perriodecity and Remittency—for all diseases; in conjunckshin with its practice. All diseases have paroxysms, and remissions which occur at intervals; sometimes it's a year, sometimes a day, an hour, ten minutes: but whatever the interval, they are true to it—they keep time. Only when the Disease is retirin, the remissions become longer, the paroxysms return at a greater interval; and just the reverse when the pashent is to die. This, jintlemen, is man's life from the womb to the grave: the throes that precede his birth are remittent like every thing else, but come at diminished intervals when he has really made up his mind to be born (his first mistake, jints, but not his last); and the paroxysms of his mortal disease come at shorter intervals when he is really goin off the hooks: but still chronometrically; just as watches keep time whether they go fast or slow. Now jintlemen, isn't this a beautiful Theory?"

"Oh mercy! Oh good people help me! Oh Jesus Christ have pity on me!" And the sufferer's body was bent like a bow, and his eyes filled with horror, and his toes pointed at his chin.

The Doctor hurried himself on the toe: "Come, come, Sir, that's not the way." That's right! He is better already, jintlemen, or he couldn't howl, ye know. Deevil a howl in um before I gave um puff chloreha. Ah! would ye? would ye?"

"Oh! oh! oh! oh! ugh!—ah!"

The Doctor laid off the insensible body, and resumed his lecture calmly, like one who has disposed of a troublesome assistant. "Now you see the n' application of the Theory: if the poison can reduce the tin minutes' interval to five minutes, this pashent will die: and if I can get the tin minutes up t' half an hour, this pashent will live. Any way, jintlemen, we won't detain y' unnecessarily: in case shall be at an end by one o'clock."

On hearing this consolatory stipulation, up went three women's aprons to their eyes.

"Alack! poor James Maxley! his is at his last hour: it is but guns twelve, and a diez to one."

Sampson turned on the weepers: "Who says that, y' jilly? I tell the cure will end at one: a case ends when the pashint gets well, or dies."

"Oh, that is good news for poor Susan Maxley; her man is to be well by one o'clock, Doctor says."

Sampson groaned, and gave in. He was strong, but not strong enough to make the populace suspend an opinion.

Yet it might be done by chloroforming them.

The spasms came at longer intervals and less violent: Maxley got to feel them as a matter of Insensibility, that he asked to have some in his own hand to apply at the first warning of the horrible pains.

Sampson said, "Any fool can complete the cure:" and, by way of practical comment, let them Mr. Osmond have it, and left him understanding that the treatment should not be changed, but no lancets should be given: but, in due course, a stiff tumbler of brandy-and-water; or two. "If he gets drunk, all the better: a little alcoholism weakens the nervous system, if the pain is has endured, and so expedites the cure. Now off we go to th' other."

"Is that a manager?" said Mr. Osmond to himself: "What on earth does the Quack mean?"

The driver, de jure, of the fly, was not quite drunk enough to lose his horse and vehicle without minding them. He was in the kick-out for the robber, and, as Alfred came round the corner full pelt, darted at the reins with a husky remonstrance, and added this to his wife's look-out for an angry explanation—a guinea—and behold the driver sitting behind complacent, and nodding.

Arriving at Albion Villa, Alfred asked Sampson submissively if he might come in and see the patient, lovingly.

"Why of course," said Sampson, not knowing the delicate politics.

"Then ask me in before Mrs. Dodd," murmured Alfred, coaxingly.

"Oy, ay," said the Doctor, knowingly: "it's sec."

Mrs. Maxley was in the dining room: she had got wind of what had been in the wind, and the ladies would not let her go home yet; they feared the worst, and that some one would blurt out to her.

To this anxious trio entered Sampson radiant: "There, ladies, it's all over. Maxley's life needn't cry, he has got lots more mischief to do in the world yet: but, oh, wumman, it is lucky for you that you had not to do with any thing but dox. No more cat and dog for you and him, but for the Chronchimarus Theory: and you may tell my puppy I've got him safe, and sent him a fly like a man, and drove hither skilter: now, if I had got to your house two minutes after the time, I should have found the great secret ere this." He threw up the window. "How you like the air, my dear? receive the applause due from beauty t' ajeelity."

Alfred came in timidly, and was received with a pantyle look, and a contemptuous toss. "Mrs. Dodd; but Julia's face was dyed with blushes, and her eyes sparkled the eloquent praise she was ashamed to speak with her tongue. But such a face as hers scarce needed the help of a voice at such a time. And, indeed, both the lovers' looks were pretty eloquent to a study. How they stole loving glances! but tried to keep them under, and how conscious they were from per minute! and how unconscious they endeavored to look, the intervening seconds! and what wonderful were the commonplace words they thought they were making shutters of! Innocent love has at least this advantage over more practised, that it is unconscious of such awkwardness out of so small a thing. These sweet-hearts were not alone, could not open their hearts, must not, could see too long: so they sat in the same room even on such terms was a taste of heaven.

"Dodo, my Darling," said Mrs. Maxley, "are you sure he is better?"

"He is out of danger, I tell ye."

"But, dear heart, ye don't tell me what he ailed. Ma'am, if you had seen him you would have said he was taken for death."

"Pray what is the complaint?" inquired Mrs. Dodd.

"Oh, didn't I tell ye? poisoned."

This intelligence was conveyed with true scientific calmness, and received with feminine ejaculations of horror. Mrs. Maxley was indignant into the bargain: "Don't ye go giving my house an ill name! We keeps no poison."

Sampson fixed his eyes sternly on her: "Wumman, ye know better: ye keep strychnine: for th' use an delectation of your domistic animal."

"Strychnine! I never heard tell of it. Is that Latin for arsenic?"

"Now isn't this lamentable? Why arsenic is a mittal: strychnine a vigitable. Niist me! Your man was here seeking strychnine to poison a mouse: I told him mice, domistic, mussyous mouse: I told him mice were a part of Nature as much as Maxleys, and life as sweet tit as tim: but he was in a hurry to murder and christen precepts; so I told him to go to the Deevil: 'I will,' sis he, and went t'a dockter. The two assassins were determined to wreak their vengeance on: and then, been the greatest miser in the world, he has got a mouse for his victim, and ate her on the sly, impregnated with strychnine. 'I'll steal a march on t'other miser,' sis he; and that's you: t' his brain flew the strychnine: his brain sint it to his spinal marrow: and we found my lord been like a bow, and his jaw locked, and nowt could do the great secret than any man in England will be this year to live: and saivrs th' assassinating old vagabin right."

"Hoow forgive you, Doctor," said Mrs. Maxley, half mechanically.

"For curin a murderer? Not likely."

Mrs. Maxley, who had shown signs of singular uneasiness during Sampson's explanation, changed color, and in a very peculiar tone she must go home directly.

Mr. Dodd seemed to untie into her feelings, and made her sit down by him, take care to pay the fare and the driver out of her own purse. As the woman got into the fly Sampson gave her a few directions and practical advice.

"Nixt time he has a mind to breakfast on strychnine, you tell me: and I'll put a pinch of arsenic in the sugar-basin, and open him safe as the Bank. But this time he'd have been dead before the Bank, such a slow sjint as arsenic could get a hold on um."

They sat down to luncheon: but neither Alfred nor Julia fed much, except upon sweet stolen looks; and soon the active Sampson dismissed the lovers, and hurried to go round his patients. Alfred could not decline, but made his adieux with regret so tender, and undisguised, that Julia's eyes were filled, and her soft hand instinctively pressed his at parting to console him. She blushed at herself afterward: but at the time she was thinking only of him.

Maxley and his wife came up in the evening with a few things, and put their heads together: and proffered one guinea. "Man and wife be one flesh, you know, Doctor."

"Indeed," said Sampson: a choler was constantly checked by his humor, declined this profuse proposal. "Here's vanity!" said he: "now do you really think you two lives are worth a guinea? Why it's 252 pence! 906 farthings!" The pair attempted to remonstrate, vilely.

At all events he must accept this basket of gudgeons Maxley had brought along. Being poisoned was no part of Maxley's daily routine, and had so unsettled him, that he had got up, and gone fishing to the amazement of the parish.

Sampson inspected the basket: "Why they are only flat." said he, "I was in hopes they were pikes." He accepted the gudgeons, and inquired how Maxley got poisoned. It came out that Mr. Maxley, seeing the bait and set apart a portion of his Welsh rabbit, had "grizzled," and asked what that was for: and being told it was "for the mouse," and to "mind her own business," had grizzled still more, and furtively conveyed a portion back into the pan for her amusement to use. She had been quaking dismally all the afternoon at what she had done; little dreaming that Sampson Maxley would not attack her for an involuntary fault, she now brazened it out and said, "Men didn't ought to have patent medicines unbeknown to their wives. Jem had got no more than he worked for, etc. But, like a woman, she vowed vengeance on the mouse. Sampson Maxley had considered her with the martial correction of reckswinging, if she laid a finger on it.

"My poor Julia! only to what a poor creature do feel as dies poisoned. Let her a be: there's room in my place for her and me."

Next day he met Alfred, and thanked him with warmth, almost with emotion: "There isn't many in Bolton would have done me a good turn, Master Alfred; you be one on em: you comes after the captain in my book now."

Alfred assured him his claims were humble compared with Sampson's.

"No, no," said Maxley, going down to his whipper-in, and making sometimes wise: "Doctor didn't go out of his business—for me: you did."

The same evening, at the same time to a minute a natural death before circumstances occurred to test it. On the morning of that eventful day, which occurred to Alfred no danger, he received a letter from Canada. His wife was out with eggs; so he caught little Rose Sutton, that had been in and out with the epistle for her, and she read it out in a loud and reckless white:

"A—a—noon—ony—mous—ly—ad—dressed—Hardie's a—g—e—d—agueut—d—i—ds, h—o—Honored—dis—Honored—a—bill; and sayed. There—every—thing—was—ex—pen—sives."

"Mercy on us! But it can't be asses, wench: drive your spe-ad into't again."

"A—s—s—e—s. Asses."

"Ah! Go an! go an!"

"Now—Kaither—if—you—leave—a—b—l—l—n—g, shilling—at—Hardie's—after—this—b—l—a—c—ble—ann—your—self—not—me—for—ch—ar—ges—and—I—will—sta—nd—by—you—all—bre—ak—they—go—at—a—d—l—a—t—e—c—distance—first—and—then—at—h—o—m—e—wnconne.—Dear—father"—lawk o' daisy what ails you, Daddy Maxley? You be as white as a Sunday smock. Be you poisoned, again, if you please?"

"Worse than that—worse!" groaned Maxley, trembling all over. "Hush!—hold your tongue! Give me that letter! Have you never tell nobody nothing of what you have been a reading to me, and I'll—I'll—it's only Jem's fun: he is allus running his rigs—that's a good wench now, and I'll give ye a half-penny."

"La, Daddy," said the child, opening her eyes, "I never heeds what I reads." It was up in the spelling. Dear heart, what a fight of long words folks puts in a letter, more than ever drops out of their mouths! which their fingers be longer than their tongues I do suppose."

Maxley thanked the unfortunate interpretatively. "Then we'll say no more about the half-penny."

At this, Rose raised a lamentable cry, and pearly tears gushed forth.

"There, there," said Maxley, deprecatingly; "here's two apples for ye; ye can't get them for less: and a half-penny, or a haporth, is all one to you: but it is a great deals to me. And apples they rot; half-pence don't."

It was now nine o'clock. The Bank did not open till ten; but Maxley went and hung about the door, to be the first applicant.

As he stood there trembling with fear lest the Bank should not open at all, he thought hard: and the result was a double resolution; he would have his money out to the last shilling; and, this done, would butter up his partner with a double tongue. It was not his business to take care of his neighbor's life, but it was his business, if they paid him his money on demand. "So not a word to my missus, nor yet to the town-crier," said he.

Ten o'clock struck, and the Bank shutters remained up. Five minutes more, and the watcher was in agony. Then a commissionaire ran and up came a boy of sixteen, whistling, and took down an shutters with an indifference that amazed him.

"Bless your handsome face;" said Maxley, with a sigh of relief.

He now summoned all his firmness and, having recourse to an art, in which these shrewd rustics are supreme, made his face quite inexpressive, and so walked into the Bank of everyday Maxley—externally; but, within, a volcano ready to burst if there should be the slightest hesitation or pay him like a dog.

"Good-morning, Mr. Maxley," said young Skinner.

"Good-morning, Sir."

"What can we do for you?"

"Oh, I'll step in presently, Sir."

"Well, it's your turn now, if you like."

"How much have you got of mine, if you please, Sir?"

"Your balance? I'll see. Nine hundred and four pounds."

"Well, Sir, then, if you please, I'll draw that."

"It has come!" thought Skinner. "What, going to close your account?" he stammered.

"No," said the other, trembling inwardly, but not moving a facial muscle: "it is only for a day or two, Sir."

"Ah! I see; going to make a purchase. By-the-by, I believe Mr. Hardie means to offer you some property he is buying outside the town: will that suit your book?"

"I dare say it will, Sir."

"Then you will wait till our governor comes in?"

"I have no objection."

"He won't be long. Pine weather for the gardens, Mr. Maxley?"

"Moderate, Sir. I'll take my money, if you please. Counting of it out, that will help pass the time till Master Hardie comes. You han't been at away with it, Sir?"

"What d'ye mean, Sir?"

"Hardies hasn't turned thieves, be they?"

"Are you mad, or intoxicated, Mr. Maxley?"

"Neither, Sir; but I wants my own: and I should have it now: so count out the notes here counter, or I'll cry the town round that there door."

"Henry, score James Maxley's name off the books," said Skinner, with cool dignity. But, when he had said this, he was at his wit's end: there were one hundred and eighty of hard cash in the Bank; nor any thing like it.

CHAPTER XIX.

SKINNER — called "young" because he had once had a father on the premises—was the mole-catcher. The feelings, with which he had gone for some minutes to and fro, had been troubling, were curiously mingled. There was the grim sense of opportunity—a chance for him. Detective feels as he sees the watched one working away unconscious of the eye that is on him; that this was more than looking on for a long habit of obsequious reverence. When A has been looking up to B for thirty years, he can not look down on him all of a sudden; just because he catches him falsifying accounts. Why, man is a cooking animal. Commercial man especially.

And then Richard Hardie overpowered Skinner's sense of respect. The old gentleman in his wax feet two, and always wore a black surtout buttoned high, and a hat with a brim a little broader than the ordinary. Which was enough to be eccentric or slang. He moved down the street touching this hat—while other hats were lifted high to him—a walking column of cash. And when he took off this ebon crown, and sat in the Bank parlor, he gained in appearance more than he lost; for then his whole head was seen, long, calm, majestic: that senatorial front, and furrowed old cheek, overcast and grave, was the little sharp-faced clerk would stand and peep at it utterly puzzled between what he knew and what he eyed: one could be look as that head and face without excusing them; what a lot of money they must have sunk, before they came down to fabricating a balance-sheet!

And by-and-by custom somewhat blunted his sense of the dishonesty: and he began to criticise the thing arithmetically instead of morally: that view once admitted, he was charmed with the ability and subtlety of his dignified sharper: and so the mole-catcher began gradually, but effectually, to be corrupted by the mole. He, who watches a dishonest process and does not stop it, is half-way toward conniving; who connives, is half-way toward abetting.

The next thing was, Skinner felt mortified at his master not trusting him. Was not Noah old and Skinner's character would blow on Hardie after all these years?

This rankled a little, and set him to console himself by admiring his own cleverness in penetrating this great distrustful man. Now of all sentiments envy is the most restless and the surest to peep out: Skinner was no sooner inflated than his bosom, obeying a natural law, sweltered a certain change; slight and occasional, only; but Hardie was a subtle man, and the perilous path he was treading made him wonderfully watchful, suspicious, and sagacious: he said to himself, "What has come to Skinner? I must watch." So he jealously watched his watcher; and soon satisfied himself he suspected something amiss. From that hour Skinner was a doomed man.

It was two o'clock: Hardie had just arrived, and sat in the parlor Cato-like, and cooking.

Skinner was in high spirits; it was owing to his pressure on the Bank that the Board had been broken some hours ago by Maxley; so now, while concluding his work, he was enjoying by anticipation his employer's triumph. "He can't hold aloof after this," said Skinner; "he must honor me with his confidence. And I will deserve it: I do deserve it."

A grave, calm, passionless voice invited him into the parlor.

He descended from his desk and went in, swelling with demure complacency.

He found Mr. Hardie seated garbling his accounts with surpassing dignity. The great man handed him an envelope, and cooked majestic air. A wave of that dignity rolled, and Skinner had mingled with the past.

For know that the envelope contained three things: a check for a month's wages: a character; and a dismissal, very polite, and equally peremptory.

Skinner stood paralyzed: the complacency died out of his face, and rueful wonder came instead: a certain time before he could utter even a word: at last he faltered, "Turn me away, Sir? turn away Noah Skinner! your father would never have said such a thing to his father." Skinner uttered this with true remonstrance in a voice trembling with woe: but gathered courage when he found he had done it, yet lived.

Mr. Hardie evaded his expostulation by a very simple means: he made no reply; but continued his work, dignified as Brutus, inexorable as Minos, and as Guacanagari.

Skinner's anger began to rise. He watched Mr. Hardie in silence, and said to himself, "Curse you! you were born without bowels."

He waited, however, for some sign of relenting; and hoping for it, the more as none came his eyes. But Mr. Hardie was impassive as ice.

Then the little clerk, mortified to the core, as well as wounded, found his voice, and made a little nearer to its incarnate Arithmetic; and said with an excess of obsequiousness: "Why you condescend to give me a reason for turning me away all in a moment, after five-and-thirty years' faithful services?"

"Men of business do not deal in reasons," was the cool reply: "it is enough for you that I give you a different character, and that we part good friends."

"That we do not," replied Skinner, sharply: "if we part together we are friends; but we part enemies, if we do part."

"As you please, Mr. Skinner. I will detain you no longer."

And Mr. Hardie waved him away so grandly that he started and almost ran to the door. When he left the handle, it stood ready to prop its heir. He stood firm; and rage supplied the place of every courage. He returned to the door, and whispered at his master; such a whisper; so loud, so cutting, so full of meaning and menace, as a serpent hissing through a mask.

"But I'll give you a reason a good reason, why you had better not insult me so cruel: and what is more, I'll give you two: and a third, that but for me the Bank must have closed this day at ten o'clock: and, by the way, you may as well have it, not you—and the other is that, if you make as much by me, you are done for. I know too much by me, you are done for. I know too much by me, and the enemy of Sir, I grear dead too much."

At this, Mr. Hardie raised his head from his book and eyed his crouching wrathful assailant full in the face, majestically, as one can fancy a lion rearing his ponderous head, and looking lazily and steadily at a snake that has just hissed in a corner. Each word of Skinner's was a hard blow to him; every fresh sentence his close countenance betrayed his inward suffering.

One thing, however, even he could not master; his blood; it retired from that stoical cheek to the chilled and foreboding heart; and the sudden pallor of the resolute face told Skinner his shafts had gone home: "Come, Sir," said he, affecting to mingle good fellowship with his defiance; "why mumble me off these premises, when you will be bundled off them yourself before the week is out?"

"You insolent scoundrel! Humph. Explain, Mr. Skinner."

"Ah, what, have I warmed your marble up a bit? Yes, I'll explain. The Bank is rotten, and can't last forty-eight hours."

"Oh, indeed! blighted in a day—by the dismissal of Mr. Noah Skinner. Do not repeat that after you've been turned into the streets; or you will be indicted: at present we are confidential: any thing more before you quit the premises, Sir?"

"Yes, Sir, plenty. I'll tell you your own history, past, present, and to come. The road to riches is hard and rugged to the likes of me: but your good Father made it smooth and easy to you, Sir; you had only to take the money of a lot of fools as they came, and keep it themselves; invest it in Consols and Exchequer bills, live on half the profits, put by the rest, and roll in wealth. But that was not good enough for you; you must be Rothschild in a day; so you went into blind speculation, and thing of Mr. Hardie's coming into a will. And now for the last eight months you have been doctoring the ledger." Hardie's cheek paled perceptibly "you have put down our gains in white, our losses in black, and so you keep feeding your pocket-book and emptying our till: one part will soon be ripe, and then you will let it drop, and into the Bankruptcy Court we go. But, when you forget, Jonathan Bankrupt, you're a turnpike way of trade: it is a broad road, but a crooked one: skirt the prison wall, Sir, and lights the burning good."

An agony went across Mr. Hardie's great face; very little more to furrow as he was.

"Not but what you are all right, Sir," resumed his little cut-like tormentor, letting him go a little way, to see how he liked it, and then: "you have cooked the books in time; and Cocker was a fool to you. 'Twill be all down on black and white. Accountants exist to serve: creditors take every thing: dividend, forgotten the pound. Partner, furniture of house and bank, Mrs. Hardie's portrait, and the old coal-scuttle. Bankrupt saves nothing but his honor, and—he shoots himself next week, or has stitched into his old great-coat: hands his new one to the official assignees, like an honest man."

Hardie stuttered between a groan and a moan.

"Now comes the per contra: poor little despised Noah Skinner has kept genuine books while you have been preparing false ones: I took the real figures down every afternoon on loose leaves: and bound 'em: and very curious they will read in Court about Christmas, when I did it for amusement o'nights; I'm so solitary, and so fond of figures: I must try and turn them to profit, for I have a wife and child to old age. Dearee me! how curious that you should go and pick out me of all men to turn into the street with a character, like a broken dog."

Hardie turned his head away; and, in that moment of humiliation and abject fear, drank all the bitterness of moral death.

His machinations were to defy Skinner and return to the straight path, cost what it might. But how could he? His own books were all falsified. And he could not expose Skinner's falsifications by simply adding the contents of his secret hoard to the assets of the Bank; but with this true arithmetical gain he must hastily square his books, except by conjectural and fabricated items, which would be detected, and send him to prison; for who would believe he was lying in figures only to get back to the truth? No: he was entangled irretrievably in his own fraud, and was at the mercy of his servant. He took his line. "Skinner, it was your interest to leave me while the Bank stood: and you would have got a place directly; but since you take umbrage at my dismissing you for your own good, I must humbly submit to your will."

"I am quite ready to stay and serve you, Sir," replied Skinner, in a tone of irony: "I am angry words, think no more of them! It went to my heart to be turned away at the very time you need me most."

"Hypocritical rogue!") thought Hardie. "That is true, Skinner," said he: "I do indeed need a faithful and sympathizing servant, to advise, support, and aid me. Ask yourself whether any man in England needs a confidant more than I do? If it was known that I had covered even by you: but now I am glad you know all, for you have never undervalued your ability as well as your zeal."

Thus Mr. Hardie bowed his pride to flatter Skinner; and soon was by the little fellow's heightened color that this was the way to make him a clerk of wax.

The Banker and his clerk were reconciled. Then the latter proceeded to commit himself by carrying on the culinary process in his own hand. He trembled a little: but complied, and became as accomplice. He, in his turn, should took him into his confidence, and told him every thing it was impossible to hide from him.

"Ah, ah, ah!" said Skinner, "let me tell you what I did for you this morning. Then perhaps you won't wonder at my being so pepper-hot. Maxley suspects: he came here and drew out every shilling. I was all in a perspiration what to do. I was in a regular state of fever."

Skinner then confided to his principal how he had evaded Maxley, and saved the Bank; and how the stratagem seemed so incredible and droll, that they both laughed over it long and loud. And in fact it turned out a first-rate practical jest: cost two lives.

While they were laughing, the young clerk looked in, and said, "Captain Dodd, to speak with you, Sir!"

"Captain Dodd!!!" And all Mr. Hardie's forced merriment died away. "Show him in," trayed his vexation for once. "Did you go and tell him I was here?"

"Yes, Sir: I had no orders; and he said you would be sure to see him."

"Unfortunate! Well, you may show him in when I ring your bell."

The youngster being gone, Mr. Hardie explained to his now ally in a few hurried words the danger that threatened him from Miss Julia Dodd. "And now," said he, "the women have sent her Father to soften his. I shall be told, his girl will die if she can't have my boy: and As if I care who lives or dies."

On this Skinner got up all in a hurry, and offered to go into the office.

"On no account," said Mr. Hardie, sharply. "I shall make my own business with you before I go: for cutting this love-nonsense mighty short. Take your book to the desk, and seem buried in it."

He then touched the bell, and both confederates fell into an attitude: never were a pair so bent over their little accounts: lies, like themselves.

Instead of the heart-broken father their comedy awaited, in came the gallant sailor with a brown cheek reddened by triumph and excitement, and stamped about in a genial jocund voice, "How d'ye do, Sir? It is a long time since I came across your knees." And with this he laid down his hat. Captain Dodd's gave his mechanically, and remained on his guard; but somewhat puzzled. Could shock his cold-hand heartily. "Well, Sir, here I am: just come ashore, and visiting you before my very wife: you see how I think of that?"

"I am highly honored, Sir," said Hardie: then, rather stiffly and incredulously, "and to what may I owe this extraordinary preference? Will you be good enough to state the purport of this visit—briefly—as Mr. Skinner and I are both extremely busy."

"The purport? Why what does one come ashore for, Sir? I have got a lot of money I want to get rid of."

Hardie stared; but was as much on his guard as ever: could not be much more puzzled.

Then David winked at him with simple cunning, took out his knife, undid his shirt, and began to cut the threads which bound the Cash to his flannel.

At this Skinner chuckled round on his stool to look, and knew at once what Hardie missed the unusual pantomime with demure curiosity.

Dodd now removed the oil-skin cover and showed the pocket-book, brought it down with a triumphant smack on the hollow of his hand, and, in the excess of his heart, the joy of his bosom, and the over of his blood—for there were two red spots on his cheek all the time—told him the old gag: "Recommend his voice, and sell with a certain awe: "It's—fourteen—thousand—pounds."

"Fourteen thousand pounds!!!" cried Hardie. Then with sudden and consummate coolness, "Why certainly an established bank like this a desk with such considerable deposits than that. Skinner, why don't you give the captain a chair?"

"No, no!" said Dodd. "I'll heave to till I get this off my mind; but I won't anchor any here, not at present. He then opened the pocket-book and spread the contents out before Mr. Hardie, who ran over the notes and bills, and said the amount was £14,010 12s. 6d.

Dodd asked for a receipt.

"Why it is not usual when there is an account."

Dodd's countenance fell. "Oh, I should not like to part with the money I had a receipt."

"You mistake me," said Hardie, with a smile. "An entry in your Banker's book is a receipt. Wherever you go now in another direction." He then unlocked a desk; took out a banker's receipt; and told Skinner to fill it in. This done he sanded and absorbed it with some other important matter.

Skinner counted the notes and left them with Mr. Hardie: the bills he took to his desk to note them on the margin of the receipt. While he was writing these down in succession and precision, poor Dodd's heart overflowed: "It is my children's fortune, ye see: I don't look on a sovereign of it as mine: it is what made me so particular. It belongs to my little Julia, bless her!—she is a rose-bud if ever there was one—and oh, such a Father as sod fond of her poor Father; but not fonder than he is of her—and to my dear boy Edward; he is the honestest young chap you ever saw: what he says, you may swear to with your eyes shut; but how could they possibly be closed? Looks or good hearts and her children? the best wife and the best mother in England! She has been a true consort to me this many and many a year, and I love her water and shoal, let the wind blow high or low. Here is a Simple Simon vaunting his own flesh and blood: no wonder that little gentleman there is grinning as me: well, grin away, lad! perhaps you haven't got any children. But you have, Sir: and you know how it is with us Fathers; our hearts are so full of the little darlings, out it must come. You understand: how joyful I, feel at saving their fortune from bad sharks and sea sharks, and landing it safe in an honest man's hands, like you, and your Father before you."

Skinner handed him the receipt.

He cast his eye over it. "All right, little gentleman! Now my heart is relieved of such a weight: I feel to have just cleared out a cargo of rocks. Good-by' shake hands! I wish you were as happy as I am. I wish all the world was happy. God bless you! God bless you both!"

And with this burst he was out of the room, and making ardently for Albion Villa.

The Banker and his clerk turned round on their seats and gave one another a long time of silence and amazement.

Was this thing a dream? their faces seemed to ask.

Then Mr. Hardie rested his senatorial head on his hand, and pondered deeply. Skinner too reflected on this new turn of fortune: and the result was that he burst in on his principal's reverie with a joyful shout: The Bank is saved! Hardie's good for another hundred years!"

The Banker started, for Skinner's voice sounded like a pistol-shot in his ear, so high-strung was he with thought.

"Hush! hush!" he said: and pondered again in silence.

At last he turned to Skinner. "You" our course is plain? I tell you it is a complicated web, and you don't comprehend what is best to be done."

"Save the Bank, whatever you do."

"How can I save the Bank with a few thousand pounds I must refund when called on? You look incredulous: I am not surprised, Skinner; but you can not see a yard beyond your nose. Let me think."

After a time he took a sheet of paper, and jotted down "the materials," as he called them; and read a cam out to his accomplice:

"A Bank too far gone to be redeemed: trap; a well. If I throw this money into it, shall relish Dodd, and do myself no good but only my creditors.

"2. Miss Julia Dodd, virtual proprietor of the £14,010 and of the property of a Colonel. The child that marries first usually jockeys the other.

"3. Alfred Hardie, my son, and my creditor: deep in love with No. 2, and at present somewhat alienated from his Father by a money affair: love affair: which bids fair to improve into sound negotiation.

"4. The £14,010 paid to me personally after Banking hours, and not entered on the banking books, nor known, but to you and me.

"Now suppose that I treat the above as a pactional trust? The Bank breaks: the money disappears. Consternation of the Dodds, who, amid enlightened by the public prints, think it has gone into the well.

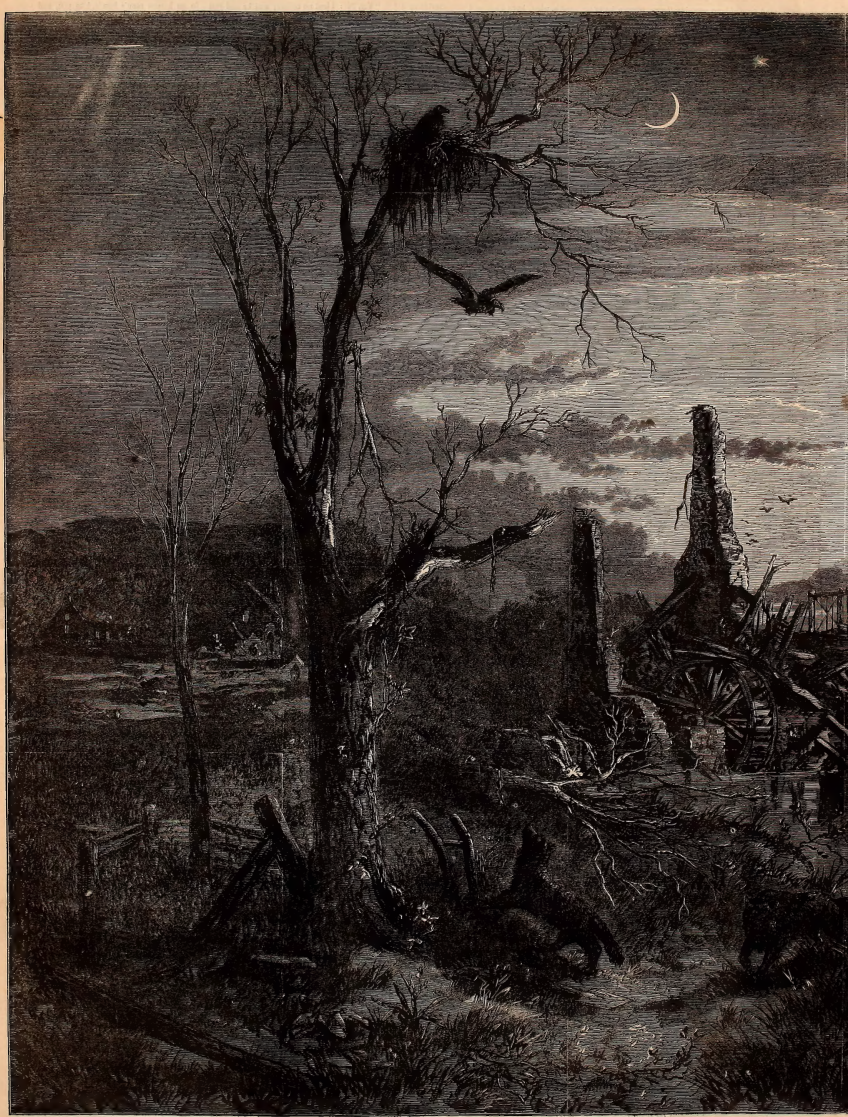
"In this interval I call Alfred over: and promise to produce the £14,000 intact, with my paternal blessing on him and Miss Dodd; provided he will persuade her Father to come to him, and give me a life-interest in half the money settled on him by my wife's father to my most valued and zealous exclusive friend. Alfred will soon bring the young people to reason: and then they will soon melt the old ones."

Skinner was charmed with this masterly little sketch. But he detected one fatal flaw: "You don't say what is to become of me."

"Oh, I haven't thought of that yet."

"But do think of it, Sir! that I may have the pleasure of co-operating. It would serve you and me to be pulling two ways, you know."

"I will not forget you," said Hardie, wincing under the dim but fatal wretch that laid him why and had jerked him by way of reminder. "But surely, Skinner, you can agree with me in this: a life-interest in half of rob this honest captain of his money—for my creditors; curse them! Ah, I have not a shilling of my own! Could he found out that out! Well, I am: and he touched me to the quick: I love my little Jane as dearly as he loves his child, and I have not got a child. You and then he put me in mind of my own Father poor man. That seems strange, doesn't it? Jane and a Father! All I can say is was because they were both honest men. Oh, it was like a whole scene come coming into a dream: and I was born to be again and leaving a whiff behind, was that sailor. He left the savor of Probity and Simplicity behind him, and I left those things themselves away again. Why, why couldn't he leave us what is more wanted here than even his money. He should have left us some of his money Father, whom I used to sneer at, carried to his grave: and Captain Dodd, he is right, he is right in money, in credit, in honor, and eternal hope: oh, Skinner! Skinner! I wish I had never been born."



Skinner was surprised: he was not aware that intelligent men who sin, are subject to fits of remorse: nay, he would be surprised to find the emotion of this iron man, so hard to move, was overpowering when it came: it did not soften, it crushed him.

"Don't talk so, Sir," said the little clerk. "Keep up your heart! Have a drop of something!"

"You are right," said Mr. Hardie, decidedly. "It is idle to talk: we are in the waves of circumstances."

With this, he unlocked a safe that stood against the wall, shocked the £14,000 in, and slammed the iron door sharply; and, as it closed upon the Cash with a clang, the parlor door burst open as if by concert, and David Dodd stood on the threshold, looking terrific. His ruddy color was all gone, and he seemed black and white, with anger and anxiety. And out of this blanch-red, yet lowering face, his eyes glowed like coals, and revel from one to the other of the Clerk and Banker and the clerk.

A thunder-cloud of a man.

THE RESULT OF WAR

—VIRGINIA IN 1862.

MAP SHOWING THE SEAT OF WAR IN PENNSYLVANIA AND MARYLAND.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE INVASION OF THE NORTH.

WE publish on page 461 a picture of the CITY OF HARRISBURG, PENNSYLVANIA, lately threatened by the rebels under Lee, or one of his corps commanders, and now the head-quarters of Major General Couch. It is a pretty city on the east bank of the Susquehanna River, communicating with Reading, Philadelphia, and Baltimore by railway. Usually a very quiet spot, it is now full of troops and bristling with bayonets.

On page 460 we publish a page of Street Scenes at Philadelphia from sketches by our special artist, Mr. Thomas Nast. The following cuttings from the Philadelphia papers may help to explain them:

We need not now blush for Philadelphia. She is steadily at work in the great cause of defense of hearth and home, and each hour sees order rising out of the confusion, and patriotism taking the place of craven imbecility. Business is very generally suspended, and tens of thousands of men are drilling, either for home defense or joining the State militia. The rapidity with which some of the regiments, such as those raised by the Coal trade and the Union League, are completed is extremely gratifying, and makes every other regiment emulous of equal success. There is but little unusual bustle in the streets, though the roll of the drum is constantly heard.

* * * * * * *

THE COAL REGIMENT.

The action of the coal shippers of this city, in reference to the regiment to be raised under their auspices, has been both unanimous and determined. The large amount subscribed in support of this regiment on Monday was nearly trebled yesterday. In the afternoon representatives from the different firms in the trade assembled at the head-quarters of the regiment, in Walnut Street, above Second, and proceeded to Richmond in a body. The foremen of the different wharves were notified to suspend work, and all the men were assembled at one of the central piers, where stirring and patriotic addresses were delivered, urging the necessity of immediate action, and the advantages to be derived by them in enlisting as a body in a regiment where each would know his comrade, and whose welfare would be the immediate care of their employers. The men responded enthusiastically, and six full companies were immediately enlisted.

* * * * * * *

THE UNION LEAGUE.

The brigade now being formed under the auspices of the Union League is progressing finely. There is not the least doubt that the number of men required will be obtained within a day or two. At the different recruiting stations names are being enrolled rapidly, and the general head-quarters at Twelfth and Girard streets were crowded this morning with men anxious to enlist. The four regiments to compose the brigade will be entirely fitted out by the members of the League.

THE MERCHANTS' REGIMENT.

The regiment organized under the auspices of the merchants is full, and was reported for duty at the head-quarters of General Dana yesterday afternoon. The regiment is commanded by Colonel Woodward.

ACTION OF THE COLORED PEOPLE.

A number of the colored men of this city met at the Bethel Church, Sixth Street, above Lombard, yesterday, with regard to their enlisting for the State defense. Mr. J. C. White presided, and Mr. John Wolf acted as Secretary. Among those present were Fred Douglass and most of the colored clergymen of the city. The following were adopted:

Resolved, That inasmuch as we solemnly believe that God has no attributes that can take part with the slaveholder in this rebellion, we hold it to be our highest religious duty to sustain our Government in the prosecution of this war so far as it is conducted for the purpose of equal rights, liberty, equality, and fraternity.

Resolved, That we earnestly request all ministers of the Gospel, preaching to colored congregations, to teach their several charges that the days of our bondage in this land are at an end, and that God is saying to us, in the most emphatic manner, Be free, and take our place on the broad platform of equal rights.

Resolved, That we deeply feel for, and sincerely sympathize with, those of our race who are flying from the chains and slavery of a rebellious horde, and, forced before the march of a conscript army of marauders, have sought a refuge in our midst; and that we hereby pledge to them the protection of our homes and firesides, a part of our personal property, and a share of our daily bread, even to a portion of our last crumb.

It was proposed that the colored men present tender to the Government their services for three months or the emergency. There being no definite understanding as to the terms on which colored men would be received into the State service, the postponement of the consideration of the subject to another meeting was suggested.

Mr. Douglass urged immediate action. He said those present could enroll their names: if their services were not accepted, the responsibility would rest with the authorities. A number of persons then signed the roll. Another meeting is to be held this afternoon.

On page 458 we publish a MAP showing the theatre of the conflict in Southern Pennsylvania and Northern Maryland, and on page 453 a View of the BURNING OF THE BRIDGE AT COLUMBIA, PENNSYLVANIA. This operation is described in the accompanying letter from the author of the sketch:

BURNING OF THE COLUMBIA BRIDGE.

On Sunday, the 29th June, 1863, it was reported that the Confederates were on the turnpike road from York to Columbia (twelve miles), and were four miles from Wrightsville, at the west end of the Columbia Bridge; but as there had been many flying reports no attention was paid to this one, until the citizens of both towns were startled by the firing of musketry and artillery.

The force of the Confederates was about 2000, including horse, foot, and artillery—ours about 1400, composed of infantry and cavalry, without artillery. The rebels showed themselves well acquainted with the country, and instead of attacking our rifle-pits on the front or west, they appeared from the wooded hills on the north and south.

Our men stood their ground well until the six or eight pieces of artillery opened with shot and shell, when they broke and ran for the bridge, which they entered as the infantry of the enemy were endeavoring to intercept them. It was at this point that we lost a number of prisoners, stated by some to be as high as two hundred—but as stragglers have been coming in pretty freely this number is probably exaggerated. When the rush was made to enter the bridge, the gates are said to have been closed to prevent the enemy from following the fugitives to Columbia.

The rebels had stationed guards upon the by-roads, with which they were well acquainted, and it was asserted that an officer who accosted a farmer was recognized by the latter as a person who had passed a night with him some time previously. It is also stated that one of the principal officers of the invading force was the engineer who located the railroad between York and Harrisburg, and who may therefore be presumed to be acquainted with the fordings.

The bridge had been prepared for partial destruction by cutting away most of the supports, removing some of the outside boarding, and sawing through the roof, so as to allow a span or two to drop into the river; while toward the western end a pier was charged with gunpowder with the expectation that it would be blown up and the dependent spans thus dropped. But when the period of destruction arrived, three reports were heard in quick succession, followed by a cloud of smoke, which led us to believe that some of the cannon guarding the entrance at Columbia had been taken to this part of the bridge and fired at the entering rebels. But the pier withstood the explosions, and in a panic the bridge was rashly fired, although defended with some half a dozen cannon at the eastern end.

The artillery firing of the enemy commenced about seven o'clock in the evening, lasting about twenty minutes; by eight o'clock the flames were visible, and spread in both directions, probably at the rate of five minutes to a span, although the arches and frame-work stood burning after the roof and weather-boarding had disappeared.

This bridge was about a mile and a quarter long, built upon good stone-piers, the spans being about 175 or 200 feet in length. Besides two roadways and railways, it had upon the south or down-stream side a double towing-way for the Susquehanna and Tide-water Canal.

Our view is a night sketch from the north, the smoke tending toward the west or Wrightsville end of the bridge, and also northward up the river. The night was calm, the river unruffled, and at its present low stage having various exposed rocks and islets, which present a sombre appearance in contrast with the glare of the conflagration.

The fire did not extend to the towns, except that some lumber at Wrightsville was destroyed; but the fire was prevented from spreading by the Confederates themselves. They might have destroyed a large amount of lumber and a saw-mill to prevent the rebuilding of several bridges they burned the next day, as well as half a dozen iron furnaces between Columbia and Marietta, where the Susquehanna is within half a mile in width. The proprietors expected a bombardment, as our soldiers have destroyed all the Southern iron-works in their reach as contraband of war.

COLUMBIA, PENNSYLVANIA, July 1, 1863. E. J. H.

RALPH HAZLITT, SOLDIER.

"THEN you do not love me?"

"Why should I? You love yourself too well to need any other love."

"You mean because I am not fighting?" The speaker smiled a little, bitterly. "So you think I lack courage, Grace? We will talk no more about love to-day. Of course no woman gives her heart to a man whom she does not think brave enough to die for her, if need were. If you think I hold my life too dear no wonder that you can not trust me."

There was something in his words and his tone that at once puzzled Grace Ashland, and pained her. Perhaps she would have liked him to urge his suit, instead of so quietly withdrawing it. If he could but have explained to her why he, young, strong, professedly patriotic, wore no uniform! She knew in her heart that she longed to think well of him—why would he not help her? But he had silenced her. What could she say more? So she sat there; an unwonted color staining her cheek, and something in her eyes that made Ralph Hazlitt smile, a strange, quiet smile.

He watched her a few moments, then he took a book and began reading. It was Macaulay's "Lays of Ancient Rome." How his cool, gray eyes kindled, what a flush mounted to his swart cheek as he read, what I think no coward could bear to read,

"How well Horatius kept the bridge,
In the brave days of old!"

When he shut the book he looked at his auditor.

"Those were proud days, Grace, and proud men. I think even I could fight with the inspiration of such an example—I mean if I read one of those ballads just at the last, and went in before I had time to get cool. Now you must sing to me. I don't know when I'll have such another lazy morning, and I mean to enjoy it."

A little secret self-reproach made Miss Ashland obedient.

It was always a pretty sight to see her at the piano. She had a certain piquant beauty of her own, though it was a style that not every one recognized. Her features were not classical; her face was pale, always pale, except some strong emotion hung out its pink signal for a moment at her cheeks. The chief charm was in her eyes—dark, large, hazel eyes, that told her secrets against her will—eyes into which you looked and read her soul. They would be sweet when she loved—they were brave and truthful always. When she sang they kindled with a light which glorified her face into something more potent than beauty.

She was in no mood for music at first. She sang for a while with patient compliance just what he called for, then her mood changed, and the spell of her own power enchained her. Her fingers wandered over the keys half unconsciously, and almost forgetting his presence, she sang out her thoughts—fitful snatches of mirth, or pathos, or passion. At last the chords swelled under her fingers to full, rich melody; a strain sultry with tropic heat, burning with such sunshine as gilds the hot sands of the desert. Then across the sun-bright day seemed to sweep the fierce, mighty storm-wind of the East, and through its tempest broke the tones of her voice, chanting an old Bedouin song, such as some wild Arab lover might sing at the feet of his dark-eyed mistress:

"From the desert I come to thee,
On a stallion shod with fire;
And the winds are left behind
In the speed of my desire.
Under thy window I stand,
And the midnight hears my cry:
I love but thee, I love but thee,
With a love that shall not die
Till the sun grows cold,
And the stars are old,
And the leaves of the Judgment
Book unfold!"

Was that the voice of her soul answering Ralph Hazlitt? He would not ask her to-day, but having heard that he cared to hear no more singing. When she struck the last note she turned from the piano. He took her hand and looked into her eyes with a long, sad gaze; a look such as we give to the beloved whom we may never see again. For a moment he held her fingers in a firm clasp. Then he said, very quietly, "Good-by, Grace!" and was gone.

Two days afterward Miss Ashland received this letter:

"When you read these lines, Grace, I shall be far away. I have enlisted. I am going to do my work—the work I have longed for all these months of inaction. I will tell you now why I did not go before. In the six months you have known me have you heard any thing of my family? Do you chance to know that all the near relatives I have on earth are three children? They are at school now, at a sort of child's school, but they come to me every vacation, and I am their sole friend. They were the legacy of my only sister. My parents died many years ago. There were only us two left, Maud and I. When she married I thought it would leave me alone. But she made me go with her to her new home. She never suffered me to have a lonely hour, scarcely to feel for a moment that her heart held any dearer love than the one she had given me from childhood. After her three children were born, just when the youngest had got old enough to lisp her father's name, the husband died; and then I understood how strong a tie had bound her to him. She pined for him, like a homesick child. One day she said to me:

"'I am tired, Ralph, I must go to William. I shall leave you the children. He needs me more than they do, for they have you. He comes to me in my dreams and calls me. You will never let my babies feel that they are orphans.'

"After that she faded, gently and painlessly as a flower fades—an atmosphere of sweetness about her to the last. One night I left her, not weaker than usual, suffering no pain. The next morning I found her with a smile frozen upon her face, token of the soul's joy at its release. She was with William, and the children were mine. They have been mine four years.

"Such and so sacred is the tie which has kept me at home hitherto. If I fell, they would be indeed orphans. Have I been wrong? I do not know. Your words awakened a doubt. I think I ought to have been ready to trust them to God. I am ready now to trust them to Him and to you. You have sent me into the fray; and whatever ties you may form in the future, I know I can trust to your sense of justice that those children shall never want care or love. Of wealth they have enough—for tender watchfulness they can only look to you.

"I have enlisted for three years, or for the war. I leave you free. I would not tell you that I was going, and ask again for your love, lest you might, in a moment of enthusiasm, bind yourself by some pledge which you would regret hereafter. Love where your heart leads you. Be happy. I ask of you but the one thing which I have a right to demand—care for my children—security that they would not be left bankrupt of love and protection by the loss of the life which I offer at your instance—oh how willingly!—to my country. For myself, I may say it now, for if I die I will not leave it unsaid, I love you, as you sang—

"'With a love that shall not die
Till the sun grows cold,
And the stars are old,
And the leaves of the Judgment
Book unfold!'

"If we meet no more till we meet beyond sun and stars, I shall be then, as now, yours, RALPH HAZLITT."

Grace Ashland trembled as she read the letter. What had she been doing? How could those children forgive her for having sent away their only friend? How could she forgive herself? What, if he fell, would ever heal the wound in her heart? for she knew now that she loved him. Well, there was one solace: she could do his will faithfully, wait for him, be true to him. If their next meeting was indeed to be beyond sun and stars, she would be able to go fearlessly to his side and say,

"Here am I and the children you left to my care. Receive your own."

How noble he had been through it all; doing his duty with such silent, brave courage; staying at home for those children's sakes, and never saying one word in self-justification! And she, whom he had honored so with his love, had taunted him with loving himself, his life, his ease. Yet he had forgiven her. He was hers still. She pressed the letter, with wild, unutterable throbs of grief and passionate tenderness, to her heart and lips. She called by a hundred endearing names—oh, if he could have heard them!—her love, her life, her hero!

When he had been gone a week she went to see the children—her soldier's legacy. Two little gentle girls, Maud and Alice, and one brave, sturdy boy, named Ralph for his uncle. Here she found her path already made smooth. Mr. Hazlitt had written to the principal of the school that the children were to be, during his absence, under the guardianship of his particular friend Miss Ashland, who would be guided by her own judgment as to the length of time they would remain there. To the children he had written a long, loving letter, softening as best he could their present loss of him, and bidding them to love, in his stead and for his sake, his friend Miss Ashland, to whom he had confided them.

So she found her welcome ready. She made plans with them for the future. She promised to come and see them as often as their uncle had done, and whenever it was vacation they were to stay with her. The child's school where they were was excellent in its way, but she saw that they would soon need more thorough and systematic instruction. It would be a responsibility she hardly cared to take to remove them and establish them in another place. She thought that, at the end of six months, when their school-year was out, and the long vacation came, she would write to their uncle and solicit his counsel. Till then she would be silent. She longed sometimes to send him just one little line to tell him how wholly she was his; but a maidenly impulse restrained her. He had not asked for any reply to his letter, nor had he renewed in it his prayer for her love. He had seemed to prefer leaving her free. She could not offer her heart to him unasked, even though she knew that she held his own.

Before the six months were over came the news that he was killed. He had fallen, as a soldier should, in the front of the fray: fallen, oh, she well knew how! with courage in his heart, a glow on his cheek, a glint as of sharp steel in his gray eye. If he had only kissed her once in his life, she thought she could have borne it better. Oh, if he could but have known how she had loved him! She would have given half the universe now if she had but followed the dictates of her longing, and written to him that through life and death she was his. But a thought soothed her—a thought so blessed, so foreign to her mood, that it seemed almost like the suggestion of another: perhaps he knew all now. Spirit eyes could see farther than mortla ones. He was in a world where there were no more secrets. She had but to do faithfully the work he had left her, and some day she would go to him.

It was medicine to her pain. She grew strong, as if she had breathed air from the heaven where he was. She bethought herself tenderly of the children. Ought she not to be helping them bear their sorrow?

Their year was nearly out. She went and brought them home. Her love was all they had left. Surely they needed it now. Maud and Alice sorrowed with a still, deep, unchildish grief that it was pitiful to see. Ralph dashed the tears from his eyes and threw back his hair with a gesture so like his uncle that it thrilled Miss Ashland's heart, and vowed that he would grow up to avenge Uncle Ralph—he would be a soldier too.

Two weeks after the news came of Mr. Hazlitt's death Miss Ashland was summoned to an interview with his attorney. She found that he had been to the seat of war on a fruitless search for the body; for the dead man had been to him both friend and client. It had been impossible to identify any grave, he said, except those of some of the officers; for half our dead had been left for the rebels to bury. But he had received only too positive confirmation of the report of Mr. Hazlitt's death; and now he had brought his will, which he had made the last thing before he went away, to read to her, as the one chiefly interested.

"He leaves me the children?"

"Yes, and his fortune. They inherited enough from their parents. He only bequeaths them, in addition, his house and grounds, that they may keep their home-feeling still. He recommends that you establish them there, with some suitable person to oversee the household and look after their welfare, and so have them taught at home for a while. All else, save the homestead and a few trifling legacies, you will perceive he bequeaths to his dear friend, Miss Grace Ashland."

She scarcely heard the last clause of his remarks, her thought was so busy with her plan for the future. She would surely have the children live at his home, and she would live there with them—be sole and faithful guardian of their interests. She would indeed fulfill his trust. No one would oppose her. She was twenty-four, no longer a girl. Her parents had other children to make their home cheery—they would let her, as they always had, follow her own course.

She was roused from her reverie by the lawyer's voice, offering stereotyped congratulations, blended with expressions of sorrow for the dead. Then, at last, she began to realize that he had left her sole mistress of all his possessions; her of whose love for him he had never known. That was the heart she had lost in losing him. Did the earth hold another as true? What was there in the universe that could make up to her for it? Then her soul thrilled again to the thought of the sure future, the love and the life beyond this world. It is not so hard to wait when the end is sure. In the mean time she had her work.

It was July when she heard the news of his death. Early in September she had made all necessary arrangements, and was living with the children—her children now—in the home of Ralph Hazlitt. There was a certain joy, secret, unshared, and yet most sweet, in living where he had lived; using daily the things that he had used. She even chose his old room, and sat there nights, watching through the window, whence she had drawn away the curtain, the clear-shining September stars, and thinking of him who walked in the glory beyond them, and waited for her.

So the weeks passed on. The October winds blew over the hills, and swept the sere leaves before them like flocks of tiny birds, flame-colored and golden. November came—the soft, hazy warmth of the Indian summer, with air of balm, and sunshine floating dreamily down through a dim haze that seemed to bring it nearer. She was growing content with life and its work, though she never for one moment looked upon it as other than a life of waiting.

Once when nightfall came—it was then the late November—she saw the children in their beds, heard their prayers, kissed their red, childish lips, with the dewy softness on them, and then went back into the library, where he had always passed his solitary evenings. A cheery fire burned on the hearth, and a shaded lamp upon the table. The room was bathed in soft light. The curtains were drawn—the easy-chair at the table, where he used to sit, held out its arms for her. She sank into it, and lost herself in a reverie. She recalled the whole of their last interview—every word, every look, every shade of meaning on his face.

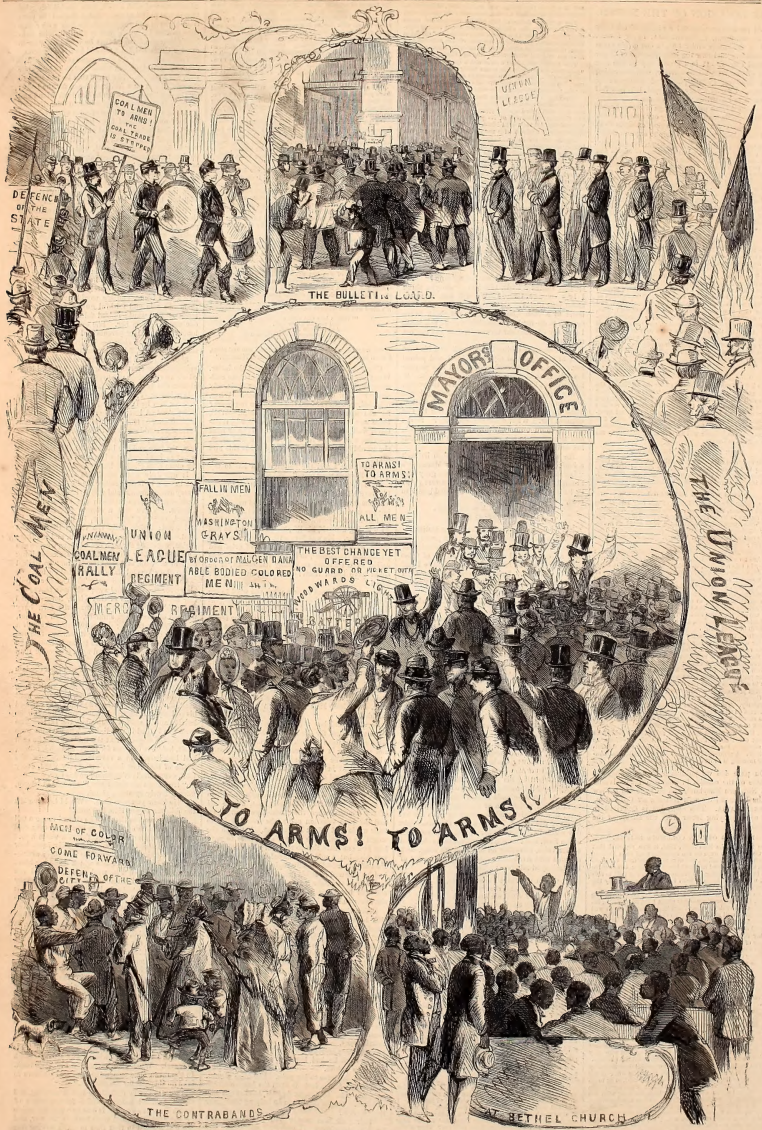
"He knows me better now," she said at length, unconsciously speaking aloud.

"He knew you well then. Would he have left the children to you if he had not?"

What voice was that? She turned to see a tall thin figure standing there; to meet gray eyes, cool and searching no longer, but full of a warmth that made her cheeks crimson. She hardly knew how it was that she was drawn close into those arms—felt those kisses on her lips which made her heart beat with such quick, wild pulses. It did not seem strange to her for a moment. She scarcely remembered that she had believed him dead—it seemed so natural for him to be there and to love her. It was not until he asked, "So you resolved to live here and be the children's guardian yourself?" that she remembered how she came there, as she answered him, "Yes, it was the only way I had of giving you my life."

"You shall learn a better way now."

"You will not go back?"



"Not till I have taught you how to love me," he whispered, with his lips close to her cheek. "When I go next time I shall leave my wife."

"But how came you here?"

He smiled.

"I thought that question would come by-and-by. I was left for dead on the field. A rebel surgeon found me, who had been an old classmate of mine, and who preserved an honest liking for me still. He nursed me back to life, and through his influence I was paroled when I was strong enough to travel. When I am exchanged I must go back. In the mean time remember who said we were to take no thought for the morrow."

Two days after that there was a wedding, and Grace Ashland became in due form mistress of Ralph Hazlitt's home. It was two months before he was exchanged and went back to the war, and she had learned in that time to think having was better than waiting.

THE HOUR AND THE CAUSE.

July 4, 1863.

We're living in a glorious hour! The world scarce ever saw
A clearer right for man to fight for liberty and law.
For liberty such as God gives to nations He has bless'd,
The captive's chains to loosen, and to set free the oppress'd:
Such law as was ordained in heaven by Love's almighty pen,
By angel heralds brought to earth—"Peace, and good-will to men!"
This is the cause we plead to-day, with voice and pen and sword,
Till every foe be vanquished, and the right shall be restored!

When Sumter first was fired upon, where waved our flag on high,
When first Columbia's loyal sons awoke to Freedom's cry;
When calls for peace, for compromise, for justice, were in vain,
Scarce heard in Treason's louder call, "Rend ye the land in twain!"
O! then the hearts of freemen leaped as lightning flashes forth!
Then rushed to arms with one consent the freemen of the North:
"Now by our fathers' deeds," they swore, "and by our fathers' graves,
The work they planned for aye shall last where'er yon banner waves!"

Lo! from among the nations, fronting her foes in wroth,
Columbia stands majestic, to lead her armies forth,
With words of fierce entreaty the dullest soul might stir,
She treads the path of duty, and bids us follow her:
"Shame be to every one," she says, "confusion be his guide,
Who in this hour of tumult fears combat by my side!
Ay, shame to all upon the earth, of high or low degree,
Who league with the oppressor to stifle liberty!"

This day for years our fathers called, each from his lowly grave,
"Say, have ye wrought for freedom?—hold ye in the land no slave?"
And sadder grew each pallid brow, and deeper their distress,
As often as they asked us, and we slowly faltered, "Yes."
But now no more in sadness do our country's dead appear,
For we have wrought for freedom through all this awful year;
And a light shines on their faces to illumine our dull way,
As with eager lips we answer them—"We hold no Slaves to-day!"

Then ring the bells right merrily throughout our Northern land,
Let the booming of the cannon give an echo strange and grand!
Let the notes of freedom's joyous songs bid every true heart thrill,
And the Stars and Stripes we love stream forth from every vale and hill.
Long, long ago we kept it as a day of jubilee,
When no cloud to mar the prospects of the nation could we see.
We spoke of the old war times as of a drama past—
That pleasant time is gone. We know our fathers' deeds at last.

Oh! never more we gaze upon that starry flag o'erhead
But we seem to hear the steps of foes upon Columbia's dead!
And the booming of the cannon breaks not on our ears again
But we think how many rebels our gallant boys have slain!
Old Bunker Hill and Lexington we wonder at no more;
Our watchwords are, "Fort Sumter!" and "Remember Baltimore!"
And where one Warren with his blood crimsoned the grassy sod,
Thousands of loyal men and true have gone his way to God.

Yet, standing by Columbia's side, we're marching boldly on,
Through a dark night of treachery to greet the coming dawn.
In Senate-halls, on every side, stalks Treason stern and grim,
While looking to where Justice stands the road seems long and dim.
But not for that we falter, or seek a vain repose,
Nor hasten from the battle, leaving victory to our foes:
Thank God we are no cowards! we know nor doubts nor fears,
This war for freedom shall be won an't take a hundred years!

Then shall the Union rise again in might and majesty;
Then shall her flag victorious float over land and sea;
Her soil shall be a welcome home for all the world's oppress'd,
And from the former evil her children shall find rest.
Hasten, O Time, the joyful day! Thou, Future, we implore,
Part thy veil for a moment—show us thy good gifts in store!
So shall the phantoms of the past be banished at thy breath:
Give us strength from all our weakness—give us victory from death!

THE FIGHT AT UPPERVILLE.

Mr. Waud has sent us the sketch of this affair, which we reproduce on page 461. The Times correspondent thus describes the fight:

Arriving at Upperville, two squadrons of the First Maine were ordered to charge through the town, which they did in the most gallant manner. The rest of the First Maine and the Fourth New York acted as supports. Just beyond the town considerable force of the enemy was massed. The First Maine, Sixth Ohio, Tenth New York, Second New York, and Fourth Pennsylvania charged upon them furiously. The resistance was greater here than at any other point. Two of our regiments were in the road, and one on each side. They charged and were repulsed; the enemy charged and were likewise repulsed. Several charges were made with like results, until the two forces became jammed in together, and a regular hand-to-hand conflict took place, lasting more than twenty minutes. In the first charge the enemy placed sharp-shooters along the stone-walls at the side of the road, and our troops suffered from their fire. General Kilpatrick also arranged a similar reception for the enemy, and thus the two forces swayed to and fro under a galling cross-fire. The officers and men on both sides fought like fiends, and in the excitement many of the enemy were killed who might have been taken prisoners. General Kilpatrick nearly lost his own life in attempting to save the life of the Colonel of a North Carolina regiment. Finally the enemy yielded, and fell back, hotly pursued by General Kilpatrick's bloody brigade, until the concentrated fire from a battery warned General Gregg that it was time to withdraw his men. The brigade of regulars which had been sent up as a support, much to the amusement of all about, wheeled and hurried out of range. The Harris Light and First Maine marched out of range as slowly and deliberately as if going upon parade. No troops in the world ever stood such a terrible fire more unflinchingly.

From Rector's Cross Roads to Upperville was almost a rout. The enemy turned at bay near Upperville. The Fourth New York charged, with General Kilpatrick at their head, and, breaking, retired, leaving General Kilpatrick a prisoner. The Fourth, however, promptly rallied, charged again, and the General was rescued. The troops, with the single exception noted, all behaved well, as did most of the officers. General Kilpatrick, commanding the centre, was always in the right place, and inspiring the men under him by his dashing example. He led several charges in person, the most dashing of all being the onset west of Upperville. Colonel Gregg, commanding the left, discharged his duties promptly and like a brave man. General Gregg commanding this division, and General Pleasanton, were near the front all day, carefully watching every movement. The former had a horse killed under him by a round shot. The conduct of Colonel Vincent, commanding the infantry, is every where spoken of in the highest terms. Captain Armstrong and Lieutenant Estes, of General Kilpatrick's staff, on two occasions, after delivering an order, led a column against the enemy under a most terrific fire, and excited the admiration of all for their gallant conduct and excellent example.

THE SIEGE OF PORT HUDSON.

We devote pages 449 and 452 to illustrations of the Siege of Port Hudson, from sketches by our special artist Mr. Hamilton, and by a volunteer contributor in the United States Navy.

The picture on page 449 represents the Bombardment of Port Hudson from the deck of the United States steamer Richmond. The author of the sketch writes:

"In the fore-ground our blue-jackets are busy with the 100-pound Parrott rifle. We are about two miles below the rebel batteries, which extend about three miles along the east bank of the river. With this gun we can reach their centre and most formidable works with ease, while with their 10-inch Columbiads they occasionally succeed in dashing the water up about us, few of their shots taking effect among our little fleet."

The other picture by the same artist shows us a mortar schooner in action. The accompanying letter says:

"Port Hudson, June 14, 1863.

"There are six mortar schooners here, and since the 8th of May not a night has passed but what they have made the welkin thunder with their guns. And they have several times been subjected to pretty severe firing from the enemy, but have always come out of the scratch with flying colors.

"On the 10th ult, the rebels tried to drive them and the Essex away from their position. And during the night of the 9th, while the sconce kettles were playing upon the rebel works, they quietly placed into position about eight guns within easy range of the schooners. At daybreak they opened with a vim that was creditable, but no sooner did the brave mortar boys discover their position than they lessened the long range charge of powder which they had been using fully two-thirds, dropping their shells with the nicest precision directly among the flashes from the bushes. This seemed to astonish Secesh, as we have since heard their men remark. We got under way, steaming up quietly, enjoying the exciting scene, and throwing a 100-pound shell from our pet Parrott as often as possible. The rebels shot threw the water up in fine style about our vessels. A few of their rifled shot came whizzing through our rigging. When just above the Essex, we let them have a broadside which knocked the dust about their ears in such a style that they concluded it best to close the action. We rounded to with our guns loaded for a second broadside, but waited in vain for an intimation of the whereabouts of the enemy. The conduct of the mortar schooners on this occasion, as indeed on all others, was deserving of the greatest admiration—they fired with the coolness and precision of ordinary target practice. They had been signalized by the Essex (who exercises a motherly charge over them) to drop down if the firing became too hot—their answer was—they were not of the dropping kind."

Of the third picture, which shows us the scene of the assault on Port Hudson on 14th, the Times correspondent writes:

It was as late as 10 p.m. of Saturday, June 13, that General Augur, who had just returned from the head-quarters of General Banks, told his staff that they were to be in motion at 3 a.m. of the next day. We all immediately hurried off to snatch a few hours' rest, and when I awoke at 3 o'clock I found the General and his staff already at breakfast. In half an hour afterward they were all off to the field, whither I speedily followed them.

Before dawn the most terrific cannonading commenced along our whole line that ever stunned mortal ears. The shells bursting over Port Hudson, mingled with their own firing and that of our fleet, and the dense clouds of our artillery, gave the place the appearance of one vast conflagration just about to burst into flame.

After two hours of this dreadful cannonading there was a comparative lull, and the sharp and continuous rattle of musketry told where the work of death was going on most furiously. This was at the right, where General Grover's division was placed, and under him those gallant and fearless soldiers, Generals Weitzel and Paine.

If Weitzel had the larger share in the work of the 27th, that duty seemed to-day to fall upon the command immediately under General Paine.

The forces of the latter consisted of the Eighth New Hampshire, Capt. Barrett, and the Fourth Wisconsin, under Capt. Moore, who were in advance as skirmishers. Behind these came five companies of the Fourth Massachusetts and the One hundred and Tenth New York, under Capt. Bartlett, followed by four companies of the Third brigade. Closely upon these came the Third brigade, under Col. Gooding, and composed of the Thirty-first Massachusetts, Lieut.-Col. Hopkins; Thirty-eighth Massachusetts, Maj. Richardson; Fifty-third Massachusetts, Col. Kimball; One Hundred and Fifty-sixth New York, Col. Sharpe, and One Hundred and Seventy-fifth New York, Col. Bryan, who was killed. Then the Second brigade, under Col. A. Fearing, and composed of the One Hundred and Thirty-third New York, Col. Currier, and the One Hundred and Seventy-third New York, Maj. Galway; the rest of this brigade being detailed as skirmishers. After the Second came the First brigade, under Col. Ferris, of the Twenty-eighth Connecticut, and composed of the Twenty-eighth Connecticut, the Fourth Massachusetts, Col. Walker, and four companies of the One Hundred and Tenth New York, under Maj. Hamilton. These were all followed up by the necessary numbers of pioneers, and Nimm's Massachusetts battery.

At 3.30 a.m. of Sunday, June 14, the column formed on the Clinton road, and commenced moving. At about 4 a.m. the skirmishers moved right up to the scene of action—Gen. Paine being with them in advancing, and the deadly work commenced—the enemy pouring in upon them the most terrible volleys, and our dauntless men combating their way right up to the enemy's breast-works. For hours the carnage continued furiously—our determined soldiers, in spite of their General being seriously wounded, and in spite of the fearful odds against them of fighting against men snugly screened behind their barriers, keeping up the fight with the most indomitable bravery. It was impossible for any men, under their circumstances, to show more reckless disregard of death.

But Port Hudson was destined not to be carried this time—at that point, at any rate. Owing to the horrible inequalities of the ground, and the impediments which the overwhelming slaughter of our advance had created, the whole column was not able to come up as expected, and late in the afternoon our troops had to be withdrawn. During the intensest part of the struggle, it is only fair to say that Col. Kimball, of the Fifty-third, and Col. Currier, of the One Hundred and Thirty-third New-York, advanced most gallantly with their men to reinforce those in front.

HOSTETTER'S
CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS.

HOSTETTER'S BITTERS.—BEWARE OF ICE-WATER.—The chill given to the circulation by large draughts of simple ice-water is decidedly dangerous—not that the cold and grateful fluid may not be imbibed without peril, if a wholesome medicated stimulant be incorporated with it. In fact, a small wineglass of HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS, taken before or with the ice-water, the whole difficulty will be obviated. This genial preparation is the purest and most healthful tonic which the vegetable kingdom has yet contributed, under the manipulations of science, for the use of man. It converts the refrigerated beverage into an invigorant, and causes it to assimilate healthfully with the fluids of the body. In all the range of medicines there is nothing so sure as a preventive of malarious fevers as HOSTETTER'S BITTERS, nothing that so completely defends the system against the malaria which bears upon its foul winds the seeds of deadly disease. Take HOSTETTER'S BITTER'S with your ice-water, and you are not only safe from the effects of the shock which the unqualified beverage is calculated to produce on the circulation, but forearmed against all the causes of fever.

Surgeon-General Hammond,

By ordering Calomel and destructive minerals from the supply tables, has conferred a blessing on our sick soldiers. Let him not stop here. Let him order the discontinuance of "Bleeding," and the use of BRANDRETH'S PILLS in the place thereof. Then will commence a "new era" in the practice of Medicine, which would then become emphatically

THE HEALING ART.

I have for thirty years taught that no diseased action could be cured by mercury or tartar emetic. That the human body could only be "made whole" by "vegetable food"—animal food being, in fact, condensed vegetables. BRANDRETH'S PILLS should be in every Military Hospital. These Pills cure BILIOUS DIARRHŒA, CHRONIC DIARRHŒA, CHRONIC DYSENTERY, and all Fevers and Affections of the Bowels, sooner and more suely than any medicine in the world. BRANDRETH'S PILLS in these cases should be taken night and morning. Read Directions and get new style

CASE OF ROSCOE K. WATSON.

Dr. B. Brandreth—
New York:

Sir: I was a private in Co. F, 17th regiment, New York Vols. While at Harrison's Landing and on the Rappahannock near Falmouth, I and many of the Company were sick with bilious diarrhœa. The Army Surgeon did not cure us, and I was reduced to skin and bone. Among the Company were quite a number of members who had worked in your Laboratory at Sing Sing. They were not sick, because they used Brandreth's Pills. These men prevailed upon me and others to use the Pills, and we were all cured in from two to five days. After this our boys used Brandreth's Pills for the typhus fever, colds, and rheumatism, and in no case did they fail to restore health.

Out of gratitude to you for my good health, I send you this letter, which, if necessary, the entire Company would sign.

I am, respectfully yours,
ROSCOE K. WATSON,

HUBBARD BRO'S

IMPORTERS OF WATCHES

NEW YORK.

Are the sole consignees in the United States for that unique novelty the

Railway Timekeepers,

WITH HEAVY STERLING SILVER CASES.

ESPECIALLY ADAPTED FOR ARMY SALES.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper of Feb. 21, 1863, says: "HUBBARD'S TIMEKEEPERS are becoming proverbial for their unsurpassed reliability. They are particularly valuable for officers in the army and travelers."

The Artizan and Navy Gazette, of Philadelphia, in its Number of May 9, reviewing this watch, says: "We are pleased to see the importation of the HUBBARD BROS. are meeting the enormous sale that such extraordinary value entitles them to realize in the army. These watches are invention produced by no other House, far exceeding the pretentious claims in point of accuracy and elegance. Having such promptness to their patrons render the House a desirable medium for orders from the army."

The RAILWAY TIMEKEEPER, with HEAVY SOLID STERLING SILVER cases, beautiful white enamel dial, handsome gold hands, with superior regulated movement, warranted to run and keep excellent time! Price per case of half dozen, $75. By mail, $1 00 additional for postage. Should retail readily at from $10 to $50 each. Sold but in quantities of ten dozen.

Magic Time Observers,

THE PERFECTION OF MECHANISM!

BEING A HUNTING OR OPEN FACE, OR LADY'S OR GENTLEMAN'S WATCH COMBINED, WITH FAIRY TELLER.

The N. Y. Illustrated News, in its issue of Jan. 10th, 1863, says: "HUBBARD BROTHERS, No. 208 Broadway, have shown a most pleasing novelty, of which the HUBBARD Bros. of New York, are the sole importers. It is called the MAGIC TIME OBSERVER, and is a Hunting and Open Face Watch combined. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepieces for general and reliable use ever offered. Size within 3 inch, connected with its machinery, its own winding arrangement, and the whole is a perfect timekeeper. The price of this Watch as an ornament of use and beauty, is at or near being the 14 carats point. It has the improved rotary action lever movement, and is warranted a correct timepiece." Prices, superbly engraved, per case of half dozen, $200. Sterling Watches, in same movement, for those proposing to buy at wholesale, $35. If sent by mail add postage 50 cents.

TERMS, CASH IN ADVANCE.

☞ Correspondents in the army advise us of the detention of consignments bearing our address. Instructions proceeding arrive from the navy of cutters, whose avariciousness has been brought down to the minimum of 5 per cent on gold and certain orders. By this ingenuous proceeding they are enabled to secure the profits of many the first retails their customers. We can take no notice as which we have been selling our watches but competition in the way of defrauding projects is the inevitable consequence of such cases to their villainous minds. That our wholesale delivery will now be made by express is all there can be no doubt; meanwhile we must respectfully call the attention of the army to the fact that we supply all the machinations of these adroit rogues. Now that it is no longer safe to send us money by mail, we must request friend in this city to call upon us and make the purchase in person; or if that is impossible, let the money through an acquaintance living beyond the lines. We send watches by mail, and insure a safe delivery to all customers! We are at all times ready to wait upon customers, showing them the most attractive articles. Balm of Thousand Flowers
A PERFUMED BREATH.—What lady or gentleman would remain under the curse of a disagreeable breath, when using the "Balm of a Thousand Flowers" as a denticrice, would not only render it sweet, but leave the teeth white as alabaster? Many persons do not know their breath is bad, and the subject is so delicate, their friends will never mention it. Pour a single drop of the "Balm" on your tooth-brush, and wash the teeth night and morning. A 6fty cent bottle will last a year.
A BEAUTIFUL COMPLEXION may easily be acquired by using the "Balm of a Thousand Flowers." It will remove Tan, Pimples, and Freckles from the face, leaving it of a soft and roseate hue. Wet a towel, pour on two or three drops, and wash the face night and morning.
SHAVING MADE EASY.—Wet your shaving-brush in either warm or cold water, pour on two or three drops of "Balm of a Thousand Flowers," rub the beard well, and it will make a beautiful soft lather, much facilitating the operation of shaving. For sale by druggists generally.

MAJOR-GENERAL ULYSSES S. GRANT ("UNCONDITIONAL SURRENDER" GRANT).—FROM A NEW PHOTOGRAPH JUST RECEIVED FROM VICKSBURG.—[SEE PAGE 478]

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

DEAR SIR,—Cousin Sophy and I went down to Concord ,to other day, both as it was the glorius Fourth, to attend the Dimmykratic meetin. But I guess they make a mistake in numin or it, for there wasn't a single Jackson man to be seen for love nor money.

The feamlest part or the show was when they spoke or the war. Why, Mr. Editor, I declare I begun to think there wasn't no rebellion at all! And they talked about was Lincoln's usurpation, and how he wouldn't let you speak hunne minded through I there they didn't seem very foolish as to express'n or them sentiments. They spoke just as fer or resolutions about the war in the Nawth as pon your hearers bretheren, and no one would have guess'n for Dimmykrats, I there I'd just rite orf the resolutions or'em for you briefly. They say there never was sich a tyrant as Lincoln, and he ought to be a downe trodden people. Why don't they go and live with them Enfuland fokes?

But I will now klose with a poim:

POIM.

RESOLUSHUNS OF THE CONCORD, N. H., "DIM-MOCRASSY" GO RALIED, NOT IN HONOR OV GINEAL JACKSON. DEDIRATED TU HON. FRANKLIN PIERCE, THE HERO OV MEXICO, AND CHAIRMAN OV THE KONVENSHUN.

Resolved,—This nation's goin to ruin—

Old Abram Lincoln's bound to stroud it.

There's sum awfeed mischief brewin,

We Dimmycrats can't by no stand it!

We make a vaow, from this time forth,

Tu stop awl warfare in the North.

Resolved,—That Lincoln's a usurper—

An a tirant—an et cetrar—

He shall not leat us wun step further

Then we've a mind to go—thet's flat!

We luv the Guvernment ov the nation,

But go agin its administration.

Resolved,—This war shood be conducted

Most vigorous, by the laws ov peece.

That nigger thing may be abolished

Whereso ever Southern brethren please,

And wherever a trenchin' shaw is,

He shood be sent to Jeff Davis.

Resolved,—The stones we've thrown in Dixie

Hev brought us tu an orful pass.

We let sum dunder rise too quickly;

We shood hev gone on threwin' grass.

We b'lieve Vallandigham a saint:

Wos tu the man who sez he ain't!

Resolved,—We will rekord the story,

That in this war we've acted wust:

It's true, the Saouth fired on "old glory;"

But didn't we go and hoist it fust?

We might hev missed the war's mischances

If we hed hoisted olive branches!

Therefore we form a resolushun,

Tu make all Lincoln's anders veil—

Tu put his figger in konfushun,

So that our own shall's be avoyded

And fortify our strong position

By fair means—absolootly!

We'll grasp the fiery sorters cross,

And bid sich fokes ez Butler bear it!

We'll kover sour defeat and loss

With treason's garb (noow Davis wears it).

We skorn deceit, detest hypockrasy—a

Make way there fur the Peace Dimmockrassy!

THE DRAFT.

THE attempt to enforce the draft in the city of New York has led to rioting. Men have been killed and houses burned; worst of all, an orphan asylum—a noble monument of private love for the reception of colored orphans—has been ruthlessly destroyed, and children and nurses have lost every thing they had in the world.

The event should cause no surprise. It should have been anticipated. It was not reasonable to expect that the quarrelsome and lawless city—who have never been forced to realize the obligations of citizenship—should at once realize what is thoroughly understood by the people of almost every European town. It will take time to make them understand that every government must have its own protection, enjoy the power of compelling its citizens to perform military service. And it will take still more time, reflection, and information to satisfy them that the Conscription Act passed by the last session of Congress is in reality fair, liberal, and humane; that it is far more generous to the operative class than the corresponding act in Europe, inasmuch as it tenderly guards orphans, widows, and aged parents from being deprived of their natural support, while a substitute can be found for the wealthier class. Every working-man who reflects will readily understand that the draft cause was necessary in order to regulate the price of substitutes so as to prevent speculation in conscripts by the harpies who traded on them carefully in every country; and that men of wealth, whose business affords the blood to scores of people, would have obtained substitutes though this clause had never been enacted. Still it was natural enough that the operative class—especially that of so turbulent a city as this—should misconstrue the act; should imagine themselves aggrieved by the exemption of wealthy men on payment of money; and should attempt to resist the enforcement of laws both slow to form and unquestionably unpleasant in their application. Even if these ideas had not occurred to them spontaneously, the leading organs of the Opposition took care that they should be reminded of their "wrongs." For many days past the newspapers which are said to speak the views of the Democratic leaders have denounced the conscription as unequal, unjust to working-men, tyrannical, and outrageous. The writers of these articles probably knew perfectly well that, in the present circumstances of the nation, the conscription was absolutely necessary, and that, on the whole, our present act was as fair a one as could be devised. But, in their malignant partisanship, they thought of nothing but the opportunity of making political capital against the Government. They sympathized with the working-man in the oppression under which he groaned. They denounced Mr. Lincoln as a reckless and imbecile tyrant. They denounced the war as a needless, fratricidal, and abortive war. And they wondered at the calm with which the operatives of New York submitted to the execution of a law which they declared to be at once intolerable.

Under these circumstances who can wonder at riots breaking out? No man likes to be torn from his home and forced to serve in the ranks. If the individuals sentenced to undergo this fate can persuade themselves that the sentence is unjust, the law unconstitutional, and the authorities arbitrary, who can be surprised at their resistance?

Large cities, too, have their peculiar requirements, and they are not to be governed easily. Every large city has them. In Paris they occur once in every generation, and are called revolutions. In London they occur a little more frequent than they are now; the authorities have learned how to deal with them, and now they are generally suppressed in a day by an overwhelming display of military and constabulary force. Here they are a new thing. The Astor Place riots in 1849 were the only example on record; for the Dead Rabbit riots were suppressed almost before they had broken out. The affair of Monday last bore a closer resemblance to a European than any thing which we have ever had here. The leaders and principal actors in the affair were boys—boarders youths of fifteen to twenty years of age—who were seemingly operating as a mere reserve force, was a body of men—operatives in foundries and factories, blacksmiths, etc.—who did the murdering of policemen, the gutting of houses, the firing of dwellings, etc., after the boys had opened the battle with volleys of stones. In all the events of the kind in Europe, the old men, not young, but married women, who were probably roused to fury by the fear of having their husbands and sons forced into the draft. This kind of mixed crowd, though often goodhumored and apt to be easily managed by a skillful leader, is likewise apt to run into wildest excesses of passion and brutality. The boys and men invariably get drunk at an early stage of the proceedings; the women appear to become equally intoxicated with excitement; and all together commit crimes from which every individual in the crowd would probably shrink if he were sober. Such crowds are so utterly mad that a handful of disciplined troops will scatter them like chaff; and so blood-thirsty that they will not be given an intelligible order whom their fury happens to be directed, or burn a building in which women and children are situated without evidence of cruelty.

There was nothing peculiar to New York, or to the Irish race in this riot of Monday. Precisely similar mobs have been seen in Paris, London, Vienna, Berlin, and Madrid. There was the explosions of the violence element which lies dormant in the heart of every large city. Nor does the affair imply any thing as to the power to have us believe, any such general disapproval of the Conscription law as should lead to its alteration in any important degree. Even were the original cause of the riot, it soon took the more familiar direction of an anti-negro demonstration, and is entitled to be ranked with the revels of ten years or so before the Revolution of 1776, similar in kind to the no-popery riots of Lord George Gordon, in London, and the Corpus Christi riots in Paris and Madrid, in modern. Toward the close of the day, the rage of the mob was exclusively directed against colored people, who had come in the way of executing the Conscription Act than the Pope of Rome.

The question now is—have we a government capable of suppressing such riots? If we have, the demonstration of Monday will, after all, not prove without advantage, as it will teach the dangerous elements in the city what to look for in future. We have not, it is high time that we altered our present system, and established a government which could protect us.

The riots of Monday took advantage of the absence of the bulk of our city militia to commit acts which they would not have attempted had the Seventh and Seventy-first been here. But there are still thousands of able-bodied men in the city who can and ought to bear arms in such a cause as this. Let us see how they will turn out. We have several army officers of experience, who understand the scientific rules of street warfare; we shall see the dispositions they will make.

There are just two principles which should govern the conduct of the authorities. The first is, that the law must be carried out whatever it may cost; for if we give way to the mob there will be an end of law and order in this community, and life and property will henceforth be held at the pleasure of the leaders of the mob. And, secondly, all experience shows that, in dealing with mobs, the most severe methods are the most humane. Mild violence, threatening life and property, and burning orphan asylums, can only be radically cured by grape and canister. All other remedies aggravate and protract the disease.

THE LOUNGER.

THE QUESTION.

THE slaveholders in this country having waged a desperate war against the constitutional government of the people for the sole purpose of perpetuating slavery, and having come to grief, it is now proposed by some excellent jesters that the victorious people of the United States shall agree to perpetuate slavery. Having seen a social and political system plunge up to its necessary development into war—having seen the war destroy the system, and the sovereign people from the field victorious, these witty persons propose that we give the enemy all that they have been fighting for, and consent to the perpetuation of slavery.

But for what purpose? Why should we do it? That the slaveholders may make no more trouble. But did they ever make any before, and did they not make trouble? Oh yes, but they were afraid it would be useless with. And will they be any the less afraid hereafter? And if before they rebelled and showed their true colors, slavery was so meddled with that they thought it safer to secede, what we have seen exactly what slavery is and have repulsed their efforts, are we likely to hold our tongues?

It is not a question of wishing to marry negroes, or having negroes for Presidents and Governors, or liking negroes in the abstract. The question is simply whether the loyal people of this country, after the experience and sacrifices of this war, and the long, bitter disgrace of our latter subservience to the insolent dictation of slaveholders for the purpose of keeping that war going, will now have ever had here. The leaders and principal actors in the affair were boys—boarders youths of fifteen to twenty years of age—who were seemingly operating as a mere reserve force, was a body of men—operatives in foundries and factories, blacksmiths, etc.—who did the murdering of policemen, the gutting of houses, the firing of dwellings, etc., after the boys had opened the battle with volleys of stones. In all the events of the kind in Europe, the old men, not young, but married women, who were probably roused to fury by the fear of having their husbands and sons forced into the draft. This kind of mixed crowd, though often good-humored and apt to be easily managed by a skillful leader, is likewise apt to run into wildest excesses of passion and brutality. The boys and men invariably get drunk at an early stage of the proceedings; the women appear to become equally intoxicated with excitement; and all together commit crimes from which every individual in the crowd would probably shrink if he were sober. Such crowds are so utterly mad that a handful of disciplined troops will scatter them like chaff; and so blood-thirsty that they will not be given an intelligible order whom their fury happens to be directed, or burn a building in which women and children are situated without evidence of cruelty.

There was nothing peculiar to New York, or to the Irish race in this riot of Monday. Precisely similar mobs have been seen in Paris, London, Vienna, Berlin, and Madrid. There was the explosions of the violence element which lies dormant in the heart of every large city. Nor does the affair imply any thing as to the power to have us believe, any such general disapproval of the Conscription law as should lead to its alteration in any important degree. Even were the original cause of the riot, it soon took the more familiar direction of an anti-negro demonstration, and is entitled to be ranked with the revels of ten years or so before the Revolution of 1776, similar in kind to the no-popery riots of Lord George Gordon, in London, and the Corpus Christi riots in Paris and Madrid, in modern. Toward the close of the day, the rage of the mob was exclusively directed against colored people, who had come in the way of executing the Conscription Act than the Pope of Rome.

But there are still thousands of able-bodied men in the city who can and ought to bear arms in such a cause as this. Let us see how they will turn out. We have several army officers of experience, who understand the scientific rules of street warfare; we shall see the dispositions they will make.

There are just two principles which should govern the conduct of the authorities. The first is, that the law must be carried out what-that they had failed; also the news of the retreat of Bragg; also the fall of Vicksburg; also the Union victories in Arkansas. The whole horizon flamed with disaster. By the ghastly light the rebels have already read the words of the avisitant Richmond Inquirer in a new and appalling sense: "Peace will come to us only in one way—by the edge of the sword."

GENERAL BUTLER UPON RECONSTRUCTION.

At the late loyal meeting in Concord, New Hampshire, when the Postmaster-General Blair made a very feeble speech, Major-General Butler made a very wise one. It was a concise and conclusive review of the situation; and throughout remarkable for that trenchant common sense which annihilates sophistry and seizes the heart of the matter; a characteristic which made a Louisiana slaveholder and Unionist, who until a few weeks since was never upon free soil, say that if General Butler had been left in command at New Orleans, Louisiana would already have returned to the Union as a free State—a result which the gentleman considered eminently desirable and desirable. Although a slaveholder and by no means of great faith in the willingness of colored men to fight without the lash, it was clear, he said, that if the Union meant to restore itself, the war meant emancipation. And the views of this gentleman are quite as valuable as those of Mr. Cottman and his two friends, who recently asked the President to restore Louisiana to the Union.

It is refreshing to hear the current expression of the earnest loyalty from rebel States; and General Butler exactly represents them in their views. We extract a few passages from his Concord speech. And, as to "Democracy:"

"If there is a Democrat here—and thousands I doubt not there are—let him I say, I am a Democrat; after the manner sort of those political names that I have had a choice. And when we point to the past for a record—I say to him, in this high constitutional day, that no better Democratic record than mine; and he who claims better, let him show it."

Then as to Slavery:

"And now let me tell you here, as my deliberate judgment, founded on observation and experience, that the question of negro slavery is the source of all the misery of the past as the United States' Bank. That thing is ended. Whatever may be done in the future of this country that thing is ended, and no man except those who go back to pick up that which is behind and leave it behind, will know it more."

Finally, as to settlement:

"First, drive out the military power that now holds the States, to fire hundred thousand men there. Drive out the leaders; send them to Mexico, if you choose, to make a proposition of Louis Napoleon's army; send them any where; get rid of them. Then, if you choose, you can say to them; we have a right to hang them, but many things that are right are not expedient. Send them away; get rid of them; extinguish them so far as the land is concerned. In their place put the loyal men of the south there in peace when they were friends, and can we live with them or without them? And when that is done, and loyal men ask to come into the Union to become partners of this great empire, we can admit them precisely as we have admitted Western States, and as I hope we shall soon do Louisiana. Having got rid of those men who assume to be leaders, we can reconstruct the Union. The work for it, my friends, bear with me or against me, as the case may be in the future, in that only is there hope for the reconstruction of the Union. And when the nation is reconstructed, when its laws are extended over all that great territory again, and instead of having our stimulus diverted and driven now as it is to the question of war, we can bring the whole energy of the public mind and the whole talent of the public statesmen of the country to this question, then will be the time when we shall be rich and safe, in the providence of God, to our satisfaction and to the satisfaction of mankind, and not before. Then is the grand race. Before that time, in my judgment, it is of little consequence to speculate upon the negro question in any shape. Drive out and the rebellion ceases to be the agents of the rebel, and then look after the African. You and I can attend to that question; the rebellion will get rid of the suspicion of baleful corpse; end the rebellion, and get rid of military power; end the rebellion, and get rid of military power; end the rebellion, and become reinstated and established, and then look after the question of the African. (Applause.) Let me be understood—and I think it is fair—it is the best way to use the African now for the purpose of the end of the rebellion. (Applause.) But deal with him not as the end, but as the means; not as the end of the rebellion, but as the means, placed there by God, for the protection of this country in this hour of her peril." (Continued applause.)

GENERAL GRANT.

A FRIEND in St. Louis writes: "Grant is a working man. Years ago he married in St. Louis, resigned his situation in the army, turned farmer, and drove his own team into St. Louis every week. In his recent march (in May) he was three days on foot, with his rations and baggage, leading his team, and was willing to walk until his horses should come up. Such a man must succeed."

MRS. KEMBLE'S JOURNAL.

The admirable London correspondent of Child's Publishers' Circular, in his copious summary of new books, says of Mrs. Kemble's Journal, just published by the Harpers:

"Last, but not least, is 'Journal of a Residence on a Georgia Plantation in 1838-39,' by Frances Anne Kemble—a book which will do more to damage the cause of the South in this country than any thing that has yet appeared. It is the narrative of a truth-loving, kind-hearted English gentlewoman; and without attempting to paint the slavery theme in the dark, it gives a picture drawn of misery, degradation, and cruelty, that one shudders to think that human beings themselves—Christian men and women can for a moment misquote their Bibles to uphold such a devilish institution."

SAUCE FOR THE GOOSE IS SAUCE FOR THE GANDER.

Down to the very day of Lee's defeat the corruption, incompetency, and hopeless imbecility of the Washington authorities were incessantly denounced and denounced. Throughout the Copperheads, who wear a mask of loyalty, took care in advance to hold Washington intermeddling, stupidity, and treachery responsible. Washington influences had spoiled every thing. They had demoralized the army. They had caused the defeat of McClellan on the Peninsula, and of Burnside and Hooker at Fredericksburg. They were the ruin of the cause, and nothing was to be hoped until they were expelled.

The battle of Gettysburg was fought and won. Now if that bugbear, and paralysis, and incarnate blunder, the "Washington authorities," were removable for all the Virginia campaign they are not less responsible for the campaign in Pennsylvania than under their very noses. The disaster is their fault in the one case, the success is their glory in the other. If they are to be the scape-goats of Lincoln's failure, they must likewise be crowned with Meade's triumph.

The truth is that it is idle to hold any man or influence absolutely responsible for the result of a campaign. Certainly no battle has been more splendidly fought, and no success is more vitally due to fought and won at Gettysburg. It has brought to shame the poverty that the further from Washington the nearer the victory. It might have put to shame all of us, of any party, who, for want of successes in the field, have fallen to unlimited abuse of the Administration. Is General Meade any less illustrious than General Grant? Does any body believe that either have been seriously thwarted by the authorities? Yet the authorities have abused just as fiercely as ever down to the 4th of July, and we shall always hear that Washington interference defeated us in Virginia. But if it saved us in Pennsylvania, is it worth while to call it such hard names?

REBEL AFFECTATIONS.

It is said by the Richmond Dispatch that "Vice-President Stephens" was grieved to Washington to inform the Government of his country that if the public property of rebels was not respected the rebels would retaliate. Now, considering that "Vice-President Stephens" is a ringleader of rebels, a ringleader who, and burn defenseless ships upon the high seas, which, in every code, is pure piracy—and considering that the same rebels have announced their intention to hang and cut out delay the officers of certain national regiments because they don't like the color of the soldiers' skin. Is tolerably cool for them to talk of the retaliation to which they will be forced by our cruelty.

But this assumption of dignity and scrupulous regard for the rights of war is part of the game of the rebels and their Northern Copperhead allies. These gentry have been outraged by the press, the private honor, and have plunged their country into civil war for the purpose of securing immunity in their cruel raging of the simplest fundamental laws are peculiarly fond of invoking the Divine name, and of endeavoring to give a religious lustre to the tragical crimes in which they are engaged. But now and then the pious veneer is worn away for a little while, as when that eminently religious personage, Jefferson Davis, whose dignity and gravity enchant John Bull, forgets that his cue is calm superiority, and raves fiercely about performing lessons to Yankees.

When you remember that there never were so firmly persuaded that there could be no higher motive for public or private action than the absurest selfishness, and that they relied entirely upon that the utmost meanness of human nature for success in a bloody and desolating war, waged for the purpose of forcibly oppressing the intelligent and loyal majority, you can appreciate the fervor of their devotion and regards become as ludicrous and contemptible as the object for which they are a cloak is inhuman and loathsome.

COPPERHEAD STATESMANSHIP.

SIMULTANEOUSLY with the news of our successes the Copperhead papers of every hue broke into a cry for "conciliation," and every paper urged the "noble opportunity" of offering terms and making peace forthwith. Last week the conduct of the war, in their language, was indefensible in many cases, leading only to disunion and anarchy; while the rebels were strong, able, desperate, and following up the glorious policy of Washington, Jefferson, and death were all that this nation had to expect from the contest. Every disaster was welcomed with the amiable Copperheads; every weakness paved, as Governor Seymour jeered at the Administration, the taking of Vicksburg, which, he said, "was promised us" for the 4th of July. The ruin of public credit, general prostration, desolation by involving nations in conquering maniacs, as France in Gaul, as of Alexander in Persia—these were the pleasing pictures that gushed profusely from the Copperhead pencil.

A battle was fought and won by the loyal soldiers of the country. Presto! the rebels were most forlorn, abject, and conquered of people, we were at once so superior and invincible that concession and peace compelled us immediately to let the enemy that he was overwhelmingly subdued, that he could not hope to struggle with us, and that therefore, with sentiments of "mutual and unqualified consideration for the bravery of men who tried to defend their good government," and they thought it utterly unable to resist, and for no cause but to establish a gallant nation of gentlemen who had made a chivalrous stand for liberty, we begged them to take command of us in future as they had always had it in the past.

This is the logical and natural counsel of the statesmanship of Vallandigham and his friends. The key of their position, in all they say or do, is the status quo ante bellum; the Democratic party of the free States serving the slaveholding oligarchy of the South, doing the bidding and thankfully receiving the cold pieces of their masters. These gentlemen want last year's strawberries. They want the earth before the deluge. They gravely expect an intelligent, honest, and resolved people, whose eyes have been opened to the fact from which they have barely escaped, to shut their eyes tight again and play that there is nothing there. When those people do shut their eyes and open their mouths, Copperhead statesmanship may give them something to make them wise—but not before.

A STATUE BY JOHN BULL.

THE rebel organ in London announces that a statue of Stonewall Jackson, seven feet high, is to be made, by Foley, and presented to Virginia, to be placed in the capitol at Richmond. The Constitution says that it is to be done in compliance of "distinguished gentlemen"—five of whom are not unknown to us in this country. Sir James Ferguson is a Scotch baronet who ran through the Slave States in the first weeks of the rebellion, and being an extreme Southern sympathizer was delighted to see, as he supposed, that we were undone—a fact upon which he has patiently insisted ever since. Mr. Beresford Hope is the leader of the extreme high school of British tyrants, which would hail Jackson as a human benefactor apparently because he did what he could to destroy the hope of free popular government. Mr. Gregory is the young Irish gentleman who periodically moves in Parliament for the recognition of the rebels. Mr. Lindsay is largely interested in Southern trade; and Mr. J. Spence—the inevitable Mr. Spence—is the Liverpool commercial agent of the rebels.

These gentlemen are sufficient to indicate the character of the statue. The object is not to do lasting for the statue is to secure the British interest, as involved, by prolonging sympathy for the rebellion. Of course it is the sublime character of the great hero which impels them in the advertisement; but, doubtless, as they have long since confound the admiration, the disconsolate widow still continues the business at the old stand.

Who may, however, erect the statue name from the list. Where is Hartington? He, too, has seen the greatness of the new nation; and he has actually done as much as any of the rest to help it on others have. He were the rebel colors in the chief city of the Government the rebels were aiming to destroy, and in the very presence of some of the highest military officers of that Government; and Hartington was called to account by no one of his honorable youth, who burned with the insult offered to his country, he was unrebuked by his host, who warmly approved the flaunting of a foreign flag on his house. Here was a service of daring and sagacity: first, in wearing a rebel badge within the loyal lines; and, second, in flaunting it in such a way that it could be worn there without exposing the person who had chosen it to the chance of receiving the insult and expel the offender. The excellent Hartington should certainly be honorary chairman of the Committee, and why should not Foley be employed to execute another triumph to the rebel cause by securing a subscription from his quondam host?

LITERARY.

"HARPER'S European Guide-Book," by W. Pembroke Fetridge, is an indispensable companion for every American traveling in Europe. It is the only one published in the United States, and the only complete one in the English language. It is truly valuable not only for its general information, but for its minute directions even to the details of time, which are always so stupefying to the traveler.

"Eastman's White Mountain Guide" (F. C. Eastman, Concord, New Hampshire) is issued this year in a complete form. It is a full and accurate hand-book of the various approaches to the White Mountains from New York, and details and pictorially describes the most famous White Mountain hands, with the most ample directions as to routes, tours, excursions, and "sights." It is neatly and conveniently bound in flexible leather.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A SPORTSMAN, not expert than extravagant, was seated with his servant on a rock, consoling themselves under the fatigue and disappointment of a fruitless hunting. "Master says," "Well, Pat, this is expensive work. I've been calculating the cost of these days' shooting, and I find it's—"Faith, your Honor," says Pat, throwing a dash of humor into the responsibility implicit in his tone, "I'm sorry for that, but it's lucky there's no more of them."

A modest-looking young lady coming one day into a store at Salem, Mass., and asking the price of the trousers, she attempted to confuse and put her to the blush by his effrontery. "Why, sir," said she, "I have a brother from school, I suppose, and I think he'll wear about—" "Ah, indeed," replied the shopman, "that's the dog's name!" "Nash, Sir," replied she, "and a saucy dog he was."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

RIOTS IN NEW YORK

A PEACEFUL riot commenced in the city on the morning of Monday, July 13. It was merely a determined opposition against the draft, which had been commenced on Saturday in the Ninth District, and on Monday evening became resumed on Monday morning. A crowd, gradually increasing in numbers, gathered around the office, but the drawing went on until about 60 additional names had been drawn, when the proceedings were made by the mob. The wheel was destroyed, the papers scattered, and the building set on fire. The excitement spread through the city; crowds assembled every where, at first with no apparent common object, but in a short time the police and the soldiers in the city movement appeared to be an indiscriminate attack upon the Government, and upon them who were supposed to be in any way connected with the draft or with the Republican party. Several buildings were sacked and burned. The Tribune office was attacked, and only saved by the vigilance of the police; negroes were hunted down, several were murdered under the most revolting circumstances, the house of Mr. Greeley was sacked, that of the Postmaster burned to the ground; railroad tracks were torn up, and for a time all travel around the city was under control of the mob. Their most dastardly performance was the destruction of the Colored Orphan Asylum, in which some hundreds of children were provided for. The excitement was chiefly borne to the poorer classes. It raged throughout the whole of Monday and Tuesday, and on the latter day the draft was completed in the city. The draft, has developed into a scheme of resistance to the draft, but it is hoped that the disorder may soon cease and that the riot is quelled. It is the policy to suppress by prompt measures, and to this end the conduct of the public authorities. We can only say that the conduct of the police and the troops of the State has been throughout excellent.

THE ENEMY ACROSS THE POTOMAC.

General Couch's command, on Friday July 24, "by cavalry reconnoissance" drove the rebels from Martinsburg, Virginia, and Williamsport, Maryland, and on Saturday, July 25, they had two battle flags, and a large number of small-arms. The enemy were still crossing.

CAPTURE OF PORT HUDSON.

According to accounts, deemed reliable, this stronghold was surrendered to General Banks on the 8th of July,

ATTACK UPON CHARLESTON.

Charleston has been again attacked. The attack commenced on the 10th of July by an assault on Morris Island, which continued for several days. On the 18th to the 19th, the enemy obtained possession of the southern portion of Morris Island. Fort Wagner, Fort Gregg, Battery Wagner, and the battery at Cummings's Point all dug themselves thoroughly entrenched, but the main object of the landing was secure. Three hundred were killed and wounded in the assault. The loss of the enemy is said to be evidently heavy.

GENERAL LEE'S ACCOUNT OF GETTYSBURG.

The following general order or General R. E. Lee to the rebel army, issued from Hagerstown on Sunday, was also published in the hospitals entered the town on Sunday morning:

GENERAL ORDER—No 18.

HEAD QUARTERS, ARMY OF NORTHERN VIRGINIA,
July 14, 1863.

After the long and trying marches, endured with the fortitude that had ever characterized the soldiers of the Army of Northern Virginia, you have penetrated to the country of our enemies, and resisted to the defiance of their own toil those who were engaged in the invasion of ours. You have fought a fierce and sanguinary battle, which, if not attended with the success that has hitherto crowned your efforts, has been such as to cause the enemy to feel the unabated prowess of your arms, and the unconquerable spirit that has animated and sustained you in battle.

Once more you are called upon to meet the enemy from whom you have won on so many fields a name that will never die. Once more the eyes of your countrymen are turned upon you, and again do wives and sisters, fathers and mothers, and helpless children, look for defense on your strong arms and brave hearts. Let every soldier remember that on his courage and fidelity depends all that makes life worth having—the freedom of his country, the honor of his people, and the security of his home. Let each heart grow strong in the remembrance of our precious past, and in the thought of the inestimable blessings that await victory. Let us but realize the importance of the charge Divine which has so signally blessed our former efforts, and with Him to conduct us we cannot fail to meet and overthrow our enemies. Soldiers, your old enemy is before you. We must destroy him now, or he will destroy us. Every worthy of your comrades dead on so many bloody fields.

R. E. LEE, General Commanding.

A CAVALRY FIGHT.

A sharp fight took place on Wednesday morning at five o'clock, near Williamsport, between the cavalry, under Generals Buford and Kilpatrick, and the rebel infantry and cavalry. The fight was severe, and continued for three hours, on both sides. Artillery was used on both sides. Our troops fought splendidly, but were finally driven to Boonsboro inch by inch, which they held to a late hour, and then drove the enemy before them.

REBEL PRISONERS RECEIVED.

Up to Friday night eight thousand four hundred rebel prisoners had reached Baltimore from the battle field of Gettysburg, and one thousand five hundred had been received at Harrisburg—making a total of nine thousand nine hundred.

WHAT WE TOOK AT VICKSBURG.

The papers publish in full the official dispatch of Admiral Porter, announcing the fall of Vicksburg. While admitting that the army under General Grant had the heaviest work to do, he claims a full participation in the victory for the gun-boats. The extent of the siege operations, which extended from the 18th of May to last, that the mortars fired seven thousand mortar shells, and the gun-boats four thousand shells and shot. The second five hundred shots were fired from naval guns on shore, and over 200 rounds were sent to the rebel batteries by our corps. We have taken over twenty-seven thousand prisoners, including the sick and wounded now in hospital, one hundred and two field-pieces, thirty siege guns, fifty thousand stand of small arms, ammunition, forty-six fine stores, and fifty-seven stand of colors. We have secured five hundred rebels, who will be sent home on their swine since the siege began. Among the prisoners are Lieutenant-General Pemberton, Major Generals Forney, Smith, Forney, and Bowen; fourteen Brigadier Generals, and about one hundred and fifty staff officers. There were five thousand sick hundred men in the hospital, half of whom are paroled. The rebel loss in killed was almost exhausted, and for days sanitary had been eating mule flesh. Of the remainder, many are said to be hungry; but for field-guns and musketry they were short.

RETREAT OF BRAGG.

Dispatches from Chattanooga state that the rebel army of General Bragg retreating across the Tennessee River, completely destroyed the Dalton and Chicago Railroad beyond the splendid bridge at Bridgeport in their retreat toward Chattanooga.

STEPHEN'S PEACE MISSION.

The following is the correspondence relating to the mission of Alexander H. Stephens to Washington, in behalf of rebel Governor:

CONFIDENTIAL LETTER FROM GOVERNOR "BOWDEN," TO JAMES RIVER, July 2, 1863

SIR.—At military command, I have the honor of a communication in writing from Jefferson Davis, Commander-in-Chief of the land and naval forces of the Confederate States, to Abraham Lincoln, Commander-in-Chief of the land and naval forces of the United States. Hon. Robert Dold, Confederate States Agent of Exchange, and Hon. Alexander H. Stephens, Vice President of the Confederate States, are charged with the powers, and ordered to proceed to which it relates. Mr. Stephens has left Richmond in company with Hon. James M. Mason, Lieutenant Hunter Davidson, of the Confederate States Navy, and myself, and Hon. Mr. Hunter, Hon. Mr. Gold, myself, and the host's officers and crew.

YOURS, most respectfully,
ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS.

TO S. H. LEE, Admiral, &c.

THE APPLICATION DENIED.

NEW EXECHANGE, July 4, 1863.

Acting Rear-Admiral S. H. Lee, Hampton Roads:

The request of Alexander H. Stephens is inadmissible. Such passports are not issued to civilians as adequate for all needful military communication and intercourse between the United States forces and the rebels.

GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy

MORGAN'S RAID.

The raid of the rebel Morgan into Indiana, which he seems to be now engaged in, is a serious one, but thoroughly around the people of that State out of Ohio to a sense of their danger. The General Government has ordered martial law in Cincinnati, and in Covington and Newport on the Kentucky side. All hostile suspended until further orders, and all citizens are required to organize in accordance with the militia laws of the State, and provide themselves. There is nothing definite as to Morgan's whereabouts, but he is reported to be on the north side of the river around the city of Cincinnati and cross the river between there and Madison, Indiana. In consequence, in obedience to the order of Governor Tod.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND

RECOGNITION OF THE SOUTH.

Mr. Roebuck's motion for formal and immediate of the recognition of the South on the 8th of June. Lord R. Montagu moved the previous question, which was carried. Mr. Gladstone, Chancellor of the Exchequer, opposed the motion. Mr. Roebuck withdrew his motion, and Mr. Bentinck followed the retraction of the Union impossible. Mr. Bright attacked Mr. Gladstone, and rehearsed the former arguments in favor of the North. Sir George Grey, on the part of the Colonies, condemned Mr. Roebuck's embassy to France.

THE ROEBUCK LIE.

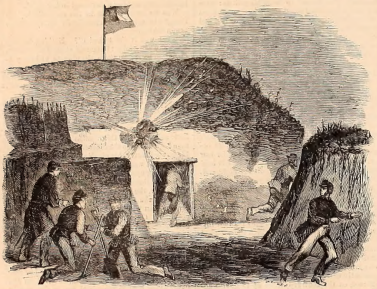
Earl Russell announced in Parliament that Baron Gros had accepted him that he had received no proposal or pending measures to England for mediation in the United States.

MORE BRITISH PIRATES.

From British sources we have the very important intelligence that three powerful iron rams, destined for the service of the rebels, were nearly ready for launching in English ship-yards.

The steamer Gladiator, lately Sumter, would soon leave Liverpool, although detained for the moment by the authorities.

ANGLO-REBEL BANQUET.



A grand banquet to rebels and Anglo-rebel sympathizers was given on board the new steamer Southerner at Liverpool, on Davis's health was toasted after that of Queen Victoria.

THE CHARMER CHARMED.

I.

EMILY M'LEAN stepped from the coach to the piazza of the Ocean House with a sigh. She was tired, and heated, and so depressed. This was her own reasoning to account to herself for the blue feeling that assailed her.

Her veil lifted by the wind as she passed in, and disclosed to the three or four young men who sat three feet away down the piazza a pale face, neither youthful nor old, with pale brown hair and exhausted-looking brown eyes, from which all lustre seemed to have departed. The lips, too, were pale, but the faintest pink to suggest a sometime color.

"Well, that isn't a very brilliant face, I must say," observed one of the three.

"Not one to—"

"To make a cavalier sigh, swear, or pray," remarked another, indifferently.

"I have seen plainer faces than that," wound up the third, thoughtfully.

"Oh, I dare say?" replied the second speaker, smiling; "but you didn't fall in love with it at first sight I presume?" with a pleasant, conclusive air.

"I did, though."

The two listeners wheeled nearer.

"What, you mean it, Alayne?"

"Yes, I mean it."

"All for love, and the world well lost," hummed Lawrence King for comment.

"How did you gild the face? Was it real gold-leaf?" answered Marchmont, knocking ashes out of his meerschaum.

Alayne's honest, sweet eyes looked grave, reproachful.

"What's the use of talking in that style to me, March. I might call it wicked if I chose, for cynical as you are, you know I am not hypocritical or self-deceived. Did you mean to make sport of me?"

Marchmont's sallow cheek tinged with red a moment. A moment more, and he reached over and handed the cigar to Alayne.

"Alayne, you are a faithful dog," he said. The only true, unworldly, simple soul I know. You might have lived in Arcadia. A spade from habit, old fellow, so let us smoke the pipe of peace. We'll not quarrel over the gentleman. I like you better than any woman I know, Robert Alayne. Here, little Queen Mab, King Lawrence—away with you, and see if you can't polish up that wicked flirtation before we have that game of billiards. You were in too much of a hurry yesterday—no eyes or ears for any thing but a hat with a blue feather, and a girl's giggle."

"King Lawrence" rose laughing, lifting his hat to a small stylish in a white morning muslin, wearing on a golden head a hat with a blue feather.

There came a swift smile and a blush into little Queen Mab's face.

"Oh, Mr. Lawrence, have you seen my sister? Have there been any arrivals?" in a breathless way.

Mr. Lawrence looked down with an epris air into the upturned face, and answered all for effect: "There has been an arrival, but I fancy not your sister."

"Oh, but you don't know Em; we are not in the least alike."

Lawrence bit his lip: was this innocence or affectation? Then why did you ask me, if I am not supposed to know your sister, Miss Mabel?" laughing a little.

"I asked you if there had been any arrivals. I forgot at first you didn't know," pouting in a childish way, which must her companions still more.

"And I told you there had been one, and that I could not fancy the lady your sister," impressively, catching this girl's face curiously.

"Why, why?" impatiently.

He bent down a little nearer to the girl face and murmured a soft, notable compliment of comparison, with as reverent an air as if he were approaching a patient saint.

His hearer flushed a tender rose. If Lawrence King had been less overlaid by the false worldly estimate he prided himself upon, he would have known what that blush meant. As it was he did her injustice, as such men will. But a moment again, and he did. It could not have been that Em is lovely."

They walked up and down the piazza, he bending toward her with that air of reverent emotion in which he excelled, and which made his name famous among women as a preux chevalier, and listening with downcast eyes and changing color, or replying with a pretty air of mock assurance.

"Look at Lawrence now, will you?" growled Marchmont. "Was there ever such a hypocrite! That girl thinks he is in earnest. So did Miss Edna Morton last month; and so did Caroline Smythe last night. Look at him! Why don't that little child's rightful guardian, if she's got any, come and carry her off? That's the way these people go on—trusting a girl to such noodles as the Winkles—"

"You don't think King in earnest?"

"Alayne, you are a simple sort of a fellow, but you have an innocent sense. I am sure don't believe Lawrence King's airs, do you?"

Alayne laughed. "Well, I don't."

But here he stopped. A lady wished to pass out. He had somehow, in his talk, swung his chair from its first limit as ample as need be turned the doorway. He rose, bowing and begging "your pardon"—not like Lawrence King, who made even "your pardon" sound a grace, but with a modest reality of concern and a half shy manner. The lady—the very one whose gale face just now called out their comment, the new arrival—bent her head for acknowledgment and smiled. Then a voice said, "Thank you," and she stepped out.

"Em, it is you."

And Maud M'Lean left Lawrence King to run to her sister. Mr. King's face was a study not to, chagrined at his blunder; but Mabel called him, and introduced him with an air that plainly and quite triumphantly said:

"There, you see, you were mistaken. She is lovely."

A fresh toilet and a smile And changed Miss M'Lean. But she wasn't yet a beauty. The strange eyes observing her now did not see any loveliness.

"A delicate person." That was all even Alayne thought, who liked plain women well enough to fall in love with them at first sight.

Mabel stood before the sitting the skirt of her dress as if she feared her escaping, looking as if she would like to hold by the skirt of Mr. King's coat, too, in the style of a child, in which she continually addressed him. But Mr. King had no intention of escaping. He liked the quick appreciating glance. He liked the beautiful peach-bloom blush. He liked the eager, excited manner, because it was all for him: because he knew that he evoked it just as a skilful player evokes new strains and chords upon his instrument.

Farther Alayne and Marchmont observed this triad. They saw at first the utter absorption of the elder in the younger. Her face bloomed, her eyes grew bright, her smile more frequent and sweet. They thought her not so plain after all. But presently they saw a change. The brightness and sweetness, the light and life in some unseen moment had died away. Something in their stead, cold and pale as a snow-wreath had come, and the eyes that just now were tender with expression were chill with hauteur.

Whatever it was, the influence was as subtle as the change. King, five minutes since, basked in sunshine, seeing only the brilliant face that lifted M'Lean blooming for his pleasure, observant only of the sister, as a naturally courteous man would be of any woman, and the blue feather, framing in his picture. Suddenly he felt uncomfortable, distrait. The bright face of Mabel was still bright, still hanging out its sun and warmth. Still she wanted him. What was it then? Suddenly he had forgotten his trick of speech, of smile, his air distingué. A feeling of self-consciousness was stealing over him, a little sense of shame, as if he were making himself cheap. He felt a desire to pull up and begin again to make adieux when a clear voice addressed him in some social form of thanksgiving, and he saw that it was Maud in the tone of reserve as a fine and far steel bell. For the first time he felt the presence of Emily M'Lean.

He stopped, like a boy at a game of ball, and looked at her as she went down the piazza beside her sister.

Marchmont, seeing all, laughed in triumph.

"Good!" he muttered. "The sheep-dog has come. She's a match for even you, King Lawrence."

This was not addressed to the young man in question, for he was out of hearing, and with ladies, and was now the centre of their regard.

That night the Windlows, No. 3 or 4, one of the many touches of nature that make the whole world kin, but had their cottage down the avenue, gave a small party. The Ocean Windlows and their friends were seldom disturbed. Mabel and Alayne were three of the friends. They went in together, and together were presented to Miss Windlow.

"I have had the honor of meeting Miss M'Lean before." And Lawrence King smiled, with something defying and audacious in his eye. It hoped forth when he said, directly, "And your sister? I do not see her. I hope she is to be here. We should miss her if she were not here."

A flush rose to Miss M'Lean's temples. A sense of wounded pride, of invaded dignity, gleamed in her expression. In a second it was gone again. She saw herself regarded as the "sheep-dog," a means to an end, and that end was the centre ground? She knew she had read this man correctly. She knew what he was doing as well as Wilkie Marchmont, and she began to resent more than either. But now she let the flush die away, and answered, quietly:

"Mabel is in the garden with her cousin. She will be with us directly."

And directly she came, while King quoted:

"The red rose cries, She is near, she is near;
And the white rose weeps, 'She is late.'"

His face, dark, handsome, and exultant in some strangely defiant way, turned to his accustomed mood, seemed to express still more. He looked as if he thought, exultantly:

"She's coming, she's coming, my dear." She came straight to her sister, blushing vehemently as she saw her position, and drawing a shawl as she passed, King dropping gracefully to the little figure clinging to his side, this same one half sung, half said with deep significance.

"Gay snakes rattled, and charmed, and sung."

Some one else said, "What are you humming that lovely child-song here for?"

"For? For Lawrence King. Don't you think it fits, Lucie Ashton?"

"Oh, you think that of him? The young lady seems to understand it, however."

"She? She is seventeen. He is thirty. That is his pastime."

They talked of other things, but Emily M'Lean heard no more. Only that line, so significantly applied.

"Gay snakes rattled, and charmed, and sung," haunted her.

She was sitting by some tall tropical plants, and in the dull light through the broad, thick leaves of leafy covert looking out, and making conclusion, conviction doubly sure, as she still saw those two sauntering past, the dark exultant face bending above the younger and fairer.

At last she rose from her observation, came out of her brown study, speaking unconsciously to herself aloud.

"I have the power, and I will use it."

And there is one thing to be said just here. Emily M'Lean was one of those persons, rare in this world, who knew herself, her power, and her weakness. Her estimate was never made about other estimates. Coming out of her brown study, there was color on her cheek and a sparkle in her eyes—the power she had invoked from some inner depths of that quiet controlled nature breathed subtly forth. Halfway across the room the eyes Marchmont met and joined her. They walked through the rooms, or in the softly lighted hall, engaged in never-flagging conversation. They sat down together and Alayne joined them. The talk became more diffusive, but animated. By-and-by, Eastman, the college friend of the party, appeared and then that finest talker of all, Lanilier.

Still within the room Lawrence King regarded this group with curiosity. At last, out of curiosity, he too, with pretty Mabel still on his arm, drew into the circle to find the fascination. Where was it? What was it? He looked at Miss M'Lean. She seemed to be talking little: more and then a low-voiced word to one and another—brief, quiet phrase—but it claimed attention, and entered into the general tone. But the low-cool, self-poised voice was more quiet and softer than the hue of her eyes.

These eyes, now so lately had turned stone-cold glances upon him—glances of suspicion and severity—now beamed with gentleness. There was warmth and animation in her face, and her speech was cordial. He wondered if she would change as suddenly from warmth to cold for him. He addressed her. She answered him with kind indifference. He entered into the conversation, which was interesting to him as it was upon Ruskin, and he admired and believed in Ruskin. And here he met nothing but the soft, kind manner as before. Lawrence King drew a long breath over her. He knew he saw one now, and he felt half ashamed of his defiant ground. So the night ended with a new interest in this young lady—a sense of humiliation. It was good for him.

II.

"Gay snakes rattled, and charmed, and sung."

Emily M'Lean could not lose her sleep with that line singing in her head—that line which the sweetest of poets never thought to be so applied. She awoke with a start and a sigh. She thought of her depression as she arrived. She was not given to be fanciful, but she asked herself if it were not premonitory.

Mabel, on the contrary, woke up to gayest anticipations. She was to sit to Lawrence for her. A drive with the Windlows to the glen, with Lawrence King for a vis-à-vis, and in the afternoon a most tactics lunch in the woods—these the Windlows again making it propriety. She let this brilliant plan out to her sister while she was dressing.

"And he has promised to sit," coolly asked Emily.

"Oh, the band plays here to-night."

Emily knew the evening would be spent in the dance. The dance—for her side, with the delicious breathed of Mendelssohn, and the soft summer night breeze through the broad ranges of pines. She said nothing, however—offered no suspicious advice or opposition; but thought, "I must wait until to-night; then I will see Lawrence King."

She waited until night. She saw Mabel flutter before the glass for half an hour between the curtains of a dark blue silk and a brother and a drooping brimmed, with sprays of meadow grass, ere she went out upon her drive. She saw her start back, and shrink into the dark fire girl clothed very flame, and exclaiming enthusiastically and ludicrously that she had a splendid day.

All Emily M'Lean could think of was

"Gay snakes rattled, and charmed, and sung."

That night she heard with as much pains with her toilet as Mabel, though she knew her strength did not lie there. It helped her to express herself, however.

This toilet is worth describing. It was a cool sea-shore night, and she changed her vapory muslin for a silk. Not a gay one—pearl gray, with opaline lustre softening the plain smooth surface. There was a flowering of fine lace at the throat, and through the sleeves where it drifted out and covered the slender wrist. Around her brow head, where coronals usually form where hair ends, she waved in a rippling curve parting to ear, she had wound three times, following the natural line, a fine thread of white pearl. And a pearl lace with the lace at her throat, large and transparent in its silver socket, another shone softly upon almost as white a finger, a reflection of these enhanced and shook clear rays of light near the wrist border of lace. It was a dress for a bride, but it was a thoughtful observer it would at once have suggested the wearer's character. It expressed much in Emily M'Lean, both of mood and temperament.

Mabel was too actual a beauty to be made or marred by what she wore. She offered a striking contrast that night to her sister with her gay colors, her ruffles, and general air of bizarre piquancy which she could not afford.

They went down together, a contrast, but not one to make either lose.

And then, hand in hand to the music already, were the three—Alayne, Marchmont, and King.

Marchmont, who had a cynical way of treating women, either brusquely or disdainfully, anticipated the rest by wheeling a chair for Miss M'Lean and seating himself beside her. There was neither brusquerie nor disdain in his manner, but a grave respect. His friends stared. But he seated himself composedly and began talking gravely. In half frowned when Lanilier came up and brought forth the Ruskin topic again. King, perhaps, was tired of Ruskin, or he had been long and loud at his theories that he could only talk with one; and he proved it by sauntering off with little Queen Mab.

Marchmont saw his companion's face change at this. Her eyes wandered, following her sister. They returned to him full of meaning, of mute appeal. Strange of all men she should look to him, but her instincts were true. Marchmont had the truest woman ever only had the will to do sometimes. He had both now. Her look in that involuntary glance said: "Take me away from these people! Send me to my sister."

He rose, made some remark, she never knew what, and gave her his arm. She thanked him with that look and accepted, and thus they departed.

Lawrence King, standing beating time with a little fan, and saying soft nothings, which in his tone might mean every thing, was suddenly surprised by a clear, even voice, full of concious strength, and very much at rest, which said, saying,

"Mr. King, if I ask you to give my sister up to Mr. Marchmont, whom I wish to tell her about a friend of mine he has not abroad (Martha Wilmon, Mabel), will you give me your attendance in the interval?"

A glance at Marchmont, but it was not needed. He understood.

Some minutes, before King knew what he was about, Mabel was going down the room with Wilkie Marchmont, and her sister stood in her stead.

Was he angry? For he was conscious. He thought he was. But immediately Emily M'Lean began taking.

What was it she talked of? Nothing beyond what any body might have said at such a time and place. The weather, the dance, its climate, and its people; but with all her words there was a sweet deep core of thought perceptible. There was the charm of abstract in her talk, and she did and said most topics enough, but freshened to her touch.

He found himself listening, replying. He found himself thinking of a change of allies, Emily. He gladly felt that he might have been acting a little absurdly; that he might have been playing with a child's toy, and that he could throw it away. This woman? There was the difference. In her presence his gay gallantry seemed to the air distingué a foolish futility. It was out of place. He had wasted his time so long upon these exterior things that, thrown aside from the field of action, he was afraid of manœvls! He, the elegant, the preux chevalier!

But as she talked he found that other self of his, the man who valued the conscious and the appreciative. Once more in his life he grew simple and unbroken, such as he might, perhaps, be to Robert Alayne or Wilkie Marchmont. A child's grew brilliant, a little merry. In all she was so natural, so self-poised, he followed her lead, natural himself.

Mabel, meanwhile, handed over to her bête noir that great drawback. While Marchmont, whose sheer knew how to sweet, and was so desperately afraid of. Mabel, poor child! literally trembled at the sound of his name. What had Wilkie Marchmont, with his cynicism, his sallow face, and, to her eyes, a little disappointed. Em had interrupted such a nice conversation. Perhaps Wilkie Marchmont took that way to show her sister to whom she had looked upon half-contemptuously twenty-four hours ago. Perhaps he felt in duty bound to carry out satisfactorily the plan laid before him. However it might be, he astonished Mabel M'Lean by talking in the most energetic way about Martha Wilmon, whom he had met in Italy. Told her how he had lived at Rome, about their artistic acquaintance, their quarrels, and how he had persuaded Wilman had painted for her likeness to somebody at home; a picture every body admired, and which a prince wanted to buy. Wilkie Martin wouldn't sell. It was a girl with yellow hair, in place of the Italian's darker locks; but it had her head, pose, and name. She called it Matilda, pronouncing sig inficently at Queen Mab. By this time Mabel was interested, and Marchmont supremely bored. All the time he was thinking:

"Miss M'Lean's mind must be rapid in its deductions. She has this trap and this bait such an appetizing bit of cheese as Master Wilman, from my three or four sentences about him last night."

But Mabel inwardly cried out that he had undertaken. Oh, agony of Boredom! when should he be released?

I found a rational being a while ago," he murmured, under his breath, "and she slips through my fingers for the sake of a—"

At this climax he abandoned his post to Alayne, whom he hailed as a deliverer, and by-and-by found himself in the midst of his friend's confidence.

But here was a dilemma Lawrence King had no idea of relinquishing. The less so as he saw March-mont's position.

To have what Marchmont wanted: to have a position of confidence which almost lies with surprise and ambition. Perhaps it raised the value of his position too. At all events his spirits rose. He was ready to be had into the dance where he was, forgot Mabel M'Lean, for the time at least, and triumphantly carried the day, or the night, Marchmont looking on the cynic still more.

And Mabel, that night in her chamber as she stood pulling out the little gold comb from her hair, her head was languid, but there a little was. Emily noted it, but wisely held her peace.

Partly with an attempt at great carelessness, and the child says:

"I thought you and Mr. King would get on nicely together, Emily. Don't you like him very much?"

"I don't know him very much," answered Em, with better feigning than her sister. "He is an admirer of yours, however, I plainly see, dear. I hope I shall like him very much if you wish it."

"Oh, dear, no!" and all the yellow hair was pulled into great snarls about the flushing face, and the little hands were trembling. "Oh dear, dear, I wish I had never seen Lawrence King—yes see. He is older than I, and tells me I remind him of his sister; and that I must consider him as a kind and affectionate brother. It is very nice: makes me feel so much at home with him."

So that was the guise this prima ebrialter took! These the Platonic theories he urged, to give himself liberty to roam.

"Selfish!" inaudibly ejaculated Miss M'Lean, as she made these conclusions. Sleeping upon it did not alter her opinion, and all the following days proved her conclusions—and her power.

III.

STRAIGHT from the dinling hall went Lawrence King to the parlor. There with the Windows and their friends, he found what he sought; and it was not many minutes before he was standing before Mabel M'Lean talking with empressement. Then breaking in upon this came her sister, Miss Florence King, was satisfied. Apart stood Marchmont, savagely biting the end of his mustache, and looking out of lowering brows at the group before him. How many times had just this thing happened? Just when he had commenced a sensible conversation with Miss M'Lean up starts that puppy of a King, and by stratagem wiles her away. It was very true; a day after day had this thing occurred. What did it mean? Was Lawrence King for once modest of his own attraction, and doubting it, did he resort to stratagem, or was it a little bent of malice to foil the cynic, the sometime autocrat? What did Lawrence King care for so plain a person as Miss M'Lean, when the first beauties of a season were ready to smile at his approach? It must have been the latter of these two propositions, then. And yet how long his mind dwelt on it, how absorbed he grew as he listened or talked! There was strangeness at least of some sort, and Emily M'Lean herself was the last to see it. But she did see it, though, at last. She saw it when she suddenly one day seemed to the fast friend Lawrence King was using her sister as a lure; that he was more than content when it proved successful, and transferred her from his side. She did not like it; do not quite so much. She had put herself up as a shield. She had set herself as a barrier between him of a power that, actively employed, would accomplish her desire. She only desired to warn.

How regular this had the accustomed. Suddenly brought to suspicion, Miss M'Lean let this wily gentleman alone. That it, when he approached her sister she did not interrupt, she retired, apparently deeply absorbed with the cynic. In vain he "charmed and sung." She came not near him. Once, twice, perhaps he tried this. When his sense that it was unsuccessful, as that savage Marchmont said, "played out," he came over to the cynic with a free field in open, resolute warfare. This was better than the other. Marchmont himself gave him credit for some courage. Miss M'Lean, too, saw him in stouter guise.

But Mabel? Yes, the play was played out. The fine theories no longer heeded. She forgot even Lawrence King "a sister."

"Why does Lawrence King follow you? Miss M'Lean so persistently?—she isn't a beauty or a belle, like her sister, though Marchmont and his friends do pay her homage," asked an observer of the somebody who had quoted:

"Gay snakes rattled, and charmed, and sung."

"Perhaps because Marchmont and his friends follow her. It would be like Lawrence King to want what other people value."

"The little M'Lean seems to have consoled herself for his neglect."

"Alayne's worth two of him; I don't wonder."

"Alayne never looked at a pretty woman before."

The other laughed.

"No; that is the reason why a pretty woman is pleased with him. She thinks he must see something beyond her beauty, that every body can see."

So they were discussed. Those who discussed them looked to see Lawrence King, for he was in pursuit and turn to another. But no, the days went by. A new face appeared upon the scene; beauty and fashion and fashion's belle of the ball he clave to the plainer, with neither fortune nor fashion. At first Lawrence King says to himself: "Why do I follow the society of this Miss M'Lean? Is it that she makes me use all my energies of mind—makes think? Or can it be because in some cases where Wilkie Marchmont thinks it worth while to show esteem? What is it? I don't want to flirt with Emily M'Lean. I would not for worth a fine thing to her; but in her presence I am surprised into a higher estimate of my capabilities than I feel others. Always I am sure to do that it? And yet I am a more modest man with her. She does not flatter me with smiles or blushes. What is it?" One day he found the answer to this. He carried it with him for days, for weeks, until the autumn came, and the time for the breaking up of all this summer campaigning.

It was a brilliant morning, just at the last of September, when Lawrence King found the solitary walk to find a solitary occupant of the piazza. It was Emily M'Lean. She was walking up and down in the sunshine.

He looked at her as she came toward him. Her dress was of the hue of late violets, and was not so much carelessly in her bosom somebody's morning offering—a bunch of carnations. "How lovely she is!" he thought. Then it flashed across him the memory of a morning when she had come up that same piazza a stranger, and their comments about her. He remembered now what Marchmont had said, had meant when she said, "It couldn't have been Emily Lee's face." There was something about the even regularity of outline, he confessed; but a soft, subtle charm of presence, a grace, of motion, of expression, that you felt was the unconscious art of a royal womanhood. Lawrence King felt it now as he went to meet her. He joined her—not fluent, as usual, but silent, distrait. What was on his mind? In this royal presence did he feel the weight of his sinning? Did he feel that he had sinned against her and hers? And was he about to make confession?

He made confession, but not for absolution. He confessed, not of penitence, but of passion. He loved her. She was the only woman in the world to him. And telling her so, he asked her to marry him.

Remembering little Queen Mab, you think that now was Emily M'Lean's hour of great retribution; that she turned upon him with scorn and withering reproach; that her eyes flashed, that her cheek flamed, and that she asked him "how he dared?" etc. No; this was not Emily M'Lean's way. She must have had some deeper test of nature than mere pert person—some well-spring of tenderness for every human being.

She waited before she replied, looking out toward the sea, with her somewhat sad face growing sadder as she pondered. At length she said, gravely,

"I have been waiting for you to ask that will most kindly express what I wish to say—

"No, no!" he interrupted, vehemently, putting away, as it were, the rejection he anticipated, with a gesture of his hand.

"I am sorry," she went on, "to give any one so much pain. I had not looked for this end; you may be sure; but I can not marry you, Mr. King." She caught eagerly at these last words. She had not said, "I do not love you." Perhaps—but with a lofer she urged his suit. He would wait. And as a special claim he said:

"I have never loved a woman before, Miss M'Lean."

She looked at him a moment before she replied:

"I should know that. To have loved makes us tender of others, fearful of inflicting suffering. Love it would you unmarried yourself with that little sister, Mr. King."

His face changed. "Ah, you will judge me hardly there, but consider. I met your sister as the young beauty of the season. She received my flatterings, my society in the usual way of young belles. She was arch, gay, and piquante—some might have said coquettish. I think we understood each other."

"Mr. King, my sister is seventeen. You can judge how much chance she has had for judging the world, and to understand arts of society like yourself. Last year she left school. In six months she finds herself in the midst of a season, and instead of speaking to her with the severe simplicity of a conventual Francesanie, meet her with a female consciousness of its many graces, in a manner, which you suggest as coquettish, is perfectly unlearned—the natural result of a young and imaginative mind. You are a man of honor. I suppose she understood you, Mr. King. I will tell you frankly—because I think it is better for her ultimately and for your peace—that I would have had my sister blushed at your name when alone with me. But, it was not for reason. I felt it was my duty—mine thing to stir the conscious depths of a young girl's heart; for though she may outwardly accept any version of a gentleman's attentions, you and I wiser in the world's ways may suggest, it is only outwardly. The sensibility of her own nature conceals such thoughts."

A vivid color suffused her listener's face as she spoke. He remembered himself in this suggestion. How nearly at this moment he had made her his own past conduct appear! In this clear and noble presence how wanted seemed his motives!

"At least," he said, after a short pause, "I have not permanently disturbed your sister's heart. Alayne—"

"Mr. King, you have taught Mabel her first lesson of unbelief. She has learned from you the meaning of flirting. It would be a pity, as you have proved fatal to her nature, making her the heartless, unfeeling coquette which you presently pronounced her to be; but in the reaction Mr. Alayne's simple truth of character convinced her that in her idea was not coquetry. Indeed, I am happy to say, Mr. King, that she accepted Robert Alayne last night. I am sure you will be glad to hear this."

"I am sincerely glad. I hope you will believe me to this extent. But—but if you would but allow me to consider my own heart, I think you may not be so far apart from yours: that I may at some time—"

"Pardon me, Mr. King, for what I am going to say; but love does not grow by waiting between two souls living in every-day life as we have been. I am twenty-six. Since I was twenty life has been to me costly and sacred. To you—forgive me if I seem harsh—life has been a play, an amusement, which often pulled upon you. You have acted extremely. I interfere. Do not think I regale my thing to myself, but we are still to each other. You have it in your power to do much, and be a true philosophical; but your place is in the world—mine is not."

"And you will not—"

"I can not." She held out her hand. "Will you forgive me for what I have said? Trust me that I did not say it easily or unkindly."

He took the hand, but he did not speak, then said, in a low tone:

"I am glad to have known you, Emily M'Lean. I shall never forget you."

He never did. His place was in the world, as she had said, and in the very whirl he ran in was an unbroken circle of the commonplace and courting. Away off behind the Catskills, and Sharon Springs around in a larger circle still, was the Saratoga one, the centre of which was Congress Springs, and the centre of that with the Federal advance, approached the town from the south. After several days' skirmishing, the enemy passed through and out on the west side toward Chambersburg. Then the several days' occupation of the enemy in strange force, and after a slight contest was followed by the rebels' retreat to the north and west, and he came into the town on a run, his troops going through and out on the north side, and the rear of the rebels, closely followed by the enemy. One of his brigades was sent to the left, to the west, to intercept the enemy on such side of it. All three were abreast, running as best as they could—the two outside ones pouring a heavy fire into the centre, out of which men dropped, killed or wounded, at almost every footstep. This Federal brigade, in running that terrible gauntlet, lost half of its men. Among the wounded officers, and for whom no one but the Federal troops succeeded in mounting the Cemetery hill, and in empty carriages, were taken to the enemy encamped in the town, and the Federal troops on the hill.

During Wednesday night and Thursday morning the two armies were engaged in getting into position. Some were to be the next day's line of battle, and by noon on Thursday each general had a force of 80,000 men at his disposal. Then began the great artillery contest, the infantry on both sides crouching behind fences and trees and in rifle-pits. The Federal soldiers to the centre held many of the tombstones on the ground to protect them, and many accepted. There was but little infantry fighting on Thursday, and neither party made much impression upon the other. The Confederates on the other town erected barricades, and had their shape-shots; they passed in every available spot, picking off Federal soldiers on the hills to the north of the cemetery. The entombstones and graves of the dead were thrown up breast-high over and into the devoted town. Beyond killing and wounding, but very little and shattering houses, and making an awful noise, however, this cannonade had but little effect on the mass of the two armies. It was simply with great ferocity, and neither could drive the other out of position.

On Thursday night, fearing that the enemy had flanking parties, which might reach their rear, General Meade had his line taken up of retreating, and he called a council of war. There were present some of the corps commanders, and with them was consulted his dispatches from Richmond, from which it was learned that the enemy had received reinforcements, and was daily receiving more.

On Friday morning General Lee, with the desire to make the attack, or the supposition of the enemy's retreat, and wished to entice them out of it, and so defeat his purpose. While there he withdrew his artillery from the centre and infantry from Gettysburg. The deserted town lay as it were in a trance—a dead, silent town, but with quietly behind the fences and trees, and bands upon the hills. They could look into the streets and see the preparing which was in progress. They saw the enemy march out and enter the town, but made no advance, and the Confederates gained nothing by the movement. A portion of the enemy, the cavalry, took up a line to the rear of the cemetery, screened the Confederate retreat. For some time the two had exchanged a soldier's fire—a few of dead and wounded men and horses, with broken wagons, fences, stone walls, and the tombstones of the cemetery to mark the contest; one, lay there. The frightened inhabitants peered out of their cellars and windows, and were glad to bring to cease such a lull, and, almost afraid of their own shadow, they hastened to the relief and comfort of the civilized and the sound of every shot or shell.

General Lee's movement had no effect. Meade was neither to be enticed into the town nor into the valley. Enough for him to hold his own, and he seems to give him warning of what happened to poor Reynolds two days before, and he wisely determined not to attack.

Saturday morning the enemy's position was made clear to the commander. The enemy's centre had been withdrawn from his entrenchments. General Lee permitted the Federal commander to send his cavalry on a charge upon the cemetery. The Federal soldiers were on the hills. They were in the cemetery, behind tombstones, in the cemetery, and some flat on the ground. The Confederate cavalry charged, and it was the most desperate day of the day before, but instead of being spread all over the line, were massed in a solid column, and with a loud yell and sabre flashing and waving, and in every direction of the Federal line to the centre of the cemetery. All were ready. Amidst the furious fire from the Federal infantry, supported by a Federal battery on the hill, the Confederate cavalry, in hand, crouched in the little ditches dug behind the tombstones. With a loud yell they rushed on, and with a charge.

It soon came. From the woods of short, scrubby oak, but tall trees near the cemetery appeared a line of men. It was a long, loud, unremitting, hideous screech from thousands of voices. At the yell the Federal regiments rose. Soon the enemy's column emerged from the woods. They came on a run, but the long, loud, unremitting yell was screeching. They climbed the fences and rushed along, in some places in double file, in others in single file. The cannon roared, and grape and canister and spherical case and the whole arsenal of the Federal forces rained upon the heads falling out of the line. They came within musketshot of the Federal troops. The infantry opened a fire of rattle. The Confederates approached the outer line of works. They were driven back. They rallied, and with a yell the enemy pushed forward down the hill, across into the works, and at the point of the bayonet, and cursing, and swearing, clashing their arms and fists in the faces of their opponents. The line of battle fell back to the Federal artillerists on the hills above. There, almost overpowering the artillerists on their hills above, lowered all their fire upon the surging column of the enemy's infantry. Grape and canister and shell were showered, and to the right and left, threw its shells and shot in the rear. The enemy then saw that they were lost. Then the enemy pushed up the hill and across the second line of works. They were driven back, and rallied, and pushed and fired. One moment the enemy would be at the rifle-pits, and the next they would be driven across, and the field would be strewn with dead into the valley. Then, with one of these terrible charges, the enemy would be at the rifle-pits, and the next they would be driven out of the tombstones. It was the hardest fighting of the whole battle, and the enemy then, Southern blood was flowing, would not always succeed. Several attempts were made to drive the enemy from the cemetery, and it was not until the afternoon, leaving dead and wounded behind them, that the Confederates slowly retreated to the town, and into their ranks again.

The day was waning. They can scarcely be said to have been driven. They have made an attack and been repulsed, and the reserved strength of the enemy was useless to try any more, they retreated. It was now General Meade's turn to advance, and he did advance, but very hardly, his soldiers felt elated. They saw hopes of a victory, and were eager to follow up the enemy's retreat. Although there had been a battle in the valley below Gettysburg, the enemy's line of battle was not disturbed as ever. Shells flew over it, and now and then one of the lesser batteries would open fire upon the enemy, but neither force pounded it. General Meade turned his attention there.

The day was waning and the battle had failed, and he determined, if possible, to drive the enemy from the cemetery. His troops were placed in order, and charged down the hill upon the enemy. The enemy, after a short stress, chasing a few of the enemy, still hid there, but in the town. The enemy's artillery, from the hill, fired "Taps-storm," and the Executive and Chamberlain's regiments, and the regiments of the hills charged in groups and chased. At the cemetery the Confederates were driven back, and the Federal troops were driven back to their batteries, which commanded the cemetery. They had but few cannon; and though the enemy's artillery fired upon the crest of the hill and abandoned the cemetery.

The enemy then retired from the town. The land to the south of the cemetery was rather flat and cut up into gorges, which was the centre of the enemy's line. The hills on the brow of the hill proved an efficient aid to the Federal infantry, maintaining their position, and, hidden by behind the brow, with the ditch in front, they could watch all the movements of the enemy. There were but little action fighting after this, and night put an end to Friday's struggle. The Federal troops, however, were about a mile on the north, near the sandstorm, and half a mile on the south of the cemetery.

During the night the dead in the streets of Gettysburg were buried, and the wounded in the houses and in the barns were collected and carried to the rear. On the next morning, Saturday, the Confederates were busily engaged in the work of making it, the enemy retreated further, abandoning their line of battle, and the Federal troops were glad to see that the place where they were building intrenchments. All the day of the 4th in battle array, and the next day they were doing; every pickets reported that they were intrenching, and in spite of the 4th of July there was the field with it in the Federal possession.

"TEMPORA MUTANTUR."

"FIRST waltz? let me see; with much pleasure!"
She handed her fan to her aunt;
How we whirl'd to the dance-tempo swift measures,
I fain would describe; but I can't.

An earsman would say that we "spurted;"
A sportsman, we "went like a bird;"
I shall merely remark that we flirted
In a manner extremely absurd.

And when all my twirling was over,
And I and my pipe were alone,
My heart, I began to discover,
Had ceased to be wholly my own.

As Paddy would say, "More by token,"
Our hearts must be made of tough clay,
For mine's made a hundred times broken,
And here it is beating to-day!

And now I sit here in my attic,
Alone, with a cold in my head,
And think, after all, somewhat dramatic,
Of dancing in days that are dead.

A waltz, and but one! 'Twas but little
To live in my memory so long;
But, ah, sweet's the heart's last sensation
As one's love of sensation is strong.

I pick'd up a flow'ret which, drooping,
Had fall'n from the wreath it had graced;
At present, just where I am stooping,
I'm over four feet round the waist!

The programme which held her sweet surname,
I gazed on with tenderest looks;
Just now, I am thankful to have some
Would move me far less than my cook's.

It comes to us all, that sad season,
When a man has his waistcoats made wide,
And his wife ceases strumming on the keys on,
And carries her keys by her side;

When we will go to sleep after dinner,
And perhaps at odd times in the day;
When the hair on the head's getting thinner,
And our beard and our whiskers get gray!

When we can't hold our horse with a snaffle;
When our waiting's no longer our forte;
Then sad recollections I'll baffle
With a bumper of crusted old Port.

THE BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG.

On pages 472 and 478 we publish two fine illustrations of the BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG, drawn for us by our special artist, Mr. A. R. Waud. The following account of the battle we have seen is the following from the Philadelphia Press, which we do not think our readers will be sorry to have in full, long as it is:

On Wednesday morning, July 1, General Reynolds, with twenty-five thousand men, the advance of the Federal army, approached Gettysburg. The enemy's cavalry began the great battle. The field upon which it was fought was a portion of the valley of Pennsylvania, a long and several miles west of Gettysburg, is the great landmark, and the whole ground around and between it is the field upon which stood the mid-summit but famous cemetery. Gettysburg is a very pretty town. Two ridges, a mile long and parallel to each other, are on each side of the valley. If these ridges are not more than two hundred feet high at the east. It was upon these ridges that the battle was fought, the enemy occupying and retaining the west of the town, and across the valley above and below it. There is but one road to the west, which runs across Gettysburg one, a mile south of Gettysburg, which runs ragging down the valley toward Emmitsburg. The line of battle formed by the two armies were upon their ridges, and extended from one to the other of these roads.

The battle-line of the Federals was a long, irregular one. On the right it is a short distance south of the town. Then it runs in a direction due eastward to the top of a granite accent covered with low, scrubby timber and pierced by a few rocky crevices, and known as Culp's Hill, and the Confederate line. As the gutter stood amidst the brick, the tombstones of the cemetery, and reflecting the valley, the debatable ground, stretched around from right to left, without a semblance of order. The enemy occupied the little pinthes of wood, and passing his eye up the hill on the other side of the valley, the enemy held the west-west. Further to the right is the Gettysburg College, also in the hands of the enemy.

Beginning at the left hand, the Confederate line rested on the hill of Culp's Hill, then extended to the hill and ran along a stone fence, which has been made into a rifle-pit. At the point where the Baltimore pike crosses the cemetery Chambersburg and Emmetsburg road and the road to Hanover Junction, the fencing and reflecting the valley which it crossed a serpentine railway leading to the town, and the "Big Round Top" and "Little Round Top" in the rear, in length, its front, except in a few cleared spots, being covered with heavy timber. The main line of battle formed on the right sides.

The rifle-pits occupied by the Federal troops was half inclosed by the other. It was an inner circle, and was made up of many little breast-works, built with the stone fences. The Federal left rested also on the little stream, and run along a rocky ridge to the north, and then to the east, and so on in a semicircle over one round-topped wooded hill after another, and so on to the right of the line, by means of a thick forest. Meade's line was about five miles in length, and was in the form of a fish-hook. The ground, he had all the advantages of interior lines, and he was in the centre of a circle. The Confederate line on a wooded knoll a mile east of the centre, and curving away off behind the Confederate line and curving around in a larger circle still, was the Seminary ridge. The Federal line was concentrated, and being one, the centre of the Confederate line was concentrated, and with the Federal advance, approached the town from the south. The enemy's line was in the form of a bow, and passed through and out on the west side toward Chambersburg. The enemy's several lines were in the form of a crescent, and after a slight contest was followed by the enemy's retreat to the north and west, and he came into the town on a run, his troops going through and out on the north side, and the rear of the rebels, closely followed by the enemy. One of his brigades was sent to the left, to the west, to intercept the enemy on such side of it. All three were abreast, running as best as they could—the two outside ones pouring a heavy fire into the centre, out of which men dropped, killed or wounded, at almost every footstep. This Federal brigade, in running that terrible gauntlet, lost half of its men. Among the wounded officers, and for whom no one but the Federal troops succeeded in mounting the Cemetery hill, and in empty carriages, were taken to the enemy encamped in the town, and the Federal troops on the hill.

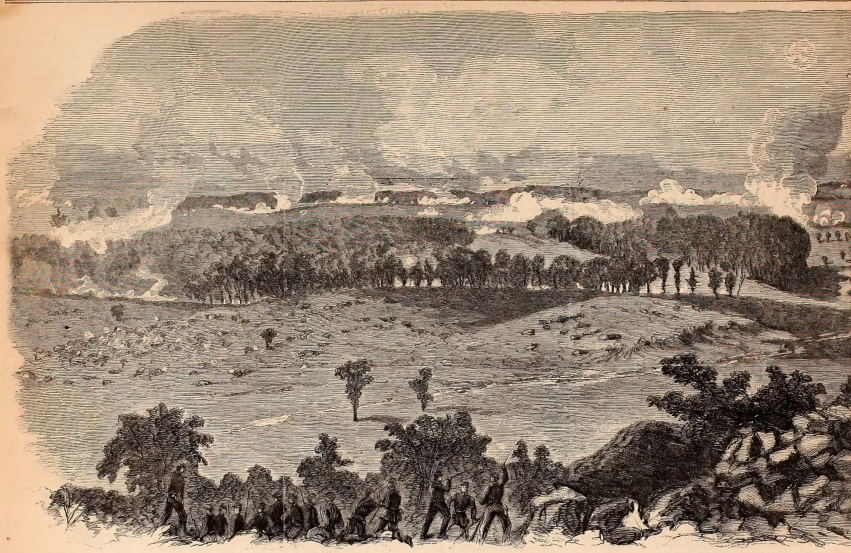
During Wednesday night and Thursday morning the two armies were engaged in getting into position. Some were to be the next day's line of battle, and by noon on Thursday each general had a force of 80,000 men at his disposal. Then began the great artillery contest, the infantry on both sides crouching behind fences and trees and in rifle-pits. The Federal soldiers to the centre held many of the tombstones on the ground to protect them, and many accepted. There was but little infantry fighting on Thursday, and neither party made much impression upon the other. The Confederates on the other town erected barricades, and had their shape-shots; they passed in every available spot, picking off Federal soldiers on the hills to the north of the cemetery. The entombstones and graves of the dead were thrown up breast-high over and into the devoted town. Beyond killing and wounding, but very little and shattering houses, and making an awful noise, however, this cannonade had but little effect on the mass of the two armies. It was simply with great ferocity, and neither could drive the other out of position.

On Thursday night, fearing that the enemy had flanking parties, which might reach their rear, General Meade had his line taken up of retreating, and he called a council of war. There were present some of the corps commanders, and with them was consulted his dispatches from Richmond, from which it was learned that the enemy had received reinforcements, and was daily receiving more.

On Friday morning General Lee, with the desire to make the attack, or the supposition of the enemy's retreat, and wished to entice them out of it, and so defeat his purpose. While there he withdrew his artillery from the centre and infantry from Gettysburg. The deserted town lay as it were in a trance—a dead, silent town, but with quietly behind the fences and trees, and bands upon the hills. They could look into the streets and see the preparing which was in progress. They saw the enemy march out and enter the town, but made no advance, and the Confederates gained nothing by the movement. A portion of the enemy, the cavalry, took up a line to the rear of the cemetery, screened the Confederate retreat. For some time the two had exchanged a soldier's fire—a few of dead and wounded men and horses, with broken wagons, fences, stone walls, and the tombstones of the cemetery to mark the contest; one, lay there. The frightened inhabitants peered out of their cellars and windows, and were glad to bring to cease such a lull, and, almost afraid of their own shadow, they hastened to the relief and comfort of the civilized and the sound of every shot or shell.

General Lee's movement had no effect. Meade was neither to be enticed into the town nor into the valley. Enough for him to hold his own, and he seems to give him warning of what happened to poor Reynolds two days before, and he wisely determined not to attack.

Saturday morning the enemy's position was made clear to the commander. The enemy's centre had been withdrawn from his entrenchments. General Lee permitted the Federal commander to send his cavalry on a charge upon the cemetery. The Federal soldiers were on the hills. They were in the cemetery, behind tombstones, in the cemetery, and some flat on the ground. The Confederate cavalry charged, and it was the most desperate day of the day before, but instead of being spread all over the line, were massed in a solid column, and with a loud yell and sabre flashing and waving, and in every direction of the Federal line to the centre of the cemetery. All were ready. Amidst the furious fire from the Federal infantry, supported by a Federal battery on the hill, the Confederate cavalry, in hand, crouched in the little ditches dug behind the tombstones. With a loud yell they rushed on, and with a charge.



It soon came. From the woods of short, scrubby oak, but tall trees near the cemetery appeared a line of men. It was a long, loud, unremitting, hideous screech from thousands of voices. At the yell the Federal regiments rose. Soon the enemy's column emerged from the woods. They came on a run, but the long, loud, unremitting yell was screeching. They climbed the fences and rushed along, in some places in double file, in others in single file. The cannon roared, and grape and canister and spherical case and the whole arsenal of the Federal forces rained upon the heads falling out of the line. They came within musketshot of the Federal troops. The infantry opened a fire of rattle. The Confederates approached the outer line of works. They were driven back. They rallied, and with a yell the enemy pushed forward down the hill, across into the works, and at the point of the bayonet, and cursing, and swearing, clashing their arms and fists in the faces of their opponents. The line of battle fell back to the Federal artillerists on the hills above. There, almost overpowering the artillerists on their hills above, lowered all their fire upon the surging column of the enemy's infantry. Grape and canister and shell were showered, and to the right and left, threw its shells and shot in the rear. The enemy then saw that they were lost. Then the enemy pushed up the hill and across the second line of works. They were driven back, and rallied and pushed and fired. One moment the enemy would be at the rifle-pits, and the next they would be driven across, and the field would be strewn with dead into the valley. Then, with one of these terrible charges, the enemy would be at the rifle-pits, and the next they would be driven out of the tombstones. It was the hardest fighting of the whole battle, and the enemy then, Southern blood was flowing, would not always succeed. Several attempts were made to drive the enemy from the cemetery, and it was not until the afternoon, leaving dead and wounded behind them, that the Confederates slowly retreated to the town, and into their ranks again.

The day was waning. They can scarcely be said to have been driven. They have made an attack and been repulsed, and the reserved strength of the enemy was useless to try any more, they retreated. It was now General Meade's turn to advance, and he did advance, but very hardly, his soldiers felt elated. They saw hopes of a victory, and were eager to follow up the enemy's retreat. Although there had been a battle in the valley below Gettysburg, the enemy's line of battle was not disturbed as ever. Shells flew over it, and now and then one of the lesser batteries would open fire upon the enemy, but neither force pounded it. General Meade turned his attention there.

The day was waning and the battle had failed, and he determined, if possible, to drive the enemy from the cemetery. His troops were placed in order, and charged down the hill upon the enemy. The enemy, after a short stress, chasing a few of the enemy, still hid there, but in the town. The enemy's artillery, from the hill, fired "Taps-storm," and the Executive and Chamberlain's regiments, and the regiments of the hills charged in groups and chased. At the cemetery the Confederates were driven back, and the Federal troops were driven back to their batteries, which commanded the cemetery. They had but few cannon; and though the enemy's artillery fired upon the crest of the hill and abandoned the cemetery.

The enemy then retired from the town. The land to the south of the cemetery was rather flat and cut up into gorges, which was the centre of the enemy's line. The hills on the brow of the hill proved an efficient aid to the Federal infantry, maintaining their position, and, hidden by behind the brow, with the ditch in front, they could watch all the movements of the enemy. There were but little action fighting after this, and night put an end to Friday's struggle. On the next morning, Saturday, the Confederates were busily engaged in the work of making it, the enemy retreated further, abandoning their line of battle, and the Federal troops were glad to see that the place where they were intrenching at the foot of Smith Mountain. A CHILD'S QUESTION.

Long ring the bells from many a tower;
The year is eighty-three;
A father by the window sits
With a child upon his knee,
And hears the gladsome notes proclaim
The birthday of the free.

The banner which our fathers loved,
And which their sons shall prize,
With not a single star effaced,
Floats proudly to the skies—
The emblem of a nation's strength
No foeman dare despise.

"Dear father," now with earnest voice
Outspeaks the eager son,
"My teacher told me yesterday
What glorious deeds were done
In the war that burst upon the land
In eighteen sixty-one.

"She told me with what patient heart
Our noble soldiers bore
The toilsome march, the frugal fare,
The hardships of the war;
The greatest—so my teacher says—
That they ever saw.

"I wish I had been living then,
I'd be a soldier too,
And help defend the noble flag
From all the rebel crew:
I'd be ashamed to stay behind;
Dear father, wouldn't you?"

Upon the listening father's face
A painful flush there came;
The war-soldier's meed of praise
He could in nowise claim,
And the question of his little son
Smote him with sudden shame.

Young men, your country calls to-day
For loyal men and true;
She has enough of earnest work
For earnest men to do.
Give heed, lest in the coming days
Your children blush for you.

GERVAISE.

THE roses and honey-suckles, twined thick about the porch, stirred on a sudden, then stopped, overcome by the heavy, waving fields and thick, crowding trees on their mighty sides, and looking down on the cottage like witnesses yet kindly guardian angels, began to dim and veil themselves with mist; but the breeze, coming freshly up from the water filled out the long muslin curtains, and sweeping through halls and pizzaras with a pleasant murmur. At that Aunt Helen, napping just within the window, sighed, yawning, and looked for a shawl to put on, but the rest of the party abode as they were; the girls, Madge and Ethel, on the low-step of the piazza, Madge holding her book even closer than usual in the dim light to her near-sighted eyes, Ethel idly twisting sprays of pink honeysuckle into a wreath; while a little to the right sat Phil smoking, and Dr. Toussaint — Well, speaking after the manner of men, there had been utter silence for the last ten minutes; but if we observe the spirit rather than the letter of the facts, they all that time Gervaise Toussaint had been saying something to Ethel over and over again.

A something like the honey-suckle breath, subtle, sweet, felt rather than understood; part, as it seemed, of the restless odorous night, of the scarlet flaming sky, of the plash and ripple on the beach, of the song of the bird swaying on the drooping boughs of yonder Norway spruce, yet distinct from them all, asserting itself as a thought, not an emotion, and forcing her into sudden question and doubt of herself. For if honour, and truth, and right were any thing, then Gervaise Toussaint should have had as much share in such thinking and questioning as the column against which she leaned; no more.

The wreath dropped from her nerveless fingers, and the pale, sensitive face grew grey-shadowed from her lap, drove it full against Gervaise's broad breast.

"Fate, or rather its emblem," he said, seizing it, and pressing it to his lips.

"Unconscious wise," returned Madge, without looking up from her book. "Fate is the excuse of a coward, the shield of crime or weakness."

Ethel's face flushed at once, but she only answered, coolly,

"Truth serves cowards and bad men often."

"Truth!" Madge laid down her book, and prepared for combat.

"A truth, and it what you will: a law, circumstances, force of character—it exists under any and all of those names. Why, in this very thing that you and you? Given up to every-one certain conditions of temperament, situation, habit of thought, attraction, and let the rest be as it will. So surely as they meet they are drawn together—feel their chief good in each other; and before this mysterious power, this all-potent attraction, all the things you call laws and duties if they chance to be opposing, are brushed away like cobwebs. I style this Fate. The individuals are nonentities. The cause prophesies of the effect as surely as this bud of the flower."

"The convenient creed of a man who has found the weakness of human will, and discovered nothing stronger or higher," retorted Madge, coldly.

Philip threw away his cigar, roused himself from a state of semi-doze, and assumed the air oratorical.

"Philosophers! philosophers—(save in the gallantry of a language that forces me to coin the word!) Ah yes are discussing cause and effect, remember that colds and coughs are apt to be the effects of a damp night breeze, and come in."

"Not at all, my dear Madge. "Come, Etta."

"In a moment," answered Ethel, with effort, as if under or nunised.

Gervaise, who had walked to the other end of the piazza, came suddenly back.

"It is too cool; you must go in, Ethel."

Before it had always been Miss Mason. She remembered that, angrily, even while she obeyed. He had turned away again as if forgetting her, but he stood in the long window through which she must pass, looking at the wall of black cloud that had built itself up in the stormy sky. Ethel hesitated, then made a move to go around the house.

"Stop," he said, quickly; "you have not pronounced yet on my creed. Will you dare to deny Fate also?"

"You are too mystical for my comprehension."

"Your evasion is a tacit acknowledgment."

"No, no!" she cried, hastily, trying to withdraw the hand that he had seized; but he held the slender finger fast, saying, with a smile,

"Why struggle? soft flesh against iron sinew can but bruise itself."

Ethel made no answer, and they crossed the drawing-room in silence. It was but a moment; but she took no measurement of time—she only knew that the strong, firm hold her fingers in, the none forceless way he was making her feel what he had dared to think, and that she had found in herself no indignation—only fear and surprise! It was than that, he had read her only too clearly, and that from beneath she must quell and crush out all unconsciousness, and must act and speak with intelligence of his meaning; and with all this hatred, and dread out in her brain, she came from the darkness into the light and warmth of the supper-room, where people were chatting over their tea as if that was going on every day—very much as usual—as if a demon had not trailed itself at her shoulder, and turned her wild and ghastly with its whispering.

Had she heard such whispering? Or was it a dream? a horrible remembrance of some sensational novel? The honest fire-light made it monstrous; the home air knew of no such noxious growth. Gervaise was enough. He was like them, with Philip now, resting his powerful hand lightly on Phil's wommish fingers. Such things had been done. Lily Haleigh knew of them, in woman's heart; but that was a tragedy. These were all simple, quiet folk tipping tea out of clear, old-fashioned china, under an old-fashioned roof that had never known dishonour.

Was here ought for tragedies? Only the other day she was feeding dolts from acorn cups. Could she break a heart?

Madge, seeing her wan looks, came over to her. Madge, Phil's sister, who some day would be her sister also, and down by her, stroked back the fair hair, patted her cheek, kissed her brow, inquired about her, in short, after a fashion common to kindly girls. At that Ethel squeezed herself into something like a rent the master, and came over with his notice of a feminine panacea in the shape of a cup of tea. Then Gervaise, with Phil, put Philip was obstinate and insisted—fed it to her by the tea-spoonful, looking, Madge declared as she left them, more like a mother than a lover, with a heart in the right place, doing the good Samaritan to a stray canary-bird.

Gervaise at last began to dabble dangerously at this pretty by-play; the red lips closing on the spoon; the soft face upturned in Phil's worshipping look; the touch on the handkerchief under her chin; his eyes sought Ethel's face, persistently averted, first unwillingly, then with intent and secretly, though the face never once turned toward him, a faint color began to rise and deepen in her cheeks, the downcast lids quivered, the lips parted, and then, as if by an irresistible impulse, she turned halfway, and for one fleeting moment met Gervaise's gaze.

She pushed the cup away hastily.

"I have had enough, and I am better."

"See now," answered Philip, the unobservant. "Another proof that my lily only needs my touching. Ethel, will you have a little more tea, or medicine now? Tell me when I shall have you always in my charge. You need such care as only I can give. You shall I have her Gervaise?"

He had begun spuriously, ended seriously. Ethel drew quick breath. From this question she felt always shrank, not with modesty, but timidity, but a secret reluctance difficult to explain even to herself. But now it was upon her, danger breathing her; and here was the safe, the honorable, the only way of escape. Philip, Madge, all would rejoice, and she should be free. Such a sigh she murmured something low in Philip's ear.

He turned radiant, joyous, exclaiming, before he could utter a word, to Gervaise:

"Madge, Aunt Nellie, I invite you to a wedding! Ethel has given me permission to claim her, and given me carte-blanche, and I pronounce that it shall be three weeks from this date. Gervaise, I claim your promise to be my best man—agreed!"

"Oh you delightful, lovely child!" This was Madge, rushing at Ethel as if to devour her, but vouchsafing no actual thought beyond the kiss. And Gervaise nodded and went on talking with Aunt Helen; but presently amended the nod on this wise:

"I said yes. If I am here, that means. You know we are on a marching order shortly."

Ethel's heart stood silent a moment, then bounded as if it would burst from her breast. Her eyes flamed with wonder, then fell, trembling and faintness seized upon her.

Within the arch of the folding doors stood a piano, and Gervaise, sitting down, began to trifle with the keys, and sing half under his breath, as if to himself.

"Since there's no help, come let us kiss and part—
Nay, I have done! You got us more of me!
And I am glad, yea glad with all my heart
That thus so cleanly I myself can free.
Shake hands for ever, cancel all our vows;
And when we meet at any time again,
Be it not seen in either of our brows
That we one jot of former love retain.

Now, at the last gasp of love's latest breath,
When, his pulse failing, Passion specifies his—
When Faith is kneeling by his bed of death,
And Innocence is closing up his eyes—
Now, if thou wouldst, when all have given him over,
From death to life thou might'st yet him recover."

The words were quaint, the strain eerie as the moaning and murmuring of the wind, beating up now in strong, regular sweeps against the windows. But Aunt Nellie was asleep again; and Philip and Madge, jesting by the fire, heard neither song nor storm. Gervaise had his shrinking auditor to himself, and knew that, from the half-tender, half-defiant strain, he glided to "Aileen Aroon." Every word is informed with his own relentless will, with tenderest entreaty, with passionate persuasion.

For her there was no Philip, no Madge, no promise. Gervaise was going, and with him would go all the savor and sweetness of life. The long days would drag on aimlessly, and she would pray for speedy death, lest she should meet him again and go mad, as she was now. When unable to bear more she rose quietly away. The music seemed to pursue her, up the stairs, into her dark and quiet room—a sound in the air, spite of door shut fast and head bowed at her bedside.

She tried to pray, and listened instead—to the music, then to the talking finally heard, to the drawing of bolts, and "good-nights" on the stairs, and steps passing her door, and merry fingers tapping thereon as they passed, and last, the gentle stir in the various rooms, dying away into the quiet and hush of a sleeping house.

Then Ethel sat up, and like a ghost. Let those rest who could, sleep was not for her. It was utterly dark in the room, but she easily found her way down to the supper-room, so glowing and bright when she left it, so dark and silent now. As she entered a violent gust of wind and rain almost drove her back. With singular carelessness she had left open the glass door leading on the piazza. She went to close it, but groping about in the dark her hands touched other hands; not ghostly, but warm and human. And growing a little accustomed to the shadow, she descried a still figure looking out at the angry night.

"Fate again," said Gervaise's voice.

Ethel could hardly repress a shriek.

"I did not think of finding you here," she said, trembling.

"I dare be sworn that, else you would not have come; but perhaps you will acknowledge now that destiny is not yours to mould; fate not yours to guide."

"It is late, I must go to bed," said Ethel, hastily.

"I have something to say to you."

"To-morrow."

"You know that I can not speak to you to-morrow."

"I must go."

"Not till you have heard me."

"I will."

She was moving away, but with a rapid stride Gervaise intercepted her, reached the door first, locked it, and put the key in his pocket.

"Now you are in my power," he said. Then going to the table he found the lamp and lighted it, turning it low, and said,

"Gervaise, is this fair? is it manly?" asked Ethel, much agitated.

He came and sat down beside her.

"Foolish child," he said, softly, "do you not know that we could never part so? Though it should dash the thunders of Heaven, I must say that I love you."

"Gervaise!"

"Oh, I know. You are betrothed. You are to marry Philip. He is a good fellow, and in honor and decency you ought to love him, but you can't. The pale flame that you thought love has gone out altogether in the blaze of new possibilities that have showed upon you. You have found out what it is to love with heart and brain, and though you may wish to deny the existence of the sun, it will shine and is spite. Call your moral falsehood if you will; body and soul will revolt, and the revolt will be life-long. Choose whether you will make the misery of three or only one."

Five minutes before Ethel had been nerveless, helpless, but now the very desperation of the crisis roused her to unwonted energy of will, quickness of thought.

"Choose you this day whom you will serve," she murmured, "Jehovah or Baal. Baal's service is pleasant, but the wages are bitter."

"You owe me nothing."

"That the wages of sin is death."

"A truce to preaching, you are in earnest."

"Gervaise, said Ethel, suddenly, "an experience of this sort would, I should think, enlarge the human vision; it is quite a telescopic clearness. How then, if after accepting the sun you mention, I should discover that after all it was only a fixed star and that the veritable sun was blazing away in another direction? It seems to me that such discoveries could scarcely fail to be common in the case you propose."

Gervaise regarded her for an instant with a curious mixture of surprise and indignation, then broke out something out his arms:

"Oh, Ethel, love! darling!" he cried. "Come. Say I love you, and in every thought, with every wish, with all my strength, with all my heart and soul."

Ethel trembled, drew back. He leaned nearer to her, put away her feeble opposing hands, drew her close to his heart.

"You love me also," he whispered, kissing her over and over again.

Ethel answered by tears.

"Dear little tender heart," he murmured, "don't you see that no blame attaches to you? Do you think that I would have left Philip my friend for that, could you have made each other's happiness, I should ever have said what I have to-night?"

"I find not," answered Ethel, wresting herself from his arms, "bidding us do evil that good may come, and I can hardly see how lasting happiness can be based on so unstable a foundation as treachery. No, hear me," as he eagerly tried to speak, "I do love you, even as you said, Gervaise Toussaint. Only to be with you is a rest, a peace, a joy so keen that it is sometimes half like pain. I have no pleasure without wishing you a partner in it: I have no pain without thinking of you as consolation; no wish that I would not rejoice to sacrifice; not even strength to resist you as I do now, were it not given me from God. If there is love, it is what I feel for you; but it is based on our wrong, and what would have been our happiness, did we dare seize it now, would only prove a curse. I shall never marry Philip. I could not with your kisses on my lips, but neither will I ever be your wife."

And by that declaration she abode. Philip and Gervaise marched to the war together; and only to-day I heard kind Mrs. Grundy discussing that sad flirt, Ethel Mason, who had broken her engagement with Philip to flirt with Gervaise Toussaint. "This last, however," added my charitable friend, "is not to be so sought, but cancelled openly off with Philip, leaving her to wear the willow; and, poor thing, she is so cut up about it, she looks wretchedly pale and worn," concluded sapient Mrs. Grundy.

IN HOSPITAL.

WITH the wearying round of the hours, which tardily on creep,
While the pulses flicker low, and life struggles long with death,
While the gloomiest of sombre fears round my restless pillow keep,
I lie in the solemn Chambers of Shadow—a Hospital for the dead.

There are ghastly faces around me, and dim and glassy eyes;
There are painful writhings and groanings, and wrestlings with the enemies:
The air that I breathe is burdened with gaspings and shrieking sighs,
And the horrors of grim Disease fit ever around the dying.

The skies of the southern June bang invisible overhead,
Through the blind a wayward sunbeam has fallen across the bed,
From the street a hollow murmur comes faintly up to my bed—
A token, perhaps, of action and life I may know no more.

Let me still my brain for a moment, and think. How happen I here—
I, who left home a soldier, and long vowed Death for my bride?
Where is my company now—the regiment—is it near?
Ah! I remember at last—that stinging pain in my side.

Let me recall the scene. 'Twas long ere the break of day
When the silent column filed through the dim and misty gray
In the wood,
Seeking the unseen haunt where the sheltered rebel lay,
Ready to stain his red and his soul with loyal blood.

Through the sleeping forest, and up the dark ravine,
Gleaming with bayonets, and stealthily on the move,
Yet with a step and spirit, that life-blood flows like wine,
Spilled at Conflict's own banquet, warm in its crimson joy.

Charge with the bayonet, charge!" the Colonel's voice full yell
Burst from our lips as the column rushed on the rebel fell,
Wavered, and charged again—and before those flames of hell
Reeled in the hopeless shock in mute, heroic despair!

* * * * *

O my brothers who lie with me here in the hospital ward,
Scorning your noble hearts to the agony of your pain,
Ours is the love and the labor, long, heartbreaking, and hard,
Yet let God and our country live shall cure be the gain.

O my more than brothers—my lovers, who toil that day,
Sweetening the bitter cup of defeat with your life's best blood,
Hands invisible reaching down through the glorious fray
Gave you the immortalizing touch of martyrhood!

VERY HARD CASH.

By CHARLES READE, Esq.

AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

CHAPTER XX.

JAMES MARLEY came out of the Bank that morning with nine hundred and four pounds buttoned up tight in the pocket of his leather waistcoat, by a strap; and so to his work; and home at one o'clock to dinner.

At 2 P.M. he was thoughtful; uneasy at 3; perturbed at 4.

He was gardener as well as capitalist: and Mr. Hardie owed him thirty shillings for work.

Now, Hardie was in no pecuniary need, and Marley's in particular, that the £900 in pocket seemed only to make him more penurious.

"I can't afford to go with the creditors," argued Marley: "dividend on thirty shillings? why, that will be about thirty pence; the change for a hard half crown."

He stuck his spade in the soil and made for his employer's house. As he came up the street, Dodd shot out of the Bank radiant, and was about to pass him without speaking; but as he was about to pass him, but Marley stopped him with a right cordial welcome, and told him he had given them all a fright this time.

"What, is it over the town already, that my ship has been wrecked?" And Dodd looked annoyed.

"Wrecked? No; but you have been due this two months, ye know. Wrecked? Why captain, you have been wrecked!" and he looked him all over as if he expected to see a wreck or a broken limb or a bandage somewhere.

"Ay, James, wrecked on the French coast, and lost my chronometer, and a tip-top sextant.

But what of that? I saved it. I have just landed it in the Bank. Good-by: I must shear off; I long to be home."

"Stay a bit, captain," said Maxley: "I am not quite easy in my mind; I saw you come out of Hardie's; I thought in course you had been on to draw: but you says different. Now what was it you did leave behind you at that there shop, if you please: not money?"

"Not money? Only fourteen thousand pounds. Now the man stares! Why it's not mine, James; it's my children's there, good-by" and he was actually off this time. But Maxley stretched his long limbs, and caught him in two strides, and gripped his shoulder without ceremony: "Be you mad? I said he, sternly.

"No, but I begin to think you are."

"That is to be seen," said Maxley, gravely.

"Before I lets you go, you must tell me whether you be jesting, or whether you have really been so simple as to drop fourteen—thousand—pounds at Hardie's?" No judge upon the bench, nor bishop in his stall, could be more impressive than this gardener was when he subdued the vast volume of his voice to a low grave utterance of this secret.

Dodd began to be uneasy: "Why, good Heavens, there is nothing wrong with the old Barkington Bank?"

"Nothing wrong?" roared Maxley: then whispered: "Hoh! I was lead once for slander, and cost me fifty pounds: mostly through a woman it did."

"Man!" cried Dodd, "for my children's sake tell me if you know any thing amiss. After all I'm like a stranger here; more than two years away at a time."

"I'll tell you all I know," whispered Maxley: "'tis the least I can do. What (touring), don't you—think—that I've forgotten you saving your boy out o' that scrape, and getting him a good place in Canada, and—why he'd have been put in prison but for you, and that was the time when my heart and his mother's—and—" The stout voice began to break.

"Oh, better all that now," said Dodd, impatiently. "The Bank! you have grounded me on them."

"Well, I'll tell ye; but you must promise faithful not to go and say I told ye, or you'll get me lead again: and I likes to lie them, but for they to lie me."

"I promise, I promise."

"Well, then, I got a letter to-day from my boy, him as you was so good to, and here 'tis in my breast-pocket.—Lawk! I shall never be come round surely: why, look ee here now, if so be you hadn't been a good friend to he, he wouldn't be where he is, and if so be as how where he is, he couldn't have writ me this here, and then where should you and I be?"

"Belay your jaw and show me this letter," cried David, trembling all over.

"That I would," said Maxley, diving a hand into his breast: "shall I lookee yander now; if there ain't Master Alfred & watching of us two out of his window: and he has got no more eye than a hawk, he have. Step in the passage, captain, and I'll show it you."

He drew him into the passage, and gave him the letter. Dodd ran his eye over it hastily, uttered a cry like a wounded lion, dropped it, over a slight stagger, and rushed out.

Maxley picked up his letter and watched Dodd into the Bank again; and reflected on his work. His heart was warmed at having made a return to the good captain.

His head suggested that he was on the road which leads to libel.

But he had picked up at the assizes a smattering of the law of evidence; so he pocketed the letter in pieces. "There now," said he to himself, "if Hardies do lie me for publishing of this here letter, why they pours their water into a sieve. Ugh!" And with this exclamation he started, and then found his heart was warm to the letter, and ground it furtively into the mud; for a light hand had settled on his shoulder, and a keen eye was close to his face.

It was Alfred Hardie, who had stolen on him like a cat. "I'm land," thought Maxley.

"Maxley, old fellow," said Alfred, in a voice as coaxing as a woman's, "are you in a good humor?"

"Well, Master Halfred, sight of you mostly puts me in one, especially after that there strychnine job."

"Then tell me," whispered Alfred, his eyes sparkling and his face beaming, "who was that you were taking to just now?—was it?—wasn't it?—who was it?"

CHAPTER XXI.

WHILE Dodd stood lowering in the doorway, he was nevertheless making a great effort to control his agitation.

At last he said, in a stern but low voice, in which, however, a quick ear might detect a tremor of agitation: "I have changed my mind, Sir: I require my money back."

At this, though David's face had prepared him, Mr. Hardie's heart sank. He must have time to help for it: he said, faintly, "Certainly. May I ask?"—and there he stopped; for it was hardly prudent to ask any thing.

"No matter:" replied Dodd, his agitation rising even at this slight delay: "Come! my money! I am in haste and will have it."

Hardie drew himself up majestically. "Captain Dodd, this is a strange way of demanding what nobody here disputes."

"Well, I beg your pardon," said Dodd, a little awed by his dignity and fairness: "but I can't help it."

The quick, supple Banker, saw the slight advantage he had gained, and his mind went into a whirl: what should he do? It was death to part with this money and gain nothing by it: sooner tell Dodd of the love affair; and open a treaty on this basis: he clung to this money like limpet to its rock; and so intense and rapid were his thoughts and schemes how to retain it a little longer, that David's apologies buzzed in his ear like the drone of a beetle.

The latter went on to say, "You see, Sir, it's my children's fortune, my boy Edward's, and my little Anna's; and so many have been trying to get it from me, that my head boils up in a moment about it now.—My poor head—You don't seem to understand what I am saying; there then, I am a sailor; I can't go beating and tacking, like you landsmen, with the wind dead ahead: the long and the short is, I have fled in safe here: don't feel It safe nay where, except in my wife's lap. So no more words: here's your receipt; give me back mine."

"Certainly, Captain Dodd. Call to-morrow morning at the Bank, and it will be paid on demand in the regular way: the Bank opens at ten o'clock."

"No, no; I can't wait. I should be dead of anxiety before then. Why not pay it me here, and now? You took it here."

"We never keep deposits four o'clock; but we do not disobure after three. This is the system of all Banks."

"Banks and nonsense: if you are open to receive money, you are open to pay it."

"If any one has not entirely ignorant of business, you would be aware that these things are not done in this way: money received is placed to account, and we do not ask the only person who can honor your draft on it: but stop; if the cashier is in the Bank, we may make it for you: I believe he is; and see whether he has left: and, if not, send him in to me directly." The cashier took his cue, and ran out.

David was silent.

The cashier presently returned, saying, with a disappointed air: "The cashier has been gone this quarter of an hour."

David murmured an ominous silence.

"That is unfortunate," remarked Hardie. "But, after all, it is only till to-morrow morning: a gift I should think unnecessary. Sir: and I feel that all these precautions we are obliged to take must seem unreasonable to you: but experience dictates them, and prudence; and, were we to deviate from it, our friends' money would not be safe in our hands as it always has been at present."

David eyed him sternly, but let him run on. What he was saying was perfectly reasonable. David said, quietly: "So you can't give me my own, because your cashier has carried it away?"

Hardie replied: "Not at all, because he has locked it up; and carried away the key."

"It is not in this room, then?"

"No."

"Are you sure?"

"Quite sure."

"What, not in that safe of yours, there?"

"Certainly not," said Hardie, stoutly.

"Open the safe, then," said the other.

"Open the safe? What for?"

"To show me It is not in the right-hand partition of that safe; there, there." And David pointed at the very place where it was.

Mr. Hardie dignified Mr. Hardie felt ready to sink with shame: a kind of shudder passed through him, and he was about to comply, heart-sick: but then recovering himself in the rage of disappointment, stung him, and he turned in defiance: "You are impertinent, Sir: and I shall not respond your curiosity by your insolence by showing you the contents of my safes."

"My money! my money!" cried David, fiercely: "I've been robbed: I'll not listen to them: I know you now for what you are; a thief. I see you put it there: and a liar is always a thief. You want to steal my children's money: I'll have your life first. My money! ye pirate! I'll struggle for it with you." He sprang with him, purple with rage, and shot out his long threatening arm, and brown fingers working in the air. "D'ye know what I am?" he cried, and shook that tried to rob me of it? I threatened him with those fingers, and he was in a rage instantly: out of him; he came for my children's money, and I killed him so—so—so and I'll kill you, you thief! you liar! you scoundrel!"

His face black and convulsed with rage, and his outstretched fingers working convulsively, and lunging for a rogue's throat, made the resolute Hardie quake; he whipped out of the private door's way, and got behind it, and was trembling.

"Hush! no violence!" he gasped: "I'll give you your money this moment, you ruffian."

While he unlocked the safe with trembling hands, Dodd stood like a man petrified; his arms and fingers stretched out and threatening; and Skinner saw him pull at his neck-tie furiously, like one choking.

Hardie got the notes and bills all in a hurry, and held them out to Dodd.

He white with his consternation, and surprise, and indignation, he received a back-handed blow on the eye that dazzled him for an instant: and there was David with his arms struggling wildly, and his fists clenched, his face purple, and his eyes distorted as that collie was seen but the whites; the next moment his teeth gnashed loudly together, and he fell headlong on the floor with a concussion so astounding, that the windows rattled, and the room shook violently; while the dust rose in a cloud.

A loud ejaculation burst from Hardie and Skinner.

And then there was an awful silence.

CHAPTER XXII.

WHEN David fell senseless on the floor Mr. Hardie was somewhat confused by the back-handed blow from his convulsed and whirling arm. But Skinner ran to him, held up his head and whipped off his neckcloth.

Then Hardie turned to seize the bell and ring for assistance; but Skinner shook his head and said it was useless; this was no faint: did Betty Lee help him?

"It is a bad day's work, Sir," said he, trembling: "he is dead, I fear."

"Dead? Heaven forbid!"

"Apoplexy!" whispered Skinner.

"Run for a doctor then. Lose no time: Don't let us have his blood on our hands. Dead?"

And he repeated the word this time in a very different tone, and one too strange and significant to escape Skinner's quick ear. However, he laid David's head gently down, and rose from his knees to obey.

What did he see now, but Mr. Hardie, with his back turned, putting the notes and bills softly into the safe again out of sight. He saw, comprehended, and took his own course with equal rapidity.

"Come, run!" cried Mr. Hardie, "I'll take care of him; every moment is precious."

"He wants to get rid of me!" thought Skinner. "No, Sir," said he, "he ruled by me: let us be sure he is dead. He won't live; and we shall get all the blame if we doctor him."

Already egotism had whispered Hardie, "How lucky I got that money!" and now a still guiltier thought flashed through him: he did not try to conquer it: he only trembled at himself for entertaining it.

"At least give him air!" said he, in a quavering voice, consenting in a crime, yet compromising with his better nature, weakly.

He threw the window open with great zeal, with precipitation, as he wanted to occupy himself as well as Skinner. With equal pardie he helped carry Dodd to the window; it opened on the garden: this done, the self-deceivers put their heads together, and soon managed matters so that two porters, known to Skinner, were introduced into the premises, and informed that a gentleman had fallen down in a fit, and they were to take him home to his friends, and not to the hospital, where might be an inquest, and that was so disagreeable to a gentleman like Mr. Hardie. The men were used to carry for a sovereign apiece. It was all done in a great hurry and agitation, and, while Skinner accompanied the men to see that they did not bilk, Mr. Hardie went into the garden to breathe and think. But he could do neither.

He must have a look at it.

He stole back, opened the safe, and examined the notes and bills.

He fingered them.

They seemed to grow to his fingers.

He lusted after them.

He said to himself, "The matter has gone too far to stop; I must go on borrowing this money of the Dodds: and make it the basis of a large fortune: it will be best for all parties in the end."

He put it into his pocket-bo, the pocket-book into his breast-pocket; and passed by his private door into the house: and to his breakfast-room.

Ten minutes later he left the house with a little black bag in his hand.

CHAPTER XXIII.

"WHAT will ye give me, and I'll tell ye," said Maxley to Alfred Hardie.

"Five pounds."

"That is too much."

"Five shillings then."

"That is too little. Lookee here, your garden owes me thirty shillings for work: suppose you pays me that, and that will save me from going to your Dad for it."

Alfred consented readily, and paid the money. Then Maxley told him it was Captain Dodd he had been talking with.

"I thought so," said he: "cried Alfred joyfully, "but I was afraid to believe it: it was too delightful: Maxley, you're a trump: you have made me happier than you have rewarded me of; some fool has gone and reported the Agra wrecked; look here" and he showed him his letter. "Isabel, Isabel, how only just come; so I haven't been miserable long."

"Well, be sure, news does first nateowadays. He have been wrecked, for that matter. He then surprised Alfred by telling him all he had just learned from Dodd; and was going on to let out about the fourteen thousand pounds, when he recollected this was the Banker's son; and stopped short, and concluded, judging others by himself, would be apt to turn their backs on him. Now he was silent, and was disposed to do him a good turn, when he could without hurting James Maxley. "Mr. Alfred," said he, "I know you feel better than you do: you be ruled by me, you'll run it: you put on your Sunday coat this minute; and off like a shot to Abbey Farm: you'll get there before the captain: he have got a little business to do first; that is neither here nor there: besides you be a young chap and not a man. You be the first to tell Missus Dodd the good news; and, when the captain comes, you may join aside Miss Esther and don't you be shy and shamefaced: take him when his heart is warm, and tell him why you are there: 'I love her, dear,' says you. He be only a sailor, and they never has no sense nor prudence: he is amost sure to take you by the hand, at such a time: and once you get his word, he'll stand good, to his own hurt; he's one of that sort, there is silly old beast."

A good deal of this was unintelligible to Alfred; but the advice seemed good; advice generally does when it squares with our own wishes: he thanked Maxley, left him, made a hasty toilet, and ran to Albion Villa.

Sarah opened the door to him; in tears.

The news of the wreck had come to Albion Villa just half an hour ago; and in that half hour they had tasted more misery than hitherto their peaceful lot had brought them in years. Mrs. Dodd was praying and crying in her room; Miss had put on her bonnet, and was coming down in deep distress to send a servant, to go down to the quay and learn more, if possible.

Alfred saw her on the stairs, and at sight of her pale, agitated face, flew to her.

She held out both hands piteously to him: "Oh, Alfred!"

"Good news!" he panted. "He is alive; Maxley has seen him—I have seen him—He will be here directly—pray don't cry your eyes—calm your fears—He is safe; he is well: hurrah! hurrah!"

The girl's pale face flushed red with hope, then pale again with emotion, then rose red with transcendent joy: "Oh, bless you! bless you!" she murmured, in her sweet gurgle so full of heart: then took his head passionately with both her hands, as if she was going to kiss him: uttered a little inarticulate cry of love and gratitude over him, then turned and flew up the stairs crying "Mamma! mamma!" and burst into her mother's room. When two such Immoderate meet, as Alfred and Julia, expect quick work.

What happened in Mrs. Dodd's room may be imagined: and soon both Sarah came hastily out to Alfred, and he found himself in the drawing-room seated between them, and holding a hand of each, and receiving the most delicious soothing and assuring them; Julia believed him at a word, and experienced the unspeakable relief and anticipation of the joyful meeting; Mrs. Dodd cost him more trouble: her soft hand trembled still in his; she could not believe in her salvation. But, when he told her he with his own eyes had seen Captain Dodd talking to Maxley, and gathered from Maxley that he had been landed on the coast of France, and lost his chronometer and his sextant, these details commanded credit; both were sure of it: the captain's dressing-case ordered to be got ready: the cook put on her meter-hat, and Alfred invited to stay and dine with the long-expected one: and the house of mourning became the house of joy.

"And that is all was he who brought the good news," whispered Julia to her mother; "and that is so sweet."

"Yes, dear," said Mrs. Dodd, "he will make even me love him. The £14,000! I hope that was not lost in the wreck."

"Oh, mamma! who cares? when his own dear, sweet, precious life has been in danger, and is restored to us by a miracle. Do let me come? I shall scold him for keeping us waiting: you know I am not a bit afraid of him, though he is a captain. I will be respectful to say, I govern him with a rod of no matter what. Do, do, let us all three put on our bonnets, and run and meet him. I will not run far: so you some only the very first days."

Mrs. Dodd: "Well: wait a few minutes, and then, if he is not here, you two shall go. I dare hardly trust myself to meet my darling husband in the open street."

Julia ran to Alfred: "If he does not come in ten minutes, you and I may go and meet him."

"You are a dear, good, sensible girl."

"You are another," said Julia, haughtily. "Oh, dear, I can't sit down: and I hate flattery. I want pacing. A waltz! a waltz! then one can go mad with joy without startling propriety: I can't answer for the consequences if I don't let off a little, little, happiness."

"That I will," said Mrs. Dodd; "for I am as happy as you, and happier." She played a waltz.

Julia's eyes were a challenge: Alfred started up and took her hand, and soon the gay young things were whirling round, the happiest pair in England.

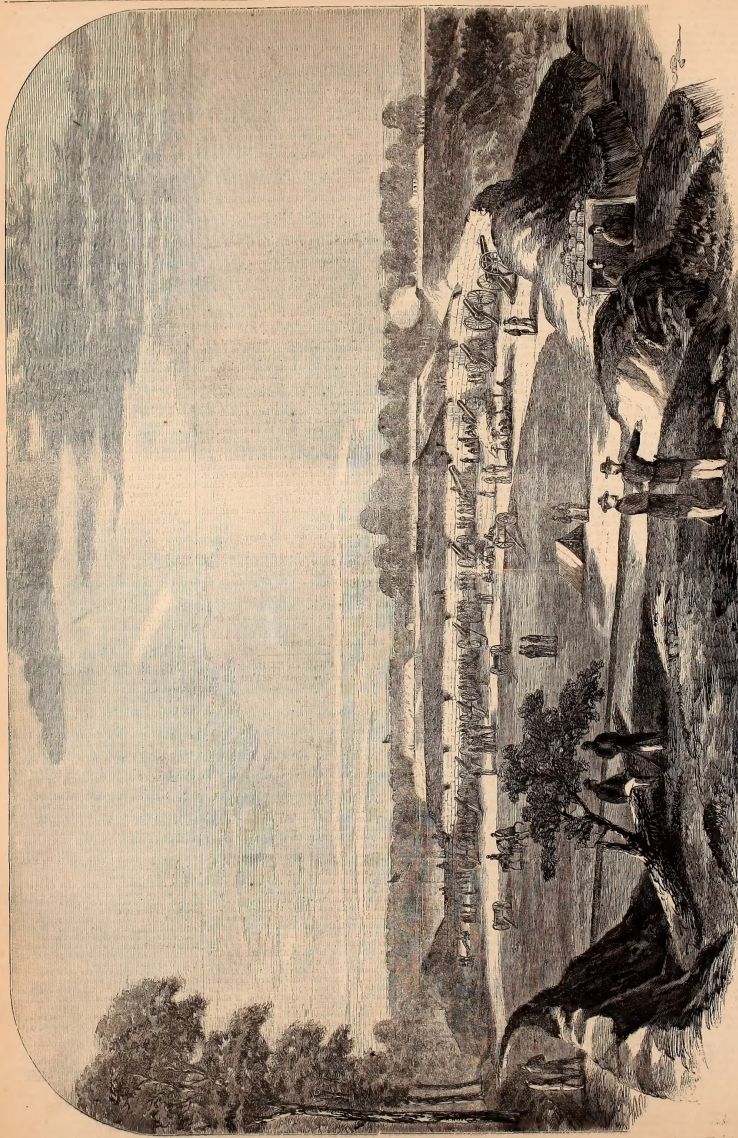
But in the middle of the joyous whirl, Julia's quick ear, on the watch all the time, heard the gate swing open, she glided like a bird from Alfred's arm, and ran to the window. Arrived there, she made three swift vertical bounds like a girl with a skipping rope, only her hands were clapping in the air at the same time; then down the stairs, screaming: "It's he, it's he! he's coming, coming, coming."

Alfred ran after her.

Mrs. Dodd, unable to race with such antelopes, slipped quietly out into the little balcony.

Julia had seen two men carrying a trestle with a turpaulin over it, and a third walking beside. Dodd's heavy sea chest had been more than once carried home that way. She met the men at the door, and answered them with questions: "Is it his clothes? then he wasn't so much wrecked after all. Is he with you? to be coming directly? Why don't you tell me?"

The porters at first were the stolid impassive form of their class; but when the bright young creature questioned them, brimming over with ardor and joy, their countenances fell, and they looked foolish.



The little sharp-faced man, who was walking beside the other, stepped forward to reply to Julia.

He was interrupted by a terrible scream from the balcony.

Mrs. Dodd was leaning wildly over it, with dilating eyes, and quivering hand that pointed like spears, and all her innocent joy frozen it a moment.

The turpaulin was snatch there, and a man's hand and part of his arm dangled helpless out.

The hand was blanched: and wore a well-known ring.

LAST WORDS.

He knelt beside her dying bed;
"Speak, daughter, speak!" the old man said;
And she, "'Tis dark; where is he—where?
I fain would smooth his wavy hair."
"O leave me not, my child," he said;
"And she, "I know, when I am dead,
You'll let him for a little space
Gaze on my still and shrouded face."
"Child, he is here," the father cried;
Her feeble arms she open spread,
Her lips to his she strove to press,
And clasp'd him in a mute caress.
"Forgive!" the father cried, "forgive!
To be his wife wilt thou not live?"
"I do forgive, and bless"—she said,
Her eyelids fluttered, she was dead!
Poor lover! poorer father! he
Through life that thin white face will see.

THE TAKING OF VICKSBURG.

We publish on page 465 a new portrait of Major-General Grant, the hero of Vicksburg. We have the portrait in a sentence represent him as he was at the commencement of the war, with a flowing beard. He has since trimmed this hirsute appendage, and now looks as he is shown in our picture. For a life of the General we refer to page 365, No. 236, of Harper's Weekly. He has not been appointed by the President Major-General in the regular army.

On page 468 we reproduce a sketch by our special artist, Mr. Theodore R. Davis, showing the relief sent to Vicksburg from our river flotilla, with the Mississippi above and below Vicksburg. Mr. Davis writes:

"THE VIEW FROM THE RIFLE-PITS AT THE EXTREME RIGHT.

"HEAD-QUARTERS OF MAJOR-GENERAL M'PHERSON, June 12, 1863.

"The scene at this point embraces so much that the public is familiar with, that has been mapped, sketched, and written of, that the reader's fancy must be of interest to many. It shows the very commanding position passed so often by our fleets, the levee batteries that sank the boat of the gallant Bache—the Cincinnati—Young's Point, etc. Below is Warrenton, and faint in the distance Grand Gulf. Even the 'Bohemians' have an interest in the sketch, for is not the work upon which the pencil is poised the very battery that disturbed their quietude the last summer, and more lately sank the little tug which sent upon an involuntary journey to the 'Dixie' Collins, Brown, and Richardson? The soldiers in the trench give a view of trench life; while some smoke, read a book, play on hand, others are on the qui vive for a good chance, which means, in soldier parlance, an opportunity to end the chapters of some rebel's book of life.

On page 469 we give a view of Vicksburg as it was before the siege, and three pictorial sketches by Mr. Davis, showing the operation of mining a hostile work. Mr. Davis thus describes them:

"MINING THE REBEL WORK FORT HILL.

"HEAD-QUARTERS OF MAJOR-GENERAL M'PHERSON, June 20, 1863.

"At this moment we have effected a lodgment in the work known as Fort Hill. This has been done by shoving a portion of the parapet in, as was specially converted into a bastion work for two guns.

"I have sketched the effect of a hand grenade in the trench, showing, at the same time, the entrance of the gallery leading to the mine.

"I have also sketched the miners busily at work far under the rebel wall. The different mines Gour in numbers were exploded at the same moment. The dust and smoke had not cleared away when a portion of General Logan's division dashed into the saps and trenches, from which the rebel had been withdrawn prior to the explosion. From the advances which they scattered the rifle-pits made by the blast. They were soon busily engaged the engineer corps, under Chief Engineer Captain Hickenlooper, who, with significant coolness, held his post under a severe fire. The lodgment was soon complete, and the position ours.

By-and-by, completing the history, we append the following particulars of the surrender. A dispatch dated Head-quarters General Grant, near Vicksburg, July 3, 8 P.M., said:

At eight this morning flags of truce appeared before A. J. Smith's front, when Major-General Bowen and United Messengers were met immediately into our lines. They bore a communication from General Pemberton of the following purport:

"Although I feel confident of my ability to resist your arms indefinitely, in order to stop the further effusion of blood, I propose that you appoint three commissioners to meet three whom I shall select, to arrange such terms as may best accomplish the result."

Grant soon replied substantially in these words:

"The appointment of Commissioners is unnecessary. While I should be glad to stop any unnecessary effusion of blood, the only terms which I will entertain are those of unconditional surrender. At the same time, myself, and men, and officers of the army, are willing to testify to the distinguished gallantry with which the defence of Vicksburg has been conducted."

At eleven o'clock the messengers returned. This afternoon General Grant met General Pemberton between the lines, and after an hour's consultation settled the surrender. General Pemberton urged that the officers might be paroled here and furnished rations to carry them to their lines; to which the surrender General peremptorily said, the drawings of the plan, General Grant consented.

The correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial gives the following account of the interview between Generals Grant and Pemberton:

General Pemberton then entered a personal interview which was granted by Grant at 3 P.M. The latter, with his staff, appeared on the hills where our advance works were. Here the party halted, until General Pemberton appeared, accompanied by General Bowen and Colonel Montgomery. On the crest of the opposite hills were rifle-pits and forts, crowded with men. In the open in front of fruit trees of figs and peaches met the contending heroes. Thousands of soldiers looked upon this strange scene. Two men who had been lieutenants in the same regiment in Mexico now met as foes, with all the world looking upon them. The one the country's glory, the other his country's shame.

While they had approached within a few feet there was a halt and silence.

Colonel Montgomery spoke—"General Grant, General Pemberton." They shook hands politely. It was evident Pemberton was mortified. He said: "I was at Monterey and Buena Vista. We had terms and conditions there." Grant responded: "I have no terms." They were then on the grass and talked more than an hour. Grant smoked all the time. Pemberton played with a piece of grass and leaves. Great hastily agreed to parole them, allowing the officers each to keep a horse.

It was a polite thing. The dread of going North, and the fear of harsh treatment, had been among the most deluding causes. He proved to his acquaintance that the Government was not waging war in the way of transportation and rations. They feared the Fourth of July-would be celebrated in Richmond. Grant told them that he should not exchange prisoners. Both armies are gratified with the result. Grant and his staff ride with Pemberton when office, while some of them have not tasted for a year.

A correspondent of the Missouri Democrat says:

At ten o'clock, of the 4th, General Grant's division marched into and garrisoned the city. The bands played the national airs of the succeeding forces. The city was surrounded by thousands of Federal and rebel soldiers, who for the first time in weeks stood unarmed in close vicinity above the rifle-pits; and during all three weeks had been within five yards of each other.

General Grant came slowly to the place of rendezvous, dismounting a cigar, and apparently the only unexcited person on the vast assemblage.

The Herald correspondent telegraphs by way of Cairo:

General M'Pherson received the formal surrender. The terms allow the officers and men to be paroled here, the latter to retain their side arms and knapsacks and private property. They will be escorted beyond our lines and then marched without arms to Jackson, Miss.

General Logan's division marched into the city at 10 A.M. Major-General Lieutenant-General Strong hoisted the Stars and Stripes on the Court-House.

Colonel Wilson is Provost-Marshal of the city, and Quartermaster Lieutenant-Colonel Bowman.

We have taken over 27,000 prisoners, besides about 4000 non-combatants, 300 field-pieces, 50 siege guns, 60,000 stand of arms, ammunition, locomotives, cars, a few steamboats, and fifty-seven stand of colors.

Among the prisoners are Lieutenant-General Pemberton, Major-General Forney, Major-General Forney, and Brevet-Brigadiers Green and about one hundred and fifty colonels.

There are 5000 men in the hospital, half of whom are wounded. Only one hundred and fifty of our men are reported ill or duty. The stock of provisions was almost exhausted. Only a few days' rations remained for the rebels.

Of ammunition for heavy guns they had a fair supply, but for field-guns and musketry they were short. Eight days in a mule-pen, with little food, have reduced the mules to skeletons, and rice, and these were all the supplies they had, except a little unground corn.

THE GREAT RIVER BATTERY AT PORT HUDSON.

We present our readers on page 476 with a birds-eye view of the great river battery erected by our forces for the reduction of Port Hudson, and which is placed at the extreme left of our line, close upon the Mississippi River. Our correspondent sends us the following description:

"I rode out yesterday afternoon (the 24th June), in company with Major G. B. Halsted, General Augur's Adjutant-General, and Major Forney, of the Sixth Illinois Cavalry, to visit the great battery at our left, which I have seen for days past in active preparation. The long range of Dwight's head-quarters, and the long range of abandoned rebel head-quarters, we plunged into the woods leading toward the river, and after mounting a steep wooded ascent came suddenly upon this magnificent work, about 200 yards from the river.

"The scene presented was very striking—and, indeed, astonishing, considering the time in which these enormous works had been constructed.

"This battery was not commenced until Tuesday the 23d, under the direction of the sovereign of Tuesday the 23d, under the immediate supervision of that able and indefatigable officer, Major J. Lacey, of the Fourth Wisconsin, and chief engineer officer of General Sherman's staff. To form it he had three companies of Louisiana Engineers (First Regiment of the Corps d'Afrique), three from Col. Robinson, and two regiments of Ullman's brigade, making about 600 negroes in all, who worked day and night on the parapets of the city, and Quinby's command on the rear parties of 700 relieving each other alternately.

"The battery mounts one 9-inch navy gun, three 24-pounders, two 30-pound Parrotts, three 20-pound Parrotts, two 8-inch howitzers, and six Napoleon guns: there are, therefore, three 9-inch and one 8-inch howitzer in a separate battery alongside. The magazine compartment is most complete; and away on the left of the battery, where the declivity of the hill toward the river, a magnificent spring of water has been discovered. The breast-works are formed of cotton-bales and sand-bags covered with earth; and the whole presents one of the most splendid pieces of scientific engineering ever seen.

"What most astonished me on arriving at these works was to see the carelessness with which, on the parapets; and the more so when, on mounting them myself, I saw how dreadfully near we were to the rebel lines. Not more than 600 yards. The enemy were also standing and gazing listlessly at us. They could not have failed to see that we were looked as if we could have thrown stones at each other. On our ramparts was proudly floating the good old flag, and right in our teeth the Confederate rag. The first coup d'œil, as the whole scene burst upon me—with the little intervening ravine, the rebel works, and waiting for the word to open—was perfectly magnificent.

"The first impression I had was that the enemy did not fire at us, or we at them? The soldiers told me that, by some tacit understanding among themselves, the two sides had ceased worrying each other for days past. What the object of the rebels can be in permitting us undisturbed to erect such formidable works under their very noses passes the comprehension of every one.

"The rebel batteries are very near the river, and over which their flag is planted, is called the 'Citadel,' and is the highest and strongest work in Port Hudson. We are also on equally high ground, and our battery quite as lofty as theirs, although it may not appear so in the picture, owing to the elevated point of view it was necessary to select for seeing the surrounding country.

"Although not playing on our breast-works, the rebels—while I was busily sketching—fired several times down the ravine toward the river, at the negroes who were still busy in the lower intrenchments. I was told that I had heard of this 'tacit understanding' between us and them, their music was unpleasantly near and suggestive. When these last batteries open on us from their thunder against each other the struggle will be terrible."

OUR MILITIA AT CARLISLE.

We publish on page 477 an illustration of the SHELLING OF THE TOWN OF CARLISLE, PENNSYLVANIA, BY THE REBELS, from a sketch by our special artist Mr. Thomas Nast. Our militia, comprising, among other regiments, the 22d and 87th, both from this city, marched from Harrisburg on 30th June, and arrived at Carlisle next morning, after some skirmishing with the rebels. That evening the rebel commander sent three several summonses to the commanding officer at Carlisle, demanding the town; but old General Smith had no notion of the kind, and refused in terms more peremptory than polite. The rebels then, at 5 P.M., began to shell the place. Our troops were partly in Main Street and partly in the outskirts of the town, lying quiet in the dark, unable to reply and exposed to the shells. Yet not a man wavered or skulked; and by good Providence no one was killed, though some were slightly wounded. The evacuation, next morning our boys moved, and the rebels skedaddled.

Surgeon-General Hammond,

By ordering Calomel and destructive mineurals from the supply table, has conferred a blessing on our sick soldiers. Let him not stop here. Let him order the discontinuance of Brandreth's Pills in favor of BRANDRETH'S PILLS in the place thereof. Then will commence a "new era" in the practice of Medicine, which would then become empathetically

THE HEALING ART.

I have for thirty years taught that no diseased action could be cured by mercury or tartar emetic. That the human body could only be "made whole" by "vegetable food"—animal food being, in fact, condemned vegetables.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS should be in every Military Hospital. These Pills cure BILIOUS DIARRHŒA, CHRONIC DIARRHŒA, CHRONIC DYSENTERY, and all Fevers and Affections of the Bowels, sooner and more surely than any medicine in the world. BRANDRETH'S PILLS in a single case should be taken night and morning. Read Directions and get new style.

CASE OF ROSCOE K. WATSON.

Dr. B. Brandreth—

New York:

SIR: I was a private in Co. F, 17th regiment, New York Vols. While at Harrison's Landing and on the Rappahannock near Falmouth, I and many of the Company were sick with bilious diarrhœa. The Army Surgeon did not cure us, and I was reduced to skin and bone. Among the Company were quite a number of members who had received in part Brandreth's Sing Sing. They were not sick, because they used Brandreth's Pills. These men prevailed upon me and others to use the Pills, and we were all cured in from five to five days. After this our boys used Brandreth's Pills for the typhus fever, colds, and rheumatism, and in no case did they fail to restore health.

Out of gratitude to you for my good health, I send you this letter, which, if necessary, the entire Company would sign.

I am, respectfully yours,

ROSCOE K. WATSON.

Harper's Hand-Book

FOR

Travellers in Europe and the East.

Being a Guide through France, Switzerland, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Sicily, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Southern Russia, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Spain, and Great Britain and Ireland. By W. Pembroke Fetridge. With a Map embracing Colored Routes of Travel in the above countries, and a New Railroad Map. Revised and Enlarged Edition. 12mo. Cloth, $2.00; Leather, Tucks, $2.50.

The object of this work is to give a distinct and clear outline of travel through the principal States of Europe, to give the cost of travelling the different routes, the manner of doing it, the different principles "style" and works of Art in the leading cities, the laws expected by custodians, &c. By carefully attention to the "Hand-Book," the traveller will find himself the gainer by fifty per cent.

The favorable success of Harper's Hand-Book, first published last year has fully realized the expectations of the publishers. It is now being sent out when a traveller has crossed the Atlantic without a copy in his possession. The work is reliable, and is the only "Hand-Book published in the United States, and the only reference to which can be relied upon for information.

The entire work is revised by the author, who visits Europe for that purpose.

Harper's Hand-Book is for sale at all the principal Book stores in the United States, and all derive much information from a perusal of this useful work.

HUBBARD BRO'S
IMPORTERS of WATCHES
NEW YORK.

Are offering the cheapest, most accurate, durable, and satisfactory Lever in the American market! The article especially deserving public attention at this time is their

Railway Timekeepers,
WITH HEAVY STERLING SILVER CASES,
ESPECIALLY ADAPTED FOR ARMY USE.

The newly-invented Keystone importation has been receiving the most favorable notices from the press of all parts of the country. The New York Medals of July 23d, 63, says: "We have been shown by the importers, Messrs. Hubbard Bro's, a watch which, in point of excellence, is what they most appropriately term them the Railway Timekeeper. It is in a superbly finished Silver Watch, which is warranted to keep the most accurate time in all climates. The beauty of these timekeepers is only equalled by their accuracy."

The RAILWAY TIMEKEEPER has HEAVY GOLD STRIPED WATCH CASES, hunting pattern, with fine dials, handsome gold hands, with superior regulated movement, warranted to run and keep excellent time! Price per case of half dozen, $84. By mail, $1 65 additional for postage. Each watch in a neat morocco box. Should not fail by at from $20 to $50 each. Not sold in quantities of less than six.

Magic Time Observers,

THE PERFECTION OF MECHANISM!

BEING A NURSING OR OPEN FACE, OR LADY'S OR GENTLEMAN'S WATCH COMBINED, WITH FRONT DIAL AND WINDING INSTRUMENT.

The N. Y. Illustrated News, in the issue of Jan. 10th, 1863, on page 147, voluntarily says: "We have been shown a most admirable specimen of this day's progress in the New York Watch Factories. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and undoubtedly the best time-keeping watches for general and reliable use ever offered. It has within it and connected with its machinery its own winding instrument, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The cases of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outer one being fine 16 carat gold. It has the improved ruby jewels, lever escapement, and is warranted as a correct timepiece." Price, superbly engraved, per case of half dozen, $336. Sterling Watches, in hunting cases, from those proposing to buy at wholesale, $35. By mail the postage is 25 cents; if registered, 50 cents additional required.

We have no agents or travelers. Buyers must deal with us direct ordering from this advertisement. Terms, cash with the order. Remittances may be made in United States money or draft payable to our order in the city. If you wish goods sent by express, we will forward to the package with your order. Correspondents will please name the paper from which they make selections. To prevent errors they might otherwise occur. Write your address in full. Letters and Letters at our risk. Goods will be suggested to call in person, when it is convenient for them to do so.

CEDAR MOUNTAIN.—AUGUST 9, 1862.

IT was a rare good fortune to our arms,
That when the flushed foe through the mountains poured,
He found there by the rushing river Rod
One whose calm soul was stranger to alarms.
Serene amid the conflicts fiery horror;
Master of fate; of his arm spirit bold:
Like that stout knight on whose firm mail the sword
Clashed, shivering, glanced, nor hurt the fiery charger.
An IRON MAN! In happier days that name
Hailed him the peaceful champion of the North!
And now the fateful years have branded forth
Its splendid prophecy in the battle's flame.
Twice-fortunate brow, where, proudly darkening down,
The warrior-laurel shades the civic crown!

PORT HUDSON.—JULY 9, 1863.

Again by name the listening nation thrills!
Oh Victory, run with wax'n portentate roar,
Course thy rough wooing by the Western shore,
As once amid Virginia's breezy hills.
The mighty thunder of thy triumph fills
The gulfy South; its swashy colors pour
Through treason-haunted regions, evermore
Waking wild whispers, and the murderous ills
Of bondage wither with the potent light
Of hope; for slavery death-stricken lies
Where the vague flame of thy black warriors flies.
The bloody spectre trembles the dread sight
Of woe and war fade as the dawn grows bright,
And day comes flushing up the tranquil skies.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 1, 1863.

THE RIOTS.

WHEN we wrote last week the New York riots had just commenced, and there was some doubt how far they might extend and where they might culminate. They are now, to all outward appearance, substantially over. We see no reason, however, to doubt the explosions expressed in our last issue. The outbreak was the natural consequence of pernicious teachings widely scattered among the ignorant and excitable populace of a great city; and the only possible mode of dealing with it was stern and bloody repression. Had the mob been attacked with grape and canister on Monday, when the first disturbance took place, it would have been a saving of life and property. But the forbearance been more general, and the bloodshed more profuse than it was, on Thursday, the city would have enjoyed a longer term of peace and tranquillity than we can now count upon.

It is about as idle now to argue the question of the $300 clause in the Conscription Act as it is to debate the abstract right of secession. Before Monday night the riot had got far beyond the question of the draft. Within an hour after the destruction of the Provost Marshal's office the rioters had forgotten all about the $300 question, and were engrossed with villainous projects of murder, arson, and pillage. It was not in order to avoid the draft that the colored orphan asylum was burnt; that private houses were sacked; that inoffensive colored persons were beaten, mutilated, and murdered; that Brooks's clothing establishment and a score of other smaller stores were pillaged; that private citizens were robbed in open daylight in the public streets, beaten and maimed; that the metropolis of the country was kept for nearly a week in a state of agonizing terror and suspense. For these outrages the draft was merely the pretext; the cause was the natural turbulence of a heterogeneous population, aggravated by the false teachings of despicable politicians and their newspaper organs.

Some excuse dwelt upon the fact that the rioters were uniformly Irish, and hence argue that our trouble arises from the perversity of the Irish race. But how do these theorists explain the fact that riots precisely similar to that of last week have occurred within our time at Paris, Madrid, Naples, Berlin, Breslau, and Vienna; and that the Lord George Gordon riots in London, before our time, far surpassed our New York riots in every circumstance of atrocity? Turbulence is no exclusive attribute of the Irish character: it is common to all mobs in all countries. It leaves in this city that, in our working classes, the Irish element largely preponderates over all others, and if the populace acts as a populace Irishmen are naturally prominent therein. It happens, also, that, from the limited opportunities which the Irish enjoy for education in their own country, they are more easily misled by designing and unscrupulous politicians, when they come here, than Germans or men of other races. The impulsiveness of the Celt, likewise, prompts him to be foremost in every outburst, whether for a good or for an evil purpose. But it must be remembered, in pollution of the disgrace which, as Archbishop Hughes says, the riots of last week have heaped upon the Irish name, that in many wards of the city the Irish were during the late riot stanch friends of law and order: that Irishmen helped to save the colored orphans in the asylum from the hands of the rioters; that a large proportion of the police, who behaved throughout the riot with the most exemplary gallantry, are Irishmen; that the Roman Catholic priesthood in a man used their influence on the side of the law; and that perhaps the most scathing rebuke administered to the riot was written by an Irishman—JAMES T. BRADY.

It is important that this riot should teach us something more useful than a revival of Know-Nothing principles. We have had enough of —what we should have known before, but communities like individuals learn nothing except from experience—that riots are the direct and inevitable diseases of great cities, epidemics, like small-pox and cholera, which must be treated scientifically, upon logical principles, and in the light of large experience. In old cities where the authorities know how to treat riots, and never cease to grape and canister, they never occur twice in a generation, one lesson being sufficient for the most hot-blooded rioter; in other places, where less vigorous counsels prevail, the disease is checked and cured for a time, but breaks out afresh at intervals of a few months or years. The secret is, of course, that by the latter method, the populace are thoroughly imbued with a conviction of the power of the authorities, and of their ability and determination to crush a riot at any cost—a lesson remembered through life; while in the latter case, the half-quelled rioters are allowed to go away feeling that the police and they may after all be the stronger party, and the Government the weaker. Hence it is that while the baton is the proper weapon with the populace in times of peace and order, the rifle and the howitzer are the only merciful weapons in times of riot.

It is very essential, in suppressing a riot, that the rioters should have no excuse for accusing their opponents of being in any way foreigners or strangers. If it had been true, as has been stated during the recent riot, that the issue was between "the people" and "United States soldiers," the former would have been fought with ferocity than they did, knowing that their opponents were "the people" like themselves. It would have a bad effect, as every one can see, to send for troops from New England or Pennsylvania to put down a riot in New York. But if we are to put down our own riots, citizens indentified in the preservation of peace and order must be willing to tender their services. It is due to truth to say that the citizens of New York did not very fairly respond to the appeal of the call of the Mayor and Governor for volunteers to suppress the late riot. Of 400 muskets which fell idle at the armories, it is believed that only 80 found men to carry them, though urgent appeals for men were made by the authorities and the officers of the militia. We do not for a moment expect to keep the peace unless we are prepared —one and all of us—to turn out in cases of emergency, and fight.

It is just possible that further disturbances may occur. That the draft will be enforced, at any cost, in the city of New York as in other parts of the country, we have no doubt; but it will not be done without a draft to fill up the depleted ranks of the army. There are many ways in which mechanics and laborers can, by combining together, render it impossible against the draft without breaking the laws. If they choose to proceed thus they will have the aid of every man who has money to spare. But if there is to be any more burning and sacking of houses, and murdering of negroes—any more attempts to "clean out" localities of "the niggers who live by law"—the consequences will be so terrible that mothers will relate the tale to their children with a shudder for years and years to come.

THE LOUNGER.

"THE PEOPLE."

DURING the raging of the riot there was a constant attempt made by the rioters to arrogate to represent the rioters as "the people." "Attacking one of the earliest bulletins of the proceedings of the riot, the Tribune declared that "the property of private citizens and buildings of public charity, was "Procession of the People!" The firing upon the furious crowd who were hindering and hanging inoffensive persons of an unfortunate race, was denounced as an "attack upon the People by the Provost Guard!" The rioters were reported elsewhere to be "firing on the people." The law officers of the government were "a movement of the people." Who, then, are the people? In this country what class of citizens is to be especially described as "the people?"

The police were most active, heroic, and successful in their assaults upon the mob. Do the men of the police force in this country cease to be a part of "the people," because they aid in enforcing the laws which are constitutionally made? Are they any less part of "the people" than the men who resist the laws with fire, pillage, slaughter, and anarchy? The draftsmen of their work "are to be fired upon "the people," did they? But who are the soldiers of the United States? Are General Wool, or General Brown, or Colonel Lefferts, or O'Brien, or Major Fearing, or Lieutenant Adams, or any private who stands ready to maintain the laws made under the Constitution, any less citizens of the United States than Andrews and Martin Moran? Are the men who beat helpless negroes to death, and ravage defenseless houses for pillage "the people," while those who defend order, law, and humanity are not? Will these papers please to say whether any of the persons enrolled as claim to be called "the people" of this city, or of this country, by overthrowing every barrier of order, and trampling on it, and abandoning itself to the most wanton and incredible cruelty? Does a citizen cease to be one of "the people" because he respects the laws?

Not a man shot dead in his riotous career during the terrible week in this city was any more one of "the people" than the soldier who righteously shot him or the policeman who justly broke his head. If such scenes as those of the riot week are the acts of "the people," then the most savage hatred of popular institutions ever expressed is the most honest and sensible view of them. If our Government is one of "the people," and the mob which for the space of the city of New York for part of a week is indeed "the people," then any man who does not prefer the reign of one Nero to that of a thousand Neros is insane. If the Government at Washington is, as the Copperhead orators and Journals constantly declare, "a despotism," and the Governors of the same authorities declare, the acts of "the people," no sensible man would long hesitate in determining which to prefer.

But, in truth, the term "the people," as descriptive of the rioters, was used by those who either had no idea what they were talking about, or by those who knew perfectly well that they were talking nonsense to deceive. It is not a convenient term to use while the issue was doubtful. For if the disturbance grew—if from a riot in the city it had become an organized insurrection through the country to compel peace, be is a poor cloak of human nature and of the public press who does not know that the papers which began by faintly deprecating the riot as a "popular movement," and "the People" would have unloyally supporting the insurrectionary resistance to the war. It is with this mob as with the rebellion. Those who support it are its most valuable friends, and of necessity the enemies of the Government and the laws. While to call the rioters and insurrectionists enemies of laws constitutionally made "the people" is to borrow a phraseology from foreign revolutions, to encourage the rioters, advise the government, the army, and the people are three permanently distinct classes, constantly jealous of each other. The word so used has no meaning with us. It is not the brutal, the ignorant, the reckless—it is not thieves, incendiaries, and assassins who are "the people." "the people" of this country. But the great mass of the population, generally intelligent and industrious, from the laborer of yesterday to the rich man of to-day to the laborer of to-day who is to-morrow the rich man—these are "the people"—here and now—there are indeed "The People" of this country.

THE OLD STORY.

THE stain of the riots will rest on the history of the city of New York is indelible. The utter meanness of the hunting and bloody massacre of the helpless negroes by a mob of the population is not to be forgotten. The burning of an orphan asylum is infamous beyond parallel in the annals of mobs. And how completely has it served this unfortunate of the colored race is, every sober man in this country knows. No class among us are and have been so foully treated as the black, yet none furnishes, in proportion, so few offenders against the laws. Proverbially a kind, affectionate, and docile people, they have received from us, who claim to be a superior race, a treatment which of itself disproves our superiority.

How the more intelligent persons among the enemy of this race could witness these outrages under the awful fate which their incessant and revolting depreciation of the colored people has at last brought upon them, is inexplicable to impartial men. Yet we observe that some of them clutch at the old subterfuge, and declare that it is the unwise attempt to elevate the blacks above their sphere which is responsible for their late fearful martyrdom. Look at this statement a moment. Its argument is that the highest moral liberty, as the natural right of every innocent human being, only tends to create pestilence and other human misery. To state the argument is to smother it in ridicule.

Put in another form, the same plea is that God has made the blacks inferior and subservient to the white, and that to declare their right to personal liberty is to advocate their social equality, to erect them into rival citizens, and thus to disorganize society. The reply to this is, that God has made the black race subservient to the white in the same way that he has made Jews subservient to Christians, and the Irish to the English, and in no other. It used to please Governor Wise to call the Jews "Yankees," and to injure and murder them in every way—and to this day to call a man "Jew" is only less offensive than to call him "Yankee." It used to please the English to consider the Irish unclean beasts, and to treat them accordingly. Does any body seriously defend this kind of persecution as any thing more than the basest and most criminal prejudice? Coleridge professed that his distinctive horror of a Frenchman that so many among us profess of a negro. Was it an evidence of Coleridge's wisdom or folly?

The argument we are considering amounts to this—that you must not befriend the unfortunate lest you provoke the ignorant and brutal; you must not defend the rights of the oppressed lest the oppressors should wax wroth. It is an argument for tyrants, cowards, and sneaks—not for men.

AN OPEN LETTER.

MY DEAR FRIEND,—You are a German and a Jew, and you have come to make your living in a foreign land, of which Christianity is the professed religion. You have no native, no political, no religious sympathy with this country. You are here solely to make money, and your only wish is to make money as fast as possible. You neither know our history nor understand our Government; but, believing that all men are selfish and mean, nothing is absurder to your mind than the American doctrine of popular government based upon equal rights.

This being the case with you and thousands like you, you are inevitably a Secessionist, a Copperhead, and a Rebel. But why deceive yourself, since you deceive nobody else? Your opinion is of no value, because you neither know nor care any thing about the subjects upon which you pronounce. But you have kept quiet, hoping to dissolve the Union and to destroy the Government, you are following that course. And you are the enemy of all who will risk war to save the nation. If quiet can be preserved by massacring the negroes, amen: you want money, and money requires quiet. If things can be kept still by slaughtering Irishmen, you cheerfully agree, for you think that of the two races they are the least useful. If peace can be preserved by proclaiming Jeff Davis as President, by forming four Governments, by each State setting up for itself—in God's name, cry you, let it in done. You want money. Government, except so far as it can make mobs and hang the people whom the mob hates, and who are therefore called the authors of the mob—the security of personal rights and property, the open public popular intelligence and progress—these, in your estimation, are foolish fancies and idle twaddle. If you can have a little money, and your servants, and fifty thousand dollars a year, you have what you want, and all the rest is mere nonsense.

Do you not see, my dear friend, that in the eyes of every loyal American citizen, who is equally anxious with you to thrive and make money—who wishes equally with you that there shall be peace, because peace is essential to trade—but who knows that both will and can be no permanent peace in this country, except that which is based upon common justice, and which is firmly persuaded that if all the conservatism in the world argues that one law makes three, they do still make four; in the eyes of such a citizen you are a traitor, no less than what a ludicrous and contemptible spectacle you are? You are the material out of which despotisms are made. You are ready to swear to-day that the King of Prussia counts when he deliberately destroys the constitutional rights of his subjects. And whatever this country is going to mean, and repugnant to the great and fundamental democratic doctrine of equal rights before the law, receives your hearty sympathy and support. The country you left did not regret your coming away: the country to which you trade will not mourn your departure.

Yours, with all the respect possible,

THE LOUNGER.

BLARNEY.

WHEN Archbishop Hughes, in his card of invitation, spoke of those who were "called rioters," or in his speech itself mentioned the "so-called rioters," did he mean that the proceedings of the week were not riotous, and that people who burn, steal, and massacre in the city of Brotates are not rioters, but are improperly so-called? If on the revels of the third week of July in New York were not riotous, then there is much thing as a riot. If the raging crowds, pillaging and devastating, were not mobs, then there is no such thing as a mob.

Why was it necessary or decent to accuse calling things by their right names? If it were proper for him to call the honored editor of a leading journal, and one of the most distinguished living Americans, "a liar," could it have been so very improper for Dick Gross to call men who, without the slightest pretense of excuse, burn an orphan asylum and slaughter innocent passengers upon the street, "rioters"? There was nothing to be gained by to say that they did not look like rioters; for he invited the persons, so called by the papers, to come to his house, and there addressed them as if they had sacked and murdered innocent people and defenseless asylums. The meaning, therefore, was speaking to those and to no others.

His MASTER, as we said, the Prince of Peace, healed the wound he delivered to the servant and bade him put up his sword. He also told the moneychangers that they had turned his Father's house into a den of thieves, and drove them out of it. Those were slight offenses compared with the crimes with which the "so-called rioters" in this city were charged. But through all the long speech of the Archbishop we look in vain for the tone of indignant reproof, or the righteous wrath of Jesus. My most sweet good masters, he says in effect, if indeed you have been naughty—and I am sure you do think so if you were so unwise as to be good boys, or you will make me feel very unpleasantly. I am sure you will be good, because your countrymen have always been the most tractable of babes. Go home, then, like good children—AMEN!

Of the Archbishop's fair intention there need be no doubt. He does not wish his Church to bear the terrible burden of the responsibility of the riot, and as a good citizen he wished the mob put down. But if he had no other means of promoting the public peace than by addressing it as a set of mere gentlemen, and refraining from all condemnation of the infamous crimes which were done in the terms of his invitation, his audience had committed, then it is a great sorrow for every loyal citizen that the Catholic Bishop of New York is not a man who can speak with power, since it is certainly desirable that he should speak at such a time. If, instead of palliating, and parleying, and blarneying, he had depicted to the rioters the enormity of their acts, and bade them, with all the solemnious authority of his position, and in the name of God and the Government, to stop, the moment would have been the noblest hour of his life. To say that such a tone would have exasperated the mob is idle. To cringe to a riot is to betray the cause of good order. Therefore, if you can not command it, say nothing. No mob was ever blarneyed down. Except for the true and tried soldiers, and the batteries in position in the city, the well-armed blandishments of the prelate would have been as a few drops of sweet oil to arrest Niagara.

BARBARISM AND CIVILIZATION.

By the light of the burning Orphan Asylum we read the full and fearful illustration of the hapless inferiority and degradation of the African race.

Mungo Park, in the year 1795, traveled in Africa to find the source of the Niger, if possible, and to explore the hidden interior of the continent. One morning he had reached almost the furthest point of his journey. He was entirely alone, for his faithful servant had been stolen for a slave by a Moorish prince. Solitary and he was directed to a village—and he continues: "I found, to my great mortification, that no person would admit me into his house. I was regardless of the entertainment and fear, and was obliged to sit all day without victuals in the sheds of a tree, and the night threatened to be very uncomfortable, for the wind rose, and there was great appearance of a heavy rain; and the wild beasts are so very numerous that I should have been under the necessity of climbing up the tree and resting among the branches. About sunset, however, as I was preparing to pass the night in this manner, and had turned my horse loose that he might graze at liberty, a woman returning from the labors of the field stopped to observe me, and perceiving that I was weary and dejected, inquired into my situation, which I briefly explained to her; whereupon, with looks of great compassion, she took up my saddle and bridle, and told me to follow her. Having conducted me into her hut she lighted up a lamp, spread a mat on the floor, and told me I might remain there for the night. Finding I was very hungry, she told me she would procure me something to eat. She accordingly went out, and returned in about half an hour with a large bowl, which, having caused to be half broiled upon some embers, she gave me for supper. The poor of hospitality being thus performed toward a stranger in distress, my worthy benefactress (pointing to the mat, and telling me I might sleep there without apprehension) called to the female part of her family, who had stood gazing on me all the while in fixed astonishment, to resume their task of spinning cotton, in which they continued to employ themselves great part of the night. They expressed their labor by songs, one of which was composed extempore, for I was myself the subject of it. It was sung by one of the young women in the rest joining in a sort of chorus. The air was sweet and plaintive, and the words, literally translated, were these: 'The winds roared and the rain fell.—Poor stranger white man! faint and weary, came and sat under our tree.—He has no mother to bring him milk; no wife to grind his corn.—Poor white man! let us pity the white man: no mother has he,' etc., etc. Trifling as this recital may appear to the reader, to a person in my situation the circumstance was affecting in the highest degree. I was oppressed by such unexpected kindness, and shed tears from my eyes."

This was the hospitality of black barbarians in the interior of Africa to a civilized stranger of another color on the 21st of July, 1795. On the 13th of July, 1863, white civilization in the great city of America repaid the debt.

"OUR OWN."

MR. CHARLES MACKAY is an English versewriter, and the author of the rub-a-dub style called "A good time coming." Some half dozen or more years ago he came to this country to deliver lectures upon English poetry. His manager was "Colonel" Hiram Fuller, not unknown in the city of New York and elsewhere. Mr. Mackay's introductions were to literary circles in this country, by which he was kindly received. But the public were obstinately deaf to the charming of his lectures. They were described by those who heard them as the most appallingly dull performances to which the oldest auditor had any experience. The "Colonel" comforted him through the land, but every where the verdict was the same, and his lecturing tour was a melancholy failure. But through all the disappointment and chagrin it is possible to imagine the baffled author grimly humming:

"There's a good time coming,
A good time coming!"

And it has come. He is taking exquisite revenge for all his wrongs. Mr. Mackay arrived again last year, and proposed to settle his account with this country by writing weekly letters to the London Times. He pleases our misfortunes. His pen reels and trips along the page as he describes our war and our overthrow. He evidently regards this civil war as but a proper retribution for a nation which would not stand his lectures. He glories over every defeat and disaster of the national cause, and one could imagine the gentle burst in the full delight of conscious vengeance, scribbling his columns of Copperhead news for the London Times, and humming at his pen as he dashed along the page, and he forsaw with British eyes our commercial ruin:

"There's a good time coming John,
A good time coming."

His latest letter, dated June 25, on the eve of Lee's defeat and retreat, of the fall of Vicksburg and Port Hudson, with the opening of the Mississippi, and the capture of immense forces, and arms, and stores, and the dispersion of the rebellion in the South west, and of the total disappearance of Bragg before the triumphant advance of Rosecrans, contains such sticklering matter for John, "The belief that * * the South will indubitably achieve its independence, and that it is better for all parties that it should do so without further bloodshed, spread rapidly from the lowergrades of the working classes upward until it has pervaded the whole mass of society except the contractors, the preachers, and the newspaper editors * * In fact, the Federal Government stands in the tumbling into perdition."

Mr. Charles Mackay's fiction is much livelier than his lectures and more imaginative than his Verses; and the spirit and quantity of his performances of this kind in the London Times only show what great and difficult vengeance he has sworn against us. For it includes two nations. He elaborates these columns of sneering misrepresentation and abuse of this country and its institution, and John Bull gravely reads it and believes it. What a scolding we should have saved ourselves if we had only gone to Mr. Mackay's lectures!

SONG OF THE BORDER.

A FRIEND in Maryland, whose "heart is with the Union," sends the Lounger the following song:

Air—Bonnie Dundee.

To the heart of the nation the booming guns spoke,
While the true flag went down in the fire and the smoke;
And the grim eyes of Sumter yet echoed the fray
When the loyalists rushed where the Stars led the way.
Chorus.—Then fight for the Stripes, boys, and fight for the Stars!
Confounded be treason! turn down be the Bars!
Let foul traitors tremble, and rebels grow pale
As the Banner of Union floats out on the gale!

Though the land of the cypress its Vandals sends forth,
They are met in the van by the sons of the North;
Toward the troopers that spring from the cotton-planted streets,
With the fires of just vengeance our bayonets gleam.
Chorus.—Then fight, etc.

They may flaunt in the breeze their famed rattlesnake flag;
They may sneer at the Banner, and call it a rag;
But by all we hold sacred, above or below,
We solemnly swear that their flag shall lie low!
Chorus.—Then fight, etc.

They may boast of their chivalry, boast of their blood;
We stand by our fathers' faith, how but to God!
Let them come in their pride; they shall grievously feel
The firmness and keenness of loyalists' steel.
Chorus.—Then fight for the Stripes, boys, bright shine the Stars!
Confounded be treason! despised be the Bars!
The false hearts of rebels shall falter and quail,
As the Banner of Union floats out on the gale.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"DID you not observe the scraper at the door, Sir?" exclaimed an offended spinster, "stand, tidy, and discreet," to a gentleman who had entered the house without scraping his boots. "Yes'm," said he; "and I intend using it when I go out."

THE SOUTHERN REBELS' AMBASSADORS TO PARIS AND LONDON.

SLIDELL SENT TO PARIS.

"Is cotton king?" The Emperor's mind to find,
They shrewdly said to Paris a sly delil.
And, as a slight disguise may do as well,
Their missionary has the name Slidil.
As slight a change gives us his Master's name—
Off Davis and sly Davy mark the same!

MASON SENT TO LONDON.

To England, where their noble poetry pay
The toll that tribute to the wealth from day to day,
They send a Mason, who can build each hall
And cooking-house that suits the taste of all!
Not teaching the mere morals done he come,
Tempers his principles to suit the time,
The solid Pope Mason beloved Virgin Queen
By arrot, all the future one, Victoria's enemies,
Who, 'tis by reading Queen Victoria's speeches,
For there a colored report never was known)
Is a Southern lady, and a Southern mon," and has
A horrid colored crop that meets the view!
For better times he has, or ought to, still—
A picture of a "Free State" design'd in hell!

A GREEK GIRL AGE.—A statistician, writing in a weekly paper, says: "In a prolific grain and nodding field, no man can do one hundred and fifty times more work than he could perform a century ago." We should rather have supposed that "one man" who could have performed any kind of work a century ago, when he must have been comparatively young and strong, could hardly get through much more now that he figures in the character of a centenarian.

A young lady, whose name was Moulton, having married a man named Mould, gave rise to the following:

"LOVE, with, 'tis said, its days of ill,
Its hours of sorrow, still
Was turned, as we are plainly told,
Into a Moulton.
The same propensity of change
Is found in Mould, a husband.
For here we see a case as strange—
Mould turned to Moulton."

Two tourists observing a poetry girl in a milliner's shop, one of them proposed to go in and buy a watch ribbon in order to get a sight of her face. "Why," said a northern friend, "there's one occasion to waste ether. Let us pass in and spoil the gas ile an two sixpences for a shilling."

It is asserted that a certain eminent medical man lately died on a pathless coast, and was buried in the sand, which the worthy biologist declared with a shake of the head, "Would, by Jay Sus, we had the money remains on our hands already."

The new press-gang was patrolling London they laid hold of a well-dressed man, who pleaded that being a gentleman he could not be pressed. "Why," said a sailor, "you're the very man we want, for we've press'd a number of lieutenants, and want a gentleman to touch them nuances."

A Dutchman, summoned to identify a stolen hog, being asked, "Vas dat your hog?" answered, "I'll only can mark dat I saw my tail vas cut off."

EPITAPH.

Here lies old Father Gripe, who never cried "I can suffer"
Should make him die he never you read his insidious gruffs.

When you see a dwarf you may take it for granted that his parents never intended him to be small.

An Irishman, by way of illustrating the horrors of military confinement, stated that out of one hundred persons entombed in the Black Hole of Calcutta but one man survived it.

This may be said to be going to destruction upon when he abandons any sober mode of life for the de-canter.

The individual who "stood upon his own responsibility" is to be indicted for trespassing.

"Harry, I can not think," says Dick,
"What makes my ankles grow so thick."
"You do not think, indeed," says Harry,
"How great a calf they have to carry."

A man who had been fined several weeks in succession for being drunk and disorderly appealed to the judge that he should take him by the year at a reduced rate.

LARGE LOAF.—An organ-grinder playing at the door of a deaf and dumb asylum.

A female teacher of a school that stood on the banks of a quiet stream wished to communicate to her pupils an idea of tactics. While she was trying to explain to her pupils the meaning of the word a boat covered with goods hove in sight along the stream. Seizing upon the incident for an illustration she exclaimed:

"If I were to tell you that there was a leg of mutton in that boat you would believe me, would you not, without even seeing it yourselves?"

"Yes, ma'am," replied the scholars.

"Well, that is faith," said the schoolmistress.

The next day, in order to test their recollection of the lesson, she queried—

"What is faith?"

"A leg of mutton in a boat," was the answer, shouted from all parts of the school-room.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

A CAVALRY reconnoissance was sent out to Front Royal on 20th. Our whole force is now across the river. The rearguard of General Lee's army left Martinsburg at two o'clock on the morning of 18th, a few cavalrymen picketing the rebels of the Shenandoah. The river is falling rapidly. General Lee is retreating his main force by Strasburg and Staunton, not by Culpeper, as was supposed. General Meade is said to be in hot pursuit.

GENERAL ROSECRANS AT WORK.

Rosecrans is doing finely with his army, driving the rebels before him. Dispatches from Memphis, dated on the 17th, say that General Buford's cavalry had just arrived at Corinth, from Decatur and Jacksonville. They report that Bragg was retreating precipitately into Georgia, followed by Rosecrans's forces. General Rosecrans's advance was reported at Athens, Georgia.

THE FALL OF PORT HUDSON.

The particulars of the fall of Port Hudson have reached us by way of New Orleans. It appears that General Gardner, on the 7th inst., sent out a flag of truce asking for terms of capitulation. General Banks replied that he would not consider the matter. At seven o'clock a.m. on the 9th the terms were complied with, and our troops took possession. The moment the surrender was completed the rebels sent a request for six thousand rations, as they had eaten their last mule—which was found to be literally true. The trophies are five thousand prisoners, fifty pieces of artillery, and small-arms in proportion. The loyal citizens of New Orleans had a torchlight procession and general jubilation on the night of the 11th.

ANOTHER ATTACK ON CHARLESTON.

General Gilmore informs the War Department that up to the 11th inst. nothing had been done by the rebels of Morris Island, with the exception of about a mile of the north end, on which they have been working for some days. Embankments for battery, mounting fourteen or fifteen heavy guns. On the night of the 10th they opened fire, but soon ceased to carry it on. Why they did so is not known, but it failed. Our bones boil been shell 150 killed, wounded and missing. The casualties among the rebels are not known. We had captured eleven pieces of heavy ordnance and a large number of camp equipage. After the failure of the attack on Fort Wagner, which was caused by the isolation of the supports of the storming party, and the prompt action of the gallant, General Gilmore commenced engineering approaches, and it was expected that it would soon be captured. All the fortifications on James Island, as far as Secessionville, are now in our possession. During the night a rebel ironclad steamer attempted to land reinforcements on Morris Island, but as she was driven off without landing her guns or boats, the troops on board barely escaping. The attack was renewed on 11th.

MORGAN'S RAID.

The rebel General Morgan is faring badly with his raid into Ohio. On 18th his forces were overtaken near Pomeroy by Generals Hobson and Judah, who had formed a junction. Morgan, finding himself hemmed in there, and learning that the fort at Burlington Island was well guarded, broke up his boats and attempted to cross the river there. One squad, with six pieces of artillery, made for the crossing at Buffington Island, but was overtaken and routed, with the loss of one hundred and fifty killed and drowned. Our cavalry charged upon the rebels while they were crossing, and one of the rebels. Colonels Wolford and Shackelford surrounded a portion of the rebels on the river bank, on Saturday, and another two hundred and seventy-five, besides one hundred and fifty in Meigs County, were captured. Colonel Runyon, with a force of cavalry for fifty miles, and three o'clock sent a flag of truce to Morgan, and Captain Jones, of Morgan's staff, came over to the Ohio shore, on behalf of the rebels, surrendered. Morgan, with a few squad, continued his escape; but our troops are in pursuit, and hope to catch him.

GENERAL SHERMAN'S ADVANCES.

Rebel reports from Jackson, of the late attack of General Sherman's corps against Jackson, Mississippi, show that the fighting was terrific, that his forces were severely injured by the shelling from our batteries, and that the loss on both sides was very heavy. Among the casualties on the rebel side was General Gregg, who was killed. One of our Enoch cavalry generals, is reported to have been killed in the engagement. The rebel force at the time of the war was met by one of General Pemberton's staff on his way to Vicksburg. Details of this conflict are received in dispatches from Jackson to the papers of Mobile, Montgomery, Augusta, and the Richmond Examiner. The first genuine information from the scene of action from July 16th to the 18th. The Mobile Register, of July 19th, in an article to Richmond, that "the enemy made a heavy demonstration on the right and centre this afternoon; but Walker's and Loring's divisions repulsed them handsomely. On the left the enemy's demonstration was a failure, repulsed gun for gun. The enemy sought shelter in the woods. Several regiments of the Grand army came to serve, who are pressed on our right for the purpose of crossing Pearl River, and flanking Johnston. They are employing sleeve-gun on their rebuilds. It is supposed that to-morrow the commander of Jackson will be forced to fight.

On the previous evening our troops were shelling the rebel fortifications.

CAPTURE OF YAZOO CITY.

YAZOO CITY, which has been for eight hundred rebels, was captured by the Union troops under General Herron on the 13th. Five hundred rebels and fifty prisoners were captured. The gun-boat DeKalb, which accompanied the expedition, ran aground in Yazoo River and sunk in shallow water, but no lives were lost. The rebels burned cotton to the amount of 6,000 bales, and some eight or ten large steamers up the Yazoo.

A CAVALRY FIGHT.

An obstinate fight took place on the 17th, between Shepherdstown and Martinsburg, between the cavalry of General Gregg, and the whole force of General Stuart, upward of ten thousand strong, who are protecting the rear of Lee's forces. The fight lasted several hours, and the heaviest loss on both sides, our troops holding their ground heroically. It is said that several lines of battle-flags were seen all from communication with the main army, but that he finally broke through Gregg's line by a gallant charge, capturing a number of prisoners, three stands of colors, and four pieces of artillery.

A REBEL CONSCRIPTION.

Jeff Davis has issued a call for every man between the ages of eighteen and forty-five at once to repair to the conscript camps.

NORTH CAROLINA WAVERING.

The tone of the newspapers, as well as the testimony of refugees and deserters, all indicate that North Carolina is about tired of rebellion, and would gladly proffer her allegiance to the old flag.

REBEL GROANS.

The Richmond papers are terribly doleful over the recent disasters. The Enquirer says: "The fall of Vicksburg, the retreat of Bragg, the repulse of Lee, and the advance on Charleston, are all serious disasters—the most serious that have attended our arms since the beginning of the war."

REBEL VIEW OF OUR RIOTS.

The papers of the New York disturbances had reached Richmond, and the papers are exultant over it. They hail them as the beginning of a great Revolution, characterizing it is "good work" and "an excellent outbreak."

FOREIGN NEWS.

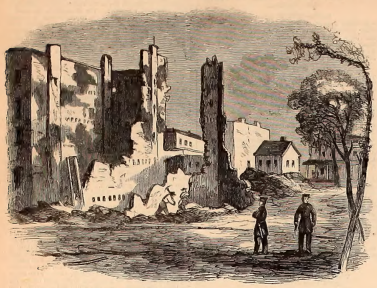
ENGLAND.

THE AMERICAN QUESTION.

THE American question is being widely discussed, both by the papers and in Parliament. Lord Palmerston requested Mr. Roebuck to drop discussion on the question of the recognition of the South, as it was not desirable to resume it, or to bind the Government to pledge themselves to the matter. Mr. Roebuck pointed his answer for the 13th, but thought a better answer than he would be heard before that day.

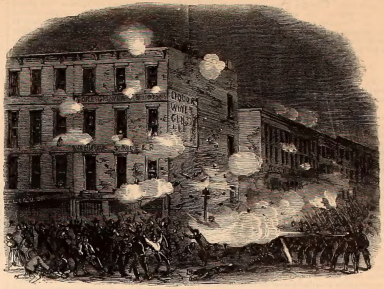
ANOTHER ANGLO-REBEL PIRATE.

The rebel steamer Oltwellar, late the Sumter, has sailed from Liverpool for Cheyenne, S. B. She had been well repaired and strengthened, and took out the "monster gun" which caused her temporary detention by the English authorities. It was thought that she would resume her operations as a rebel privateer.



POLAND.

PROGRESS OF DIPLOMACY.



The notes of the three allied powers on the subject of Poland have been laid before the Emperor of Russia, and are reported to be of a conciliatory character. The preparations for war continue in France and Russia. The expectation of the immediate rupture of diplomacy is unabated daily. In connection with Poland Lord Palmerston replied in Parliament to Mr. Warner that England had made no preventive arrangements to fight for Poland, but that

THE STRONG HEART.

In a great factory, almost grand from its vastness and the might of its machinery, though without architectural elegance or esthetical design, a long file of girls were working at their noisy looms. Most of them presented the common type of the factory girl, the independence, the self-assertion, the love of snatches of finery in the shape of necklaces and ear-rings, in the middle of the dusty clothes, with their hoards of gaudy and merriment at every pause in their routine. One girl was an exception. She worked in a corner, told off by a necessary angle of the building from the stands of her companions. She preferred that situation, and had refused promotion opposition, in order to get better dressed than her neighbors; she had the ordinary calico gown, and the cap with which the wise ones protected their heads from the fluff flying through the room. If there was any difference, her dress was more scrupulously clean; her cap more closely and primly fitted, and pinned more smooth and neat, than the dresses of the other girls. But she was clearly a woman of a higher rank; you saw it in her turn of features, her expression, her intercourse with her fellow-workers and the manager. Although she was quite a young woman, and not unusually skilled in her trade, there was a tacit respect paid to her; that unconscious deference which often marks the difference between inevitable "just supremacy" and unwarrantable usurpation. No one in the Mile-end Mill accused Lucy Brown of airs or resented her dignity: and mill "hands" are notoriously shrewd observers. They did not like her much; they did not like her as overmuch; she was a woman to be trusted and treated with indifference at that stage, by the many as by one of themselves—protection and kindness and to be loved engrossingly by the few.

In the same mill were two brothers which by natural impulse, as flowers turn to the sun, turn to whatever of higher intelligences and refinement comes within their reach. It is not unnatural reasons, it is at the antipodes from sycophancy and snobishness—it is simply the like drawing to the like, the magnetism between whatever is lowlier and higher in our humanity. So Letty's friends were often distinguished in one way or another, not by any fault, for her life always in that, sheltered them in the work-house and the hospital, but they were not by the less genuine in the warmest orders. One was a poor politician, one a runner after tiny ensemble moses with their brown fairy cups. Peter Brown was useless of the two, useless on than a clever, managing housekeeper in the family of a wealthy cotton lord; nay, Letty was engaged to be married to a young man who was not enough to be a clerk in the factory where she worked, and not only with such chance advantages in book-keeping, but with that temperament so rare, so beautiful in all its shapes which belongs to some of the hardest and most desperate workers, which gone back to some distant ancestor for her faculties, because Letty was born a rising young woman.

I would like to show you Letty in her workplace before she leaves the factory this night, as it happens, never to return. She is not a little sprite of a woman, as it is the fashion of the day to find embodiments of latent power. I suspect the size of the looms has really nothing to do with the strength of the flame within. Letty was fair and pale—so fair and pale that there would have been something insipid about her pallor and her hair, but for the brown tint of her eyebrows and lashes, which, rendered only slightly ungainly by her compressed dragging. Her face was one of those strong-featured faces which are apt to be heavy in repose, but it was an open, noble face, notwithstanding; and when heated and animated it lit up into a perfect splendor of beauty, but a beauty more of form and tone than of the clear, cool color which makes the face as a painter subdues his brilliance by deep shades and grave back-grounds. It was what some would have called a pre-Raphaelite, cathedral light, rather than one, when it was blithe, it was with an exuberance and abandonment of gladness, like Rome at the Carnival, and as your stern, good person finds on rare occasions, with a pure sweet passion of laughter.

Above Letty Brown's loom was the instance of a pleasant fashion, which belongs more to country than to town mills—the bunch of heart's-ease, in those with which old country wives used to fill their grates, was still pearly and almond-scented in the dim, dusty air which we have described, as one opens windows could entirely clear. Spring, summer, autumn, winter, Letty's heart's-ease showed such traces. Though she lived in a great town she was never without her supplies of fluffy, daffodils, roses, wall-flowers, and mid-winter snowdrops, the essences of his existence, and he lavished them on Letty, who, in her native statuesque and peaceful, back-ground, loved better than she would any jewels. That night, at the ringing of the factory bell, Letty rested her loom as she was wont, in her orderly fashion, and went out slowly and sadly, lingering behind the riotous troops of her companions, in order to be joined by George Ashe. There Ashe, by her side, a slight lad, more youthfullooking than Letty, though he was her senior, with that indefinable air of refinement which, more than confusedly call a genteel address, and with one of those bright and spiritual faces, as to set, dark, curly hair, which we are driven to look on in a way with dim doubts and forebodings.

Letty no more dreamed that she would not return to the mill on the morrow than that she would wed George Ashe—an orphan like herself—ethand, without money laid by, taking on their furniture, and launching him at once on a muddy sea of debt. A common sempstress which Letty, with her abundant sense, held in horror—and where contrary to George did not contemplate in so severely or take steps against it or decisively. His lax moral principles but extravagant habits for his station, though they were lovely, lovable habits at the same time, and the two struggled together within the limits of equal entanglement and in a kind of brave hostility.

That very evening—one of the memorable ones in Letty's life—she went by appointment to see her friend, Mrs. Peaston, whose scullion she had comforted in her visits to the hospital, and whose clothes she had helped to carry from the washerwoman's when the laundress and the other servants of the great house were busy, until her mistress had procured a sovereign recipe from an amateur chemist for taking iron stains out of linen. At the great house in the suburbs Letty heard that the family were in sharp and sudden distress. One of the sons had been seized with violent illness, and was under strict medical treatment for months, while his relatives and the household generally were struggling with more or less success with it. It was not from pure regard to the sufferer—he had been an ill-conditioned lad as ever existed, and sent his kindred sorrow and trouble—but they would pain save him from perishing in those pangs of body and mind which were exciting the whole house, and cutting down all the resources of wealth and station, pride and reserve. Letty Brown would have gone away again immediately, leaving her visit but indeed at the unpropitious moment, but it went sorely against the grain with her the girl to quit a house of distress, unless she might be needed from her—there might be something for her to do.

Mrs. Peaston, full of stillness and sympathy, and something was needed from her ere long. An excitable mail-servant employed to convey hot water to the delirious patient, refused to do so unless his agony, fell down in a swoon on the kitchen floor, and while her shrieks brought everybody round her to recover her, Letty carried up the next supply of water in the general confusion. A medical man was summoned to the case by convulsions of the young man, and while he did so he caught Letty's eye—that rational, full, deep, wellset eye—as he went by, and beckoned to her with an imperative sign, he summoned her to his assistance. He kept Letty hours by the bed, for those hours her strength and her duty. Just before to dismissed her he inquired curiously,

"Have you ever seen a case of this kind before?"

"No, Sir, never," answered Letty, thankfully.

"Thankfully!" the surgeon echoed, he observed, energetically, the moment she had left the room. "Firm nerves, quick observation, a kind heart, makes a kind, firm woman, a resource, Sir, even where she is," he continued, grudgingly. "Should like to tempt her to take service in my work."

The words had a strange effect, startled and afflicted by pain: Fred's frightful attack. "Who is she? Is she a young woman under such a time? A protégée of Peaston's? Very indiscreet of Peaston. Providential, did you say? Peaston could not have died a providential thing—a providential thing at first; and the man's reason replied resolutely,

"Never mind, my dear, you heard what the doctor remarked; engage to be at your post for the end of he is spared. Offer her any wages."

And Letty remained at the post which had put herself into her hands, for the time done so without fee had none been forthcoming. She could not have benefited by the unexpected proud, with a womanly breadth of satisfaction and benevolence, that she could relieve the unhappy young man, though the sacrifice of her wages might have wrecked out of a gentleman, under the ghastly thunder-cloud of delirium tremens.

In a month from that time Letty Brown went abroad with the Bridgewaters, who, in ordinary, accommodating phrase, had taken a fancy to the young girl—but it was more than a fancy—Mr. Fred, who was again partially restored to sense and action, and on his own account, had taken a fancy to her, and the smaller injury to society, and who was left behind the traveling party, judiciously, as far as the comfort of the invalid was concerned. Mrs. ed. Letty went as aid to Mrs. Peaston, to Mrs. Bridgewater's maid, to the head nurse of the young Bridgewaters. She got her own wages, and the philosophic downstairs than she could win working in the factory. So she went, and Peter Brown, the poor's brother, of the quiet young woman had an ardent desire to do, and her George was reconciled to the separation with considerable ease, for he knew he was as proud that she should command these advantages as he was mortified that they should be got up without his instrumentality, and not in his company.

II.

THE next time that we see Letty Brown is with other surroundings and under a different aspect. The Bridgewaters had been absent from England for months to years, and Letty had tasted a little of the bitterness of hope deferred; but that honorable pause at her was not unproductive of results, and that mind and heart of hers better instructed, and though George Ashe was too true not to want her back to him, he was philosophic under the circumstances. If you were a light observer, you would scarcely know Letty Brown again—Miss Brown now—at her place, Bridgewater Lodge, acknowledged maid to the young ladies, and factotum to the housekeeper. In learning to open her young mistresses' hair Letty had learned to dress her own—that pale brown hair without any of the red of the chestnut about it, but not so cold, but which formed, for all you might know no better, so fitting a setting to the large, finely featured, tranquil, level-browed, gray eyes, which, ne's jealousies; Minerva, without the divine maid's pretensions; Deborah, who lived with her husband and judged Israel under the fig-tree; Lydia, who heard Paul lovingly and entertained him nobly. In continual association with harmony and elegance, the former intelligent, reverent, factory girl had inevitably imbibed and appropriated a portion of them quickly, and to her credit be it recorded no annoyance, she began to be mistaken for one of the daughters of the house. Letty was in daily and hourly conversation with educated people, and even in acquiring those soft Italian words, Letty had got rid of the worst part of her provincial dialect, the illiterate sentences, and obsolete expressions. In the thin woolen or cambric gown, with the little collar, the light jacket, the shady hat-an necessity of enjoyment in the sunny south; able to give a wonderfully artistic opinion of the amateurs' sketches, until she was persuaded to try sketching herself, and was fascinated by her own share of success; betraying naively considerable natural talent for music and painting, until her masters and mistresses discovered a fresh charm in carrying her with them to churches and galleries—what would George and Letty do if his sweet-heart when she was restored to him, "she finished" by the only possible effectual education for a poor girl? Letty was not spoiled, she is much shaken as captivated; foolishly overvaluing her acquired information and accomplishments, and overlooking his own original rough, uncut gifts. But it was certain what Letty would do in the relation that bound them, one of those wonderful, winning relations between the sexes, where George Ashe was half Letty Brown's sovereign, half her darling, half her slave, half her pet; in the hour of reunion Letty would clasp George's hand and look him in the face, and he were nobody by to see, put her arm round his neck and kiss him, to show him that, though she had crossed the Channel and wandered over the Alps and plains, she had seen nobody to her mind like George Ashe. Letty was not the woman to forget her old friends from subservience to new ones. She was also sterling metal. You might as soon expect the deep stream to show an empty bed, as Letty to return without its faithful, powerful handmaid, the love.

Letty Brown was in Italy when the next event in her history occurred. The Bridgewaters were posting between Leghorn and Rome. They had just courteously added to their company a sensible, well-bred traveling Colonel, with no wife and some little acquaintance, a poor man who was traveling for his health and excruciating himself to be able economically to travel at all in Italy. They were in all the exigencies of the road when their courier was taken from them by an official mandate, in order to deliver evidence on an unusual act of violence which he had seen perpetrated, and while traveling with the Bridgewaters Inglese who had been his last employer. The judge concerned had cleverly caught the witness when he was supposed to be out of the wayside, and would on no account let him go till he had told his story feasibly, in spite of the threats and contempt of the assassin's companions of the other illustrious Inglese who must proceed; the latter would be detained a fit of the spleen if he did not go forward, and yet it was certain he could not move without the hired escort and patronage of his employers, and without the franchise.

The affair was not very formidable. The little posting town, with its grey gateway and gaudy church, whose bells never took place, afforded at least decent accommodation for a halt. There was not the most distant suspicion or apprehension of violation, though the "Per Bacco!" "Per Bacco!" echoin severe, passionately, an English subject was not safe in any country where. It was only a temporary delay with its temporary discomforts, still it put these good Bridgewaters to their wit's end. They were grown up—well-bred and they had little assumption, so upright as to have few suspicions; but I never said they were perfect, and their great wealth, position, and amiability is almost as bad as a life which has no legs—it can not stand alone.

Lucy Brown sat up and down, how she spun out her stock of Italian, how she uncoiled boxes and packages, how she made new clothes-lines and that spirit-lamp, and soothed the discomforts family and their more discomfortable satellites, who, of course, as a matter of high principle, is a matter which fairly baffles all description.

The Colonel was an admirer of dispatch and ease, the comfort of his fellow-men, a hater of all military shirts. He pulled his grizzled mustache in admiration of this young woman. He was more than man-like thanking, if any body could be more than all-important; and whereas Joachim was only as a handmaid, Lucy like a galvanized corpse, rocked into a skin of brown leather, this young woman was handsome, was neat-handed—which is the Colonel's definition of gracefulness—she had spirit, she had ability, she was finished by the early When Joachim was free, and his traveling days gone their several further destinations, and were settled in different quarters of the Eternal City, the first time he met the Colonel in one of Gherardesque he sent his landlady, who on holidays displayed the richest mass of black hair, and the heaviest gold ear-rings in the locality, with a respectful and apologies, and an earnest solicitation that Mrs. Bridgewater would spare him Miss Brown to preside over his social comforts, to see that he was not poisoned, to read his Times to him, and prevent him going distracted with the bad Italian journals of the day. The poor lady who had undertaken the task.

The poor Colonel's unsophisticated petition afforded no little amusement even to these complacent hearts, but Mrs. Bridgewater did not hesitate to comply with its prayer. The Colonel was an honorable old man, and there was no etiquette for a girl in Brown's rank.

As far as Letty would so soon live on the one side of the giant dome as on the other, and she rightly judged that she would be more comfortable at Letty went to the old Colonel's establishment above an artist's studio, and took care of the Colonel, and cheered him back to comparative health, like an attentive, deferential daughter.

It was as much to Letty Brown's amusement as to the Bridgewaters' consternation, that the night before that on which she was to return to her real employers the Colonel called her to his side, and in a trifle of agitation, and a respectful tone, began to become his wife. Letty had no wish to consider her answer, the Colonel instantly begged she should take time to think over his proposal, and gave her liberty to submit it to her mistress, and I need not say the Colonel was accustomed to be obeyed.

The Bridgewaters had a true regard for Letty, but the communication put them dreadfully about —it was worse than Joachim's interference decoration. Traveling, like poverty, might induce them to fraternize with their inferiors; but to marry them—where the one party was a Lieutenant-Colonel of good family, and in possession of an ample fortune besides his pay—was a little too much even more than crabbed, on the high road to craziness, and the other was a waiting-maid, born a factory girl—well, this was an extension of the suffrage with a vengeance! Had the Bridgewaters lent a hand to entangle the willful old Colonel in the net a mad vows of marriage, and had they told friends, from the nearest to the most distant, come upon the Bridgewaters in their supercilious indignation, and demand unimaginable compensation?

My readers must feel that these affable Bridgewaters were in a disagreeable predicament.

Mrs. Bridgewater was never more relieved in her life than when Letty, blushing very much, but quite determinedly, declined the matrimony of declining, with her service and her thanks, the proposal which would have turned the heads of half the girls in Letty's line. Mrs. Bridgewater could have kissed and hugged her favorite on the spot, such a perception of propriety, such modern moderation and consideration! Letty was a fine creature; moreover, she had proved herself a philosopher.

While Letty was ill abroad, Mrs. Bridgewater, in the middle of her lady-like gentleness and softness, was very inquisitive to penetrate the origin of such philosophy. Letty confessed, with charming confusion in so wise and clever a woman, that there was a child at home, a boy, an old acquaintance, and that, indeed, she had not concealed the engagement between them from any doubt, Letty was ready to confess that it was that impression, but her friend Mrs. Peaston had known it all along, and for any one else Letty did not choose to be at the pains of telling it. That was Letty's explanation of the fact that, with her, love was as sacred as it was natural, and that the son of one of Letty's young ladies, who was unavailably privy to the incident, cried out with refreshing indignation that she had guessed the solution of Letty's riddle.

Mrs. Bridgewater, affectionate though she was, had very little to do with Letty's wonderful disappointment—an absurd old man to be impetuous and heedless at his years—and he took his refusal with a good grace, and was grateful for the customary airing, and he sent and borrowed Mr. Bridgewater's Guilonni, exactly as if nothing had happened.

Naturally Letty experienced deeper gratitude and more honor for her boy, the unpolished, dedared and unmixed because the Colonel, once satisfied of her calm, deliberate decision, did not attempt to shake it. Mrs. Bridgewater was sure the heart smote her when the old man's voice faltered as he bade her a confused farewell, and she looked back again to give more emphatic instructions to the good-humored cook how her Colonel liked his lamb and salad, and his chocolate, and his breakfast, for her friendship, to serve with clock-work punctuality the minute of this generalissimo.

Afterward, the whole episode faded from Letty's preoccupied heart and active life, and left only a shadowy incident—half-mirthful, half-melancholy—behind.

III.

LETTY BROWN'S travels were over, and her single life with them. She was Letty Brown no more, but Letty Ashe, one of the million; the poor clerk's wife, with her somewhat narrow household and careless household drudgery. Never mind, Letty never looked handsomer or happier than when she arranged her few pieces of furniture, and the marcels in the circumscribed flat in the ugly, crowded manufacturing town. Letty was such a young wife, so docile, so sweet, so civil to her neighbors, so genuinely frank and kind to old friends, and above all, so full of resources for little matters, lady to George Ashe, though she had worked as a factory girl once, and he was never likely to be anything else, and to the end of her life daughter, that it was good to see her.

Letty had been cooking her husband's dinner, and was still humming pleasantly beautifying his dwelling; she was dusting the cage with her tiraliras, meanwhile from the little bird's throat—and she was setting out her flowers, cheap primroses and periwinkles, as she used to deck her old Miller-of factory days, and with whom those little ideas, brought from the fragrant myrtles and oleanders on the altars in old classic Roman lands, when the Bridgewaters were worshipping at the shrines, a letter—a London letter—not for Mrs. George Ashe, but for Letty Brown.

Letty was a little puzzled as she read the address in an unfamiliar hand; she had no friend that she knew of in London but the Bridgewaters, and they not only were apprised of her marriage, but had loaded her with wedding-presents, useful and ornamental, and published the fashionable embroidered table-cover, the fanciful cake-basket (Letty would surely eat cake sometimes) were all from the Bridgewaters.

Letty did not open the letter instantly, and when she did the expression of the face was not excitable, this young woman, in her sound sagacity; she was rather slow at adopting a fancy, though swift at making an observation. She was engrossed with what she was about—she had no pressing interests apart from her own home. She put down the letter, half-determining not to open it till George came home; then she took it up again, and burst open the envelope, and read, first, a lawyer's exceedingly civil preamble; second, a copy of the substance of the will of the late Hugh Bridgewater, Esq., of Bridgewater Lodge, and of Her Majesty's dragoon regiments, devising and bequeathing to Lettie Brown, formerly of Moorfield (he had incidentally, as it were, asked her the name of her native place the very morning she took leave of him), the bulk of his fortune, and his house at Bayswater, with its plate and furniture. The testator stated that all his relations were distant in degree, and in affluent circumstances, and that he made this disposition of his property, in being in sound mind, as a proof of his respect and esteem for the said Lettie Brown, to render testimony of which he left the legacy without limitation or reservation, beyond the necessary legacy duty, which the lawyer took the opportunity to apprise her it was her business to pay.

Letty read the communication three times before she attached the importance to its contents and laid them to heart; and she first thing she did after she knew that she was an heiress was to harass her friend's antecedents—and that George Ashe was rich and able to lead a life of luxury, and indulge his tastes, was to sit down, with the sobers rolling down her cheeks, making them wet in their paleness—and Letty seldom cried—and to pray God that He would enable her and her husband to bear their unexpected and unexampled prosperity. It was not that Letty was narrow-minded, or superstitious, or childish, and was incapable of comprehending riches, but because she fathomed not only their advantages and benefits, but their temptations and trials, both with judgment and sensibility; and the first abrupt contemplation overcame her, sitting there crying and shaking, half with pleasure, half with pain, trying to recall her stiff eccentric benefactor, trying to think of nothing strange, and of what she could find and say. Letty was roused by her turtle, accustomed to leave his cage and fly to her shoulder coming down for his resting-place, and pressing his silver-gay and cinnamon-brown plumage against her wet cheek, which is a touch of a common natural object is a great boon sometimes.

The exultation, the triumph, the delirium of pride and joy—for all of these Letty knew when she arrived at last, and was gravely, almost diffidently, informed of the Aladdin's lamp that had been handed to at the door. It was not that George was mercenary, but he had all the vehement impulses which were calm in Letty. He was not fair at his fever, though it was not in her nature to abhor her lover. She was a woman of the more modestly silent alike in trepidation and mortification, in pain of body and anguish of mind.

"If I were not, George, I would go to the fair myself to you," proposed Letty, earnestly. "People will not believe at first in our fortune; I can scarcely believe it in myself. Some one will make an oracle yet of which we are not aware, though the lawyer speaks fair. It is idle to care for the world for our mutual opinions; but I should not like them to say that we have lifted clean off our feet before we were sure of a higher position," added Letty, with a faint smile, stroking her turtle.

This young woman had a wholesome regard for public opinion, and a tolerable acquaintance of public George Ashe had sufficient discretion to enable him to see the merit of Letty's counsel. He compelled himself to attend his factory and keep account there while he was exchanging momentous letters with the London lawyer, until Letty herself discovered that the effort was so painful, and the oversight and blunders he committed so flagrant and absurd, that she banished Ned's firm from the obligation, before he was dismissed in disgust by his employers. Then he wandered about aimlessly, could not resist talking all sorts of people into confidences, until the rumour spread to circles which had never heard of this humble young couple's existence, and caution in the end pulled them down again, overturned all their old domestic arrangements, and replaced the household economy of Lettie Brown by experience that the early days of most eyed consequences are desultory and disagreeable.

But the most preposterous visit that George ever very plain sailing.

Colonel Annesley's will was undoubtedly formal and legal—not a question but the old soldier had died in his sound mind, and no opposition would be made by his cousins, whatever their private feelings. Mr. and Mrs. Ashe, whose most obedient servant the lawyer was, literally and figuratively had only to go to London and take possession.

Letty drew a long breath; her husband was not ruined by a false expectation; now she might honestly accept the congratulations which were on her by a crowd of strangers, suddenly and not insincerely grown friendly. Their hearts were warmed by the liberality of fortune to Mr. Ashe: who knew but his and her turn might come next? Now Letty might make use of that word, and credit at the banker's, the responsibility of whose possession had impressed her so seriously; and Letty went out and was as foolish as any other new-made man, committed the enormity of buying a tawdry pound shawl for herself and a flowing dressing-gown for George Ashe. Letty had a fancy for expensive shawls, and an innocent, ancient ambition to see George in flowing dressing-gowns, which she had dreamed many a quaint dream of him in her working days, attired in the slippered ease and old-fashioned majesty gown and student's cap, as the constructs of the poets, whose works he picked up at book-stalls, before she had the least acquaintance with these great men and their worries and troubles.

That shawl and that dressing-gown happened to be nearly the sole luxuries of her fortune on which Letty put her hands.

The zealous lawyer pressed on Mr. and Mrs. Ashe to come up to town and satisfy themselves with regard to their legacy; he even hinted at their immediately occupying the house at Bayswater, and seeing something of the season. Letty recoiled in horror from this extravagance, considering their late position; but when she urged fresh delay and consideration, woman-like, exaggerating her caution till it verged on cowardice, George Ashe proposed to go up to town alone and receive and invest their funds. Letty accepted the latter suggestion only in salutary expedition, and insisted that, with a very little more time and trouble, she could accompany him. It would not do. George was affronted, restive, unmanageable, and he was quite ready to throw out hints in his Letty was looking upon herself as an heiress, was wishing to act upon her heiress-ship, to establish her independence of him, or at least to imply his subordination to her.

Letty was really wounded. It was the first unjust, unreasonable treatment she experienced from George Ashe. The fact was he was rapidly getting captious and overbearing. It was as if the golden shell of prosperity had been converted into clouds of dim smoke, blinding and confounding him. He was a fine fellow, but he could not stand his sudden rise in the world; it was beyond principles were tottering under it.

Letty settled with herself that it was better George Ashe should go up to London alone. There was delicacy in this, and there was a little stubbornness. She always felt that the friendship between those who had been made one flesh; and it had not been without previous roots of bitterness and seeds of division, that they had for poor Letty, with her womanly sentiments all the more swelling in her throat and tightening her breast, because it was a thing never before, gave them birth.

Letty knew what loneliness was after she had succeeded to her fortune, and was left alone in the manufacturing town. Her husband was up in that London, whose name conveyed a strong tide of humanity oppressed her even to think of. The fortune he claimed appeared a drop in the bucket of its millions, and yet that little drop had filled it divided him effectually from her, from what looked now quite small, happy days, when they lived over the sore with decent reticence. There were gossiping, sniggering yet kind friends, but Letty had not even required to hear in her travels the story of the lioness without the tongue. Yet the poor Cinderella was ashamed to confide in his favor; and Letty would no more reproach his ghost with fraining for her a crown of thorns than she would fling away her husband's gold in the form of coarse, natural gentleness. There are men of wit who reckon "spoons" fair game in society, however they themselves may be fathers and husbands. In this case there were no friends to interfere, to render the conquest less complete. Letty heard the whispers, saw the significant shrugs and excesses, and wrung her hands and reproached herself that she had not gone with her lord, followed him to that London which, she said to herself, in an agony of defence of the culprit, was drunk with its own wonders and sins. Ah, no! It was not selfish, so mad, in her pride? and now it was too late, when he only regarded her entreaties to laugh at them and spoil her fun, as a fretful thing quibbling him. Poor, great-hearted, devoted Letty, as if a woman's husband could ever be anything in an exhibition of selfishness, be stung at profit as her baby.

Months have passed, and Letty sat alone one night, comfortably in her dressing-room, which looked mean even in her own eyes nowadays, pondering on her cares. A ring came to the bell—and surely Letty knew that kind ring—and she'd she had undergone so many false starts that she dared not trust her heart. She went to the door, brought him into the parlor, still clasping his arm, though he returned her caress mechanically, and only spoke the "Lord of Civilization" must by this time be rather familiar.

"While the arms were being stacked General Grant with his staff rode over the battle-field, and while upon the parapet of Fort Hill stood Pemberton, Hebert, Taylor, and other officers. It is, of course, impossible to give more than a small portion of the act of surrender, as each regiment stacked arms in front of the position they had held so gallantly during the siege, the works extending for nearly nine miles."

—Cincinnati Gazette, July 6, 1863.

"A RRIVAL OF THE NAVAL FORCE, UNDER ADMIRAL PORTER, AT THE VICKSBURG LEVEE ON THE MORNING OF THE FOURTH OF JULY.

"HEAD-QUARTERS OF MAJOR-GENERAL M'PHERSON, July 4, 1863.

"The exceeding picturesqueness of the scene, together with the natural interest attached to the movements in which the NAVY made the arrival of the fleet one of the most gala incidents of the day and faithful benigns. "You have brought back yourself, and what could you bring to me like yourself? We will be as we were before, George. How gladly we will forget what has come between, except as a warning of evils to be avoided forever!"

I am glad that Letty was not repaid by signal ingratitude and a recurrence of the offense. George Ashe was not such an ingrate. He was filled with the forbidden fruit of his folly, and found his teeth too much on edge for him to cross to bite the apple of knowledge again. He had no relapse, though he could not escape a rebound. The sweetnatured, enthusiastic man had taken heaven into his composition which leavened the whole lump. He had been to a school where he was not only instructed, but disciplined in coldness, slighting, and sarcasm.

George Ashe had spent an incredible amount of worldly substance, but he was not so penniless as, in his despair, he had represented himself. From his fragments of Letty's legacy enough was left to buy a small farm to maintain the couple. Letty and George went to that little farm with its pretty northern view of the Holmes, and there practised, with economy, being yeomen, pastoral people and cultivators of the ground as they were. It would have been a great independence to them once on a day; and at least one of them knew both how to be abased and how to abound, and had learnt feet fast of all, how to curb high-vaulting imaginations within their old narrow bounds. There the Ashes were content and happy, in their simplicity and other friends; and there they lived to secure the regard of their world, though not in the same way. Mr. Ashe was not a man to be "done." He was well educated at last, even accomplished, liberal, friendly; but he was uncertain, a little nervous, self-conscious, crotchety. And Letty was such a noble-hearted woman, he was so well off with her, as he was thoroughly aware in every respect; she was so tranquil in her comparative exaltation, so serene under her losses, so unpretendingly exact in her economy, and yet so free, genial in her quiet way, with such a lovable inclination to plants and animals and other people's children besides her own. People said she was a born lady, that mistress of the Holmes. That was small praise: say rather hers was a strong, pure heart, early anchored in still, profound faith in goodness and God.

THE FALL OF VICKSBURG.

We devote several pages this week to the surrender of Vicksburg—the most important event, in some respects, of the whole war.

On page 481 will be found two pictures illustrating

THE NEGOTIATIONS FOR SURRENDER.

Mr. Davis writes

"HEAD-QUARTERS MAJOR-GENERAL M'PHERSON, July 4, 1863.

"The eyes of the gallant men in the rifle-pits in front of the Division of General A. J. Smith have been gladdened by a most welcome sight for all true that is, we hope, to close this eventful siege.

"The officers, General Bowen and Colonel Montgomery, were received by the officer of the day for the Division, Captain Joseph H. Green, of the Twenty-third Missouri Infantry, and by him conducted to the head-quarters of General Smith's brigade, Captain Green having first taken the precaution to blindfold the eyes of the two officers.

"At three o'clock this afternoon the meeting of General Grant and Pemberton took place near the rebel work Fort Hill.

"After a conference of some two hours, in the most quiet and unostentatious manner, the two officers parted with a hand-shake that seemed most friendly.

"Quietly seated upon the grassy slope near the rebel works, one could only look with the greatest interest upon the scene.

"Meantime a conference was being had near by by Generals M'Pherson and Smith and General Bowen and Colonel Montgomery, the officers of the Generals' staffs being en grupe."

On pages 488 and 489 will be found

"THE SURRENDER OF VICKSBURG.

"HEAD-QUARTERS OF MAJOR-GENERAL M'PHERSON, July 4, 1863.

"This morning at ten o'clock the army under Lieutenant-General Pemberton marched out of their works and stacked arms and colors.

"So close were our saps to the rebel works that in many instances the arms were stacked in our trenches. Major Hatchel drove over with the rebel position—Fort Hill, which the readers of the 'Lord of Civilization' must by this time be rather familiar.

"While the arms were being stacked General Grant with his staff rode over the battle-field, while upon the parapet of Fort Hill stood Pemberton, Hebert, Taylor, and other officers. It is, of course, impossible to give more than a small portion of the act of surrender, as each regiment stacked arms in front of the position they had held so gallantly during the siege, the works extending for nearly nine miles."

—Cincinnati Gazette, July 6, 1863.

"The exceeding picturesqueness of the scene, together with the natural interest attached to the movements in which the NAVY made the arrival of the fleet one of the most gala incidents of the day

"The sturdy iron-clads, trimmed from stem to stern with the many flaring pennants and signal-flags of the code, the Jack-tars in their pretest togs—white—and the jubilant crowd on the levee, whose noisy greeting was only equaled by the p-a-c-k-like explosion of the unshotted guns that told noisily off the stated amount of thunder due the anniversary of our country's birth.

"And yet, sketching the scene, the thought came—Oh! could I but portray the beat! The pencil can say words may. 'Twas very hot."

On page 492 we give

"MAJOR-GENERAL JAMES B. M'PHERSON AND HIS STAFF OFFICERS.

"No officer has won for himself more golden opinions during this brilliant campaign than General M'Pherson. He is a young officer, rising steadily in battle, a courteous gentleman in camp; as an engineer he is unsurpassed.

"The work performed by his corps are pronounced by the army 'the most complete and satisfactory of the line.'

"Each day he is in the trenches with the soldier, not a single thing escapes his notice—commendation or reprimand. He is the pride of the corps that he commands.

"He has under him two able engineers, Captain Richardson and Brevet-Major Bowers, being Chief-Engineer of the Corps, is represented at the right hand of my sketch. He is a native of the Railway State, and was, previous to secession, City Surveyor of Cincinnati, where he raised a battery of artillery that has gained for itself a deserved reputation. Captain Merritt, a New Yorker by birth, was at the commencement of the rebellion a civil engineer. He volunteered, and from Iowa he received a Company in that State for the 'Engineer Regiments of the West.' He has served steadily upon the staff, and has had the construction and reconstruction of military railroads. I may say a word of this officer's coolness in emergency.

"His post during the assaults was that of a corps of working parties, he is continually the target for the sharp-shooters. A few days ago a shell, thrown by the 'rebels' into the trench among the working party, was picked up by him and thrown to a safe distance from the corps.

On pages 488 and 489 we give

"VICKSBURG FROM THE RIDGE BATTERIES.

"HEAD-QUARTERS OF MAJOR-GENERAL M'PHERSON, July 4, 1863.

"Until this time, for obvious reasons, it has not been possible to obtain a satisfactory sketch of this Gibraltar of the South.

"The present sketch gives a comprehensive view of the city, the forts, and fortifications. In the foreground are grouped the prisoners, whose condition is say thing but enviable, one poor fellow shivering with a chill, and the thermometer at the wave to be had, would certainly show a temperature of at least purgatorial heat. While sketching I was joined by a brave man, Lieutenant Murphy, of General M'Pherson's staff. 'Ah!' quoth he, 'how we watched your pencil as it left the paper, and became deck of the boat he commanded. A word of the guns in these batteries. They are cast rough, and mounted, the muzzle projecting over the rim the skin on, which adds to their strength about 15 per cent.'

Of the rebel works at Vicksburg a Herald correspondent, who carefully examined the place after the surrender, writes as follows:

"The question has often been asked, "How long could Vicksburg have held out if its provisions had not become exhausted?" From the examination I myself now made, and from the ground and condition of their works, and the way in which they were constructed, I am satisfied they would have been obliged to surrender, in consequence of the numerous mines they were dug under the positions which our batteries and sharp-shooters were continually battering to pieces again.

A few of the reasons for this assertion may be ascertained. Almost from the first the fort of the enemy mounted 100 caps, which, for the sake of better slowing our position, could not be seen from the river, the embrasures of the ground within the rebel works was mostly adapted to the ground, and the position of the guns, which, by means of a slight depression, could be fired from the rear of the parapet. From the works—Fort Hill particularly—the slope to the river at the time was gradual, and presented remarkable opportunities of pouring into the enemy a staggering cross-fire of grape and canister. The slope on the other side was equally as exposed, though the fire could not be so effective as on the river-front, the works to the ravine. Once driven across this ravine, the assaulting party would have no cover, and from the fact only would our land-batteries have a fair sweep from the eastward side, but the infantry could be concentrated for use upon the position from the rear. This would be a point-blank for the artillery, the realization of which could not be endured for a day.

In viewing the rebel fortifications their defects are evident even to the untutored in the eminent science of military defence. Their works seem to be planned with but merely a collection of ditches and raised earth. The engineering skill displayed in them is that the art of sincere for the construction of the defence of Vicksburg must be weak. The men are no manner, judging from for themselves. It appears as if a detail were made, and each man directed to construct a work with a portion to do, and ordered to disperse, and, in the language of the West, 'gouge all' whenever they thought proper. Hence there always to give hills and prominent positions the prefer to the valleys.

From the looks of the works this is the way in which Pemberton's men built them. There is no attempt to construct even a portion, as in the interlacing of works, upon which each man could see the defence of Vicksburg. In consequence of this feature in the rebel works was the lack of gabions, fascines, and other means which are deemed indispensable. In the enemy's works there were none.

It would be unnecessary for me to say that assuming as that a great lack of engineering skill on the part of the enemy was displayed upon this occasion, I would observe. This fact is indubitable to one who has seen them, and their extraordinary strength is to be there ascribed personal the above statement, which is based upon observation.

In conversation with several rebel privates I elicited and sections to the effect that we had not yet all the large guns which had been used in the defence of Vicksburg. I acquired what had become of them. They were not going to tell; but one more incautious than the rest, and excited by said they were buried; and, added no further question. If all six of the guns which have carefully perused the above statement, which is based upon observation.

COPPERHEAD SONG FOR 1870.

No part nor lot in the glorious work,
  No part nor lot had I;
But I sat like a frog on an old hollow log,
  And croaked to the passers-by.
Croak—croak—croak—
  There were many who paused to hear,
And many more who slackened their pace,
  And some turned back in fear.

No part nor lot in the glorious work,
  No part nor lot had I;
But I aimed my gun at the new-risen sun
  And fired at its godlike eye.
Fire—fire—fire—
  We thought we were many and strong,
And could humbug the nation with volleys of words
  To thinking right was wrong.

No part nor lot in the glorious work,
  No part nor lot had I;
But I trod the long grass where the patriots would pass
  And sneered at their rallying cry.
Sneer—sneer—sneer—
  'Tis a sword with a double edge,
And before it many a runner has turned
  To the homestead side of his hedge.

No part nor lot in the glorious work,
  No part nor lot had I;
'Twas little I cared how the bondman fared,
  Though his chain clanked under my eye.
Clank—clank—clank—
  No matter how heavy the pain,
No matter how cutting the steely lash
  That fell o'er a negro's brain.

No part nor lot in the glorious work,
  No part nor lot had I;
And when the air swells with the music of bells
  I only look down with a sigh.
Bells—bells—bells—
  They tell us the nation is free,
And the noble achievers co-workers with God—
  But Copperheads what are we?

VERY HARD CASH.

By CHARLES READE, Esq.
AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIV.

In the terror and confusion no questions were then asked: Alfred got to David's head and told Skinner to take his feet; Mrs. Dodd helped, and they carried him up and laid him on her bed. The servant girls cried, and wailed, and were of little use; Mrs. Dodd hurried them off for medical aid, and she and Julia, though pale as ghosts, and trembling in every limb, were tearless, and almost silent, and did all for the best: they undid a shirt-button, that confined his throat: they set his head high, and tried their poor little eau de cologne and feminine remedies: and each of them held an insensible hand in both hers, clasping it piteously, and trying to hold him tight, so that Death should not take him away from them.

"My son, where is my son?" sighed Mrs. Dodd.

Alfred threw his arm round her neck: "You have one son here: what shall I do?"

The next minute he was running to the telegraph-office for her.

At the gate he found Skinner hanging about, and asked him hurriedly how the calamity had happened. Skinner said Captain Dodd had fallen down senseless in the street, and he had passed soon after, recognized him, and brought him home; "I have paid the men, Sir: I wouldn't let them ask the ladies at such a time."

"Oh, thank you! thank you, Skinner! I will repay you: it is me you have obliged." And Alfred ran off with the words in his mouth.

Skinner looked after him, and muttered: "I forgot him. It is a nice mess. Wish I was out of it." And he went back, hanging his head, to Alfred's father.

Mr. Osmond met him; Skinner turned and saw him enter the villa.

Mr. Osmond came softly into the room, examined Dodd's eye, felt his pulse, and said he must be bled at once.

Mrs. Dodd was averse to this: "Oh, let us try every thing else first," said she; but Osmond told her there was no other remedy: "All the functions we rely on in the exhibition of medicines are suspended."

Dr. Short now drove up, and was ushered in.

Mrs. Dodd asked him imploringly whether it was necessary to bleed. But Dr. Short knew his business too well to be entrapped into an independent opinion where a surgeon had been before him; he drew Mr. Osmond apart and inquired what he had recommended: this ascertained, he turned to Mrs. Dodd and said, I advise venesection, or cupping.

"Oh, Dr. Short, pray have pity and order something less terrible. Dr. Sampson is so averse to bleeding."

"Sampson? Sampson? never heard of him."

"It is the chronothermal man," said Osmond.

"Oh, ah! But this is too serious a case to be quacked. Coma, with stertor, and a full, bounding pulse, indicates liberal blood-letting. I would try venesection; then cup, if necessary, or leech the temporal artery: I need not say, Sir, calomel must complete the cure. The case is simple; and, at present, surgical; I leave it in competent hands." And he retired, leaving the inferior practitioner well pleased with him and with himself; no insignificant part of a physician's art.

When he was gone, Mr. Osmond told Mrs. Dodd that however crotchety Dr. Sampson might be, he was an able man, and had very properly resisted the indiscriminate use of the lancet: the profession owed him much. "But in apoplexy the leech and the lancet are still our sheet-anchors."

Mrs. Dodd uttered a faint shriek: "Apoplexy! Oh, David! Oh, my darling; have you come home for this?"

Osmond assured her apoplexy was not necessarily fatal: provided the cerebral blood-vessels were relieved in time by depletion.

The fixed eye, and terrible stertorous breathing on the one hand, and the promise of relief on the other, overpowered Mrs. Dodd's reluctance. She sent Julia out of the room on a pretext; and then consented with tears to David's being bled. But she would not yield to leave the room; no; this tender woman nerved herself to see her husband's blood flow, sooner than risk his being bled too much by the hard hand of custom. Let the peevish fools, who make their own troubles in love, compare their slight and merited pangs with this: she was his true lover and his wife: yet there she stood with eye horror-stricken yet unflinching, and saw the stab of the little lancet, and felt it deeper than she would a javelin through her own body; and watched the blood run that was dearer to her far than her own.

At the first prick of the lancet David shivered, and, as the blood escaped, his eye unfixed, and the pupils contracted and dilated, and once he sighed. "Good sign that!" said Osmond.

"Oh, that is enough, Sir," said Mrs. Dodd: "we shall faint if you take any more."

Osmond closed the vein, observing that a local bleeding would do the rest. When he had stanched the blood, Mrs. Dodd sank half fainting in her chair; by some marvelous sympathy it was she who had been bled, and whose vein was now closed. Osmond sprinkled water in her face: she thanked him: and said, sweetly, "You see we could not have lost any more."

When it was over she came to tell Julia; she found her sitting on the stairs crying, and pale as marble. She suspected. And there was Alfred hanging over her, and in agony at her grief; out came his love for her in words and accents unmistakable, and this in Osmond's hearing and the maid's.

"Oh, hush! hush!" cried poor Mrs. Dodd; and her face was seen to burn through her tears.

And this was the happy, quiet, little villa of my opening chapters.

Ah, Richard Hardie! Richard Hardie!

The patient was cupped on the nape of the neck by Mr. Osmond, and, on the glasses drawing, showed signs of consciousness, and the breathing was relieved: these favorable symptoms were neither diminished nor increased by the subsequent application of the cupping needles.

"We have turned the corner," said Mr. Osmond, cheerfully.

Rap! rap! rap! came a telegraphic message from Dr. Sampson, and was brought up to the sick room.

"Out visiting patients when yours came. In apoplexy with a red face and stertorous breathing put the feet in mustard bath and dash much cold water on the head from above. On revival give emetic: cure with sulphate of quinine. In apoplexy with a white face treat as for a simple faint: here emetic dangerous. In neither apoplexy bleed. Coming down by train."

This message added to Mrs. Dodd's alarm; the whole treatment varied so from what had been done. She faltered her misgivings; Osmond reassured her. "Not bleed in apoplexy!" said he, superciliously, "why it is the universal practice. Judge for yourself! You see the improvement."

Mrs. Dodd admitted it.

"Then as to the cold water," said Osmond, "I would hardly advise so rough a remedy. And he is going on so well. But you can send for ice; and, meantime, give me a good-sized stocking."

He cut and fitted it adroitly to the patient's head: then drenched it with eau de cologne, and soon the head began to steam.

By-and-by David muttered a few incoherent words: and the anxious watchers thanked God aloud for them.

At length Mr. Osmond took leave with a cheerful countenance, and left them all grateful to him, and with a high opinion of his judgment and skill; especially Julia. She said Dr. Sampson was very amusing to talk to; but she should be sorry to trust to that rash, reckless, boisterous man, in time of danger.

Mr. Osmond, returning home, passed Munday and Co., the undertakers. The shop was shut long ago; but Munday junior was standing at the private door, and invited him in.

"Well, Sir; buried old Mrs. Jephson to-day; and went off capital. Your little commission, Sir, for recommending them our firm." With this he slipped four sovereigns into Mr. Osmond's hand. Osmond smiled benignly at their contact with his palm, and said in a grateful spirit: "There is an apoplexy at Albion Villa."

"Oh, indeed, Sir!" and Munday junior's eyes sparkled.

"But I have bled and cupped him."

"All right, Sir: I'll be on the look-out; and thank you."

About two in the morning a fly drove rapidly up to the villa, and Sampson got out.

He found David pale and muttering, and his wife and children hanging over him in deep distress.

He shook hands with them in silence, and eyed the patient keenly. He took the night-cap off, removed the pillows, lowered his head and said, quietly, "This is the cold fit come on: we must not shut our eyes on the pashint. Why what is this? he has been cupped!" And Sampson changed color, and his countenance fell.

Mrs. Dodd saw, and began to tremble: "I could not hear from you; and Dr. Short and Mr. Osmond felt quite sure: and he seems better. Oh, Doctor Sampson, why were you not here? We have bled him as well. Oh, don't, don't, don't say it was wrong! He would have died: they said so. Oh, David! David! your wife has killed you." And she knelt and kissed his hand and implored his pardon, insensible.

Julia clung sobbing to her mother, in a vain attempt to comfort her.

Sampson groaned:

"No, no," said he; "don't go on so, my poor soul; you did all for the best; and now we must make the best of what is done. Hartshorn! brandy! and caution! For those two assassins have tied my hands."

While applying those timid remedies, he inquired if the cause was known. They told him they knew nothing; but that David had been wrecked on the coast of France, and had fallen down senseless in the street: a clerk of Mr. Hardie's had recognized him, and brought him home: so Alfred said.

"Then the cause is mintal," said Sampson; "unless he got a blow on the hid in bein' wrecked."

He then examined David's head carefully, and found a long scar.

"But this is not it," said he; "this is old."

Mrs. Dodd clasped her hands, and assured him it was new to her: her David had no scar there when he left her last.

Pursuing his examination, Sampson found an open wound in his left shoulder.

He showed it them; and they were all as pale as the patient in a moment. He then asked to see his coat, and soon discovered a corresponding puncture in it, which he examined long and narrowly.

"It is a stab—with a one-edged knife."

There was a simultaneous cry of horror.

"Don't alarm yourselves for that," said Sampson: "it is nothing: a mere flesh-wound. It is the vein-wound that alarms me. This school knows nothing about the paroxysms and remissions of disease. They have bled and cupped him for a passing fit. It has passed into the cold stage, but no quicker than it would have done without stealing a drop of blood. To-morrow, by Disease's nature, he will have another hot fit in spite of their bleeding. Then those ijjits would leech his temples; and on that paroxysm remitting by the nature of Disease, would fancy their leeches had cured it."

The words were the old words, but the tone and manner were so different: no shouting, no anger: all was spoken low and gently, and with a sort of sad and weary and worn-out air.

He ordered a kettle of hot water and a quantity of mustard, and made his preparations for the hot fit as he called it, maintaining the intermittent and febrile character of all disease.

The patient rambled a good deal, but quite incoherently, and knew nobody.

But about eight o'clock in the morning he was quite quiet, and apparently sleeping: so Mrs. Dodd stole out of the room to order some coffee for Sampson and Edward. They were nodding, worn out with watching.

Julia, whose high-strung nature could dispense with sleep on such an occasion, was on her knees praying for her Father.

Suddenly there came from the bed, like a thunder-clap, two words uttered loud and furiously:

"Hardie! Villain!"

Up started the drowsy watchers, and rubbed their eyes. They had heard the sound but not the sense.

Julia rose from her knees bewildered and aghast: she had caught the strange words distinctly; words that were to haunt her night and day.

They were followed immediately by a loud groan: and the stertorous breathing recommenced, and the face was no longer pale, but flushed and turgid. On this Sampson hurried Julia from the room, and, with Edward's help, placed David on a stool in the bath, and getting on a chair discharged half a bucket of cold water on his head; the patient gasped: another; and David shuddered, stared wildly, and put his hand to his head: a third, and he staggered to his feet.

At this moment Mrs. Dodd coming hastily into the room, he looked steadily at her, and said, "Lucy!"

She ran to throw her arms round him, but Sampson interfered: "Gently! gently!" said he, "we must have no violent emotions."

"Oh, no! I will be prudent." And she stood quiet with her arms still extended, and cried for joy.

They got David to bed again, and Sampson told Mrs. Dodd there was no danger now from the malady, but only from the remedies.

And in fact David fell into a state of weakness and exhaustion; and kept muttering unintelligibly.

Dr. Short called in the morning, and was invited to consult with Dr. Sampson. He declined. "Dr. Sampson is a notorious quack: no physician of any eminence will meet him in consultation."

"I regret that resolution," said Mrs. Dodd quietly; "as it will deprive me of the advantage of your skill."

Dr. Short bowed stiffly: "I shall be at your service, madam, when that empiric has given the patient up." And he drove away.

Osmond, finding Sampson installed, took the politic line; he contrived to glide by fine gradations into the empiric's opinions, without recanting his own, which were diametrically opposed.

Sampson, before he shot back to town, asked him to provide a good reliable nurse.

He sent a young woman of iron: she received Sampson's instructions, and assumed the command of the sick room; and was jealous of Mrs. Dodd and Julia; looked on them as mere rival nurses, amateurs, who, if not snubbed, might ruin the professionals: she seemed to have forgotten in the hospitals all about the family affections, and their power of turning invalids themselves into nurses.

The second night she got the patient all to herself for four hours; from eleven till two.

The ladies having consented to this arrangement, in order to recruit themselves for the work they were not so mad as to intrust wholly to a hireling, nurse's feathers smoothed themselves perceptibly.

At twelve the patient was muttering and murmuring incessantly about wrecks, and money, and things: of which vain babble nurse showed her professional contempt by nodding.

At 12.30 she slept.

At 1.20 she snored very loud, and woke instantly at the sound.

She took the thief out of the candle, and went like a good sentinel to look at her charge.

He was not there.

She rubbed her eyes, and held the candle over the place where he ought to be; where, in fact, he must be; for he was far too weak to move.

She tore the bed-clothes down: she beat and patted the clothes with her left hand, and the candle began to shake violently in her right.

The bed was empty.

Mrs. Dodd was half asleep when a hurried tap came to her door: she started up in a moment, and great dread fell on her; was David sinking?

"Ma'am! Ma'am! Is he here?"

"He! Who?" cried Mrs. Dodd, bewildered.

"Why him! he can't be far off."

In a moment Mrs. Dodd had opened the door; and her tongue and the nurse's seemed to clash together, so fast came the agitated words from each in turn; and crying "Call my son! Alarm the house!" Mrs. Dodd darted into the sick room. She was out again in a moment, and up in the attics rousing the maids, while the nurse thundered at Edward's door, and Julia's, and rang every bell she could get at. The inmates were soon alarmed, and flinging on their clothes: meantime Mrs. Dodd and the nurse scoured the house and searched every nook in it down to the very cellar; they found no David,

But they found something.

The street door ajar.

It was a dark, drizzly night.

Edward took one road, Mrs. Dodd and Elizabeth another.

They were no sooner gone than Julia drew the nurse into a room apart, and asked her eagerly if her Father had said nothing.

"Said nothing, Miss? Why he was a talking all the night incessant."

"Did he say any thing particular? think now."

"No, Miss: he went on as they all do just before a change. I never minds 'em; I hear so much of it."

"Oh nurse! nurse! have pity on me! try and recollect."

"Well, Miss, to oblige you then; it was mostly fights this time—and wrecks—and villains—and bankers—and sharks."

"Bankers??!" asked Julia, eagerly.

"Yes, Miss, and villains; they come once or twice; but most of the time it was sharks, and ships, and money, and—hotch-potch I call it the way they talk: bless your heart they know no better: every thing they ever saw, or read, or heard tell of, it all comes out higgledy piggledy just before they goes off: we that makes it a business never takes no notice of what they says, Miss: and never repeats it out of one sick house into another: that you may rely on."

Julia scarcely heard this: her hands were tight to her brow, as if to aid her to think with all her force.

The result was, she told Sarah to put on her bonnet: and rushed up stairs.

She was not gone three minutes; but in that short interval the nurse's tongue and Sarah's clashed together swiftly and incessantly.

Julia heard them. She came down with a long cloak on, whipped the hood over her head, beckoned Sarah quickly, and darted out.

Sarah followed instinctively, but, ere they had gone many yards from the house, said,

"Oh, Miss, nurse thinks you had much better not go."

"Nurse thinks! Nurse thinks! What does she know of me and my griefs?"

"Why, Miss, she is a very experienced woman, and she says— Oh dear! oh dear! And such a dark, cold night for you to be out!"

"Nurse? Nurse? What did she say?"

"Oh, I haven't the heart to tell you: if you would but come back home with me! She says as much as that poor master's troubles will be over long before we can get to him." And with this Sarah burst out sobbing.

"Come quicker," cried Julia, despairingly. But after a while she said, "Tell me; only don't stop me."

"Miss, she says she nursed Mr. Campbell, the young curate that died last Harvest-time but one, you know; and he lay just like master, and she expecting a change every hour: and oh, Miss, she met him coming down stairs in his night-gownd: and he said, 'Nurse, I am all right now,' says he, and died momently in her arms at the stair-foot. And she nursed an old farmer that lay as weak as master, and, just when they looked for him to go, lo and behold him dressed and out digging potatoes, and fell down dead before they could get hands on him mostly: and nurse have a friend, that have seen more than she have, which she is older than nurse, and says a body's life is all one as a rush-light, flares up strong momently, just before it goes out altogether. Dear heart, where ever are we going to in the middle of the night?"

"Don't you see? to the quay."

"Oh, don't go there, Miss, whatever! I can't abide the sight of the water, when a body's in trouble." Here a drunken man confronted them, and asked them if they wanted a beau: and, on their slipping past him in silence, followed them, and offered repeatedly to treat them. Julia moaned, and hurried faster. "Oh, Miss," said Sarah, "what could you expect, coming out at this time of night? I'm sure the breath is all out of me; you do tear along so."

"Tear? we are crawling. Ah, Sarah, you are not his daughter. There, follow me! I can not go so slow." And she set off to run.

Presently she passed a group of women standing talking at a corner of the street; and windows were open with night-capped heads framed in them.

She stopped a moment to catch the words; they were talking about a ghost which was said to have just passed down the street; and discussing whether it was a real ghost, or a trick to frighten people.

Julia uttered a low cry, and redoubled her speed, and was soon at Mr. Richard Hardie's door: but the street was deserted, and she was bewildered, and began to think she had been too hasty in her conjecture. A chill came over her impetuosity. The dark, drizzly, silent night, the tall masts, the smell of the river, how strange it all seemed: and she to be there alone at such an hour.

Presently she heard voices somewhere near. She crossed over to a passage that seemed to lead toward them; and then she heard the voices plainly, and among them one that did not mingle with the others, for it was the voice she loved. She started back and stood irresolute. Would he be displeased with her?

Feet came trampling slowly along the passage. His voice came with them.

She drew back and looked round for Sarah.

While she stood fluttering, the footsteps came close, and there emerged from the passage into the full light of the gas-lamp Alfred and two policemen carrying a silent, senseless figure, in a night-gown, with a great-coat thrown over part of him.

It was her Father; mute and ghastly.

The policemen still tell of that strange meeting under the gaslight by Hardie's Bank; and how the young lady flung her arms round her father's head, and took him for dead, and kissed his pale cheeks, and moaned over him; and how the young gentleman raised her against her will, and sobbed over her; and how they, though policemen, cried like children. And to them I must refer the reader: I have not the skill to convey the situation.

They got more policemen to help, and carried him to Albion Villa.

On the way, something cold and mysterious seemed to have come between Julia and Alfred. They walked apart in gloomy silence broken only by foreboding sighs.

I pass over the tempest of emotions under which that sad burden entered Albion Villa, and hurry to the next marked event.

Next day the patient had lost his extreme pallor, and wore a certain uniform sallow hue; and at noon, just before Sampson's return, he opened his eyes wide and fixed them on Mrs. Dodd and Julia, who were now his nurses. They hailed this with delight, and held their breath to hear him speak to them the first sweet words of reviving life and love.

But soon to their surprise and grief they found he did not know them. They spoke to him, each in turn, and told him piteously who they were, and implored him with tears to know them, and speak to them. But no, he fixed a stony gaze on them that made them shudder; and their beloved voices passed over him like an idle wind.

Sampson, when he came, found the ladies weeping by the bedside.

They greeted him with affection—Julia especially: the boisterous controversialist had come out a gentle, zealous artist, in presence of a real danger.

Dr. Sampson knew nothing of what had happened in his absence. He stepped to the bedside cheerfully, and the ladies' eyes were bent keenly on his face in silence.

He had no sooner cast eyes on David than his countenance fell, and his hard but expressive features filled with concern.

That was enough for Mrs. Dodd: "And he does not know me," she cried: "he does not know my voice. His voice would call me back from the grave itself. He is dying. He will never speak to me again. Oh, my poor orphan girl!"

"No! no!" said Sampson, "you are quite mistaken: he will not die. But—"

His tongue said no more. His grave and sombre face spoke volumes.

LATEST NEWS FROM THE DEAD.

SCATTERED about the world are dead and buried cities that it is one of the labors of the living in our day to disentomb. There are Pompeii and Herculaneum open, to bear witness yet to the life of the past. At Pompeii the disentombment is now going on with fresh activity and good result. Old Egypt is delivering up fresh secrets of her dead at Thebes and elsewhere. Spades and picks have been busy over the grave of Carthage, and other dead and buried cities of the Carthaginians. Nineveh and Babylon, having been in the hands of such resurrectionists as Mr. Layard, Sir Henry Rawlinson, and others, are left at peace for a short time. Any news thence is old news; but from the graves of other cities what is the latest intelligence?

By the sunny shores of the Bay of Naples stood for centuries the remnants of an old wall; and the people who lived near it never cared to dig below the surface. It is now one hundred and fifteen years ago that a workman, engaged in digging a well near this ruin, cut into a hollow chamber, of which the walls were covered with paintings. By the slow clearing away of the earth from buildings made by men who lived at the beginning of the Christian era, dwelling-houses, temples, altars, statues, built for the worship of heathen deities, baths, and theatres, were found all struck to silence like the Sleeping Beauty, only for a great many hundred years instead of one; and, in our day, so restored to light and life, that we see what the towns-people were doing in the house and in the street in the month of August, A.D. 79. There is written record of the cause of this sudden burial of a city whose inhabitants were in the full tide of luxurious enjoyment. The letter remains in which the younger Pliny tells Tacitus the horrors of a three days' eruption of Vesuvius, in which his uncle (admiral of the Roman fleet then lying in the bay), having approached too near the burning mountain, although still miles distant from it, met his death by the exhalations bursting from beneath his feet. The admiral had asthma, and the sulphurous vapors appear to have suffocated him at once, so that he fell, while his attendants fled from the scene of destruction to embark on board their ships. Returning, as soon as it became light, which was not until after the end of three days, they found their master lying, stretched as they had left him, as if he had fallen asleep.

Of late years the removal of the mass of mud, ashes, and pumice-stones, which the burning mountain had thrown out upon the city, has confirmed the statement of another ancient writer, that the town of Pompeii had been, at the time of its total destruction, in course of rebuilding after the consequences of a violent earthquake which had happened sixteen years before. For, as we walk along its streets, we not only see the theatre and many other edifices to have been in process of reconstruction at the time of their burial, but in the quarter once occupied by the stone and marble masons there lie portions of an old frieze, executed in volcanic stone, beside which stand copies of the same decoration cut in white marble ready for erection in a restored temple. There are wheel-tracks in the lava pavement; there are worn stone-steps leading up to temples and places of business; and, curiously enough, there is stone, worn by the hands of those who daily stopped to drink at the fountains placed at the street-crossings. By constantly leaning on one hand while they stooped to drink the running water, these people, who for so many centuries have known no more thirst, wore a hollow in the stone rim of the basin upon which they leaned. Terrible testimony is given as to the suddenness of the last catastrophe. Bread is in the bakers'-shops; there is a meal prepared, but never tasted, in a tavern. Outside that gate in the town-wall which led toward Herculaneum was found a skeleton in armor. It was that of the soldier on guard, who, faithful to duty, had not left his post. In a niche sheltering a seat for the use of tired travelers were found the bones of a woman and a baby, and those of two other persons clasped in one another's arms. A few paces further on were three more skeletons, two of persons who had been running one way, and the other of a person who had been hastening in the opposite direction. Of these, one held sixty-nine pieces of gold and one hundred and twenty-one of silver. Money was found lying beside the remains of people who had died in the vain endeavor to carry away means of the life whose sands were run. In a room of the Temple of Isis the priest of that Egyptian deity had met death with feasting, for near him were lying egg-shells and the bones of fowls and of a pig, together with a broken glass and a wine vase. In the house known as that of Diomed were the remains of a man, with that of a goat having a bell slung round its neck. In this dwelling were discovered more than twenty human beings. In a stable were the bones of a mule, still with its bronze bit between its teeth; in another place was the skeleton of a dog beside the bones of his master. Some skeletons had four gold rings on the same finger; one had a bronze lantern in his hand, with which he had doubtless been trying to find his way out of the thick darkness of that day of terror.

All these remains were discovered many years ago, but the work of excavation was then very slow. Now the recent change of government has given a new impulse to this most interesting labor, insomuch that during the last few months more has been done toward disinterment of the secrets of this buried community than had been accomplished in the previous quarter of a century. There is a regular organization of labor, and about three hundred persons, many of them girls and women, are employed in removing the crust formed eighteen centuries ago by eruption from the mountain which now rises behind the scene, without even a wreath of smoke upon its summit. Upon a regular tramway trucks, impelled by their own weight, run down an inclined plane, and discharge their loads at the end, just as is done at the formation of a railway. An entirely new quarter of the town has been thus opened out; and there has been found within the last few days the roof of a house, with all its tiles lying at their proper angle of inclination, the ashes and mud having poured into and filled the room beneath it so completely as to support its covering. There are two houses with walls painted in fresco, looking, when disclosed, as fresh as when first placed upon the walls. Unfortunately, in a very little time the colors fade away and alter. The reds especially soon become quite black.

These changes are probably due to chemical alteration produced by the sun's rays, and to the oxydizing power of the air. If, therefore, as soon as one of these paintings is discovered, it could be washed over with a solution of boiling glass, such as is used by the modern fresco painters in Munich, these interesting specimens of ancient art might be preserved. The writer has suggested this to Signor Fiorello, the director of the excavations. The very substance is sold in Italy for the purpose of preserving wood from the effects of fire, and is known by the name of liquore di selce. Several bodies have been recently found embedded in a mass of hardened mud; and the fortunate idea struck Signor Fiorello of pouring plaster of Paris into the moulds thus formed. In this manner an exact cast was made, inclosing such parts of the contained bodies as remained undecomposed. Thus were obtained, first, the body of a man lying stretched upon his back, his features very well preserved; in fact, so perfectly, that his friends, were they alive still, could have sworn to his identity. Afterward the remains of two females, a woman and a young girl, were preserved in the same manner; so that, while of the dress only a cast remains, the skull-bones themselves are there, resting upon the outstretched arm. At the moment of death the left hand seems to have been clasping the dress. In the elder female the left hand is shut, one of the fingers having a ring upon it. This group consisted of one man and three women, probably all of the same family, who were attempting to save themselves by flight, after having hastily secured certain objects which they valued. Silver money, besides four ear-rings and a finger-ring all made of gold, together with the remains of a linen bag, were lying near the woman.

One is struck by the fact that very many of the persons thus disclosed expired while engaged in the act of drawing their dress over their features. Two reasons may be given for this. One, that it was done in the endeavor to prevent suffocation from the mephitic vapors given off by the volcano. The other and the better, that it was customary among the Romans to hide the face when in the act of death. Thus, true to history, Shakspeare makes Antony say of "the mightiest Julius:"

> And, in his mantle muffling up his face,
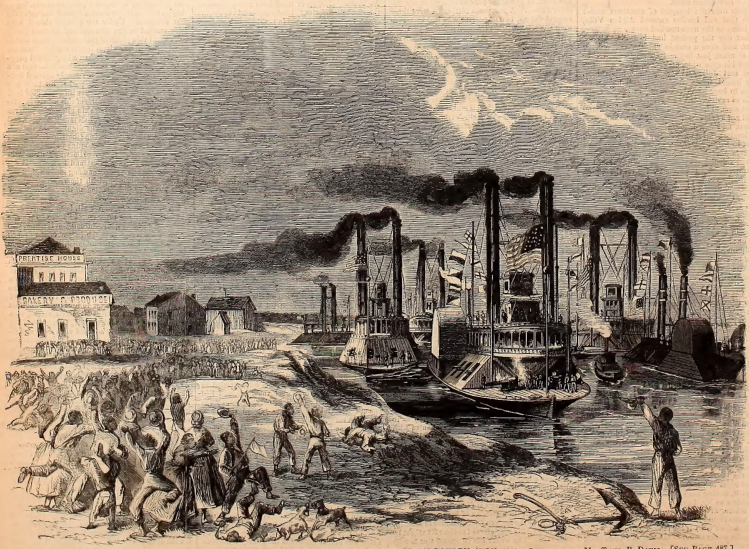
> Even at the base of Pompey's statua,
> Which all the while ran blood, great Cæsar fell.

Time, though he shovels slowly, gets through more work than the liveliest volcano, and is a sexton who has dug the grave of many a proud city. The remains of Roman London lie buried fifteen feet below the level of the present streets. You are on the Nile, and see, on either bank, a green plain under a cloudless sky. The columns and towers of the great temple of Luxor rise from among the miserable hovels of a starved little modern market town. You sail by, and it is all bright green plain again till a mile further to the north the towers of Karnak overtop a palm grove that partly hides the wonders of its wide-spread ruins. But on the green plain between Luxor and Karnak, and for twelve miles toward the hills of the Eastern Desert, stood the temples, palaces, and gardens, of hundred-gated Thebes, for a thousand years the capital of the great nation of the ancient world. Time has done its work in its own slow way, and the Nile, rising from its newly-discovered source in a great tropical lake, and swollen by the periodical rains of the tropics (not by melting snows), has played the part of a Vesuvius. Harvests were eight feet above the buried ground on which the glory of the Pharaohs was displayed. At Thebes, also, there have been recent excavations and discoveries. Diodorus stated the circuit of old Thebes, as reported in his time, to have been sixteen miles. Strabo says that in his day the vestiges extended in length nine miles and a quarter. Those old sunny cities, with their included gardens, lay large upon the cultivated soil. Babylon was fourteen miles square; Syracuse, twenty-two miles; Carthage, of which also the remains are now being dug upon, was twenty-three miles in circuit. Yet London is larger than them all, excepting Babylon. The greatest length of London street is from east to west, in which direction one may pass between houses for fourteen miles. With all its straggling feelers into the country brought into a compact square, the size of London would be seven miles by four, and its circuit twenty-two miles. This would include a population packed together, with but a few little breathing grounds of park and square to answer to the Babylonian gardens, fields, and orchards, which gave men the enjoyments of a country-house in the heart of a capital.

We have details from Mr. Rhind of his own recent excavation at Thebes of the unrifled tomb of an Egyptian dignitary. He found it by help of the forty men who dug under his order. In seven weeks a doorway into the rock was uncovered. This door had been opened; the tomb within, and another within that, had been rifled; there were broken mummy-boxes; and mummies themselves lay where they had been tossed out, with their wrappings ripped up along throat and breast. But further along, at the foot of the same piece of rock, other men had been set to dig, and two months of work cleared the way to a tomb yet with its seal apparently unbroken. The first entrance was into a gallery within the rock, about eight feet square and fifty-five feet long, its walls smoothly plastered with clay. Half-way down this gallery Mr. Rhind came to a funeral canopy of brightly-painted pillars, supporting a painted roof, with a sort of temple front in miniature, all very gay with red and blue and yellow. This corresponded to our hearse and feathers over the dead, and had been delivered up as well as charged for, by the ancient undertaker. Further inward there sat, carved in stone, a pair of monumental figures, two feet high, male and female, side by side. Their superscription showed that the deceased gentleman had been a chief of the military police of the Temple of Ammon Ra, at Thebes. He was decidedly plump, and on his dress was inscribed, "All food off the tables of Ammon Ra and Mut is given to the deceased." The lady by the gentleman's side was inscribed, "His sister beloved from the depth of his heart." The statues were flanked by tall jars.



After this couple had been buried further use had been made of their tomb. Two entrances were found, still built up, leading to passages, one midway in this gallery, the other at the end of it. There was also at the end of the gallery a massive wooden door, barred, locked, and protected by a barricade of large stones built in front of it to half its height. Great was the excitement of the whole body of resurrectionists. The sealed entrances were guarded through the night by sailors from the boat; for there was no trusting the fellaheen of Gounreh, demoralized by a successful traffic in antiquities. Early next morning the entrance to the side-passage was opened. It led to a couple of small cells, both in confusion, with their plain black wooden mummy cases broken, and the bodies turned out, many of them unwrapped. There were a few sepulchral images, and in the innermost cell yet lay the plain Roman lamp of terra-cotta, with black nozzle and half-burnt wick, that had lighted the plunderers two thousand years ago. There remained the massive door, of such substantial timber that in ill-timbered Egypt it was a prize worthy to be competed for by a bishop, a deacon, a consular agent, and two sheiks. The door opened on a sloping tunnel, in which a man could walk upright. It was a tunnel seventy feet long, leading to a shaft or well ten feet by six. Half-way down this gallery also there were cells which had been rifled. Hope now lay, like truth, at the bottom of the well. The well, twenty feet deep, was crossed by strong beams, over which still hung the rope of twisted palm fibres, by which the dead and those who carried them, descended centuries ago. At the bottom there were again chambers. Of these, three contained mummies of persons who had been buried in ordinary cases; but a fourth death-chamber contained a massive dark granite sarcophagus, with the rollers and planks by which it had been moved into position still lying about it. The want of veneration for antiquity shown by these people, now themselves so ancient, appeared in the use, as planks, of broken mummy cases covered with hieroglyphics. At the doorway of this principal vault was a tall jar nearly full of palm-nuts; there were nuts also scattered about the floor. At the head of the sarcophagus was the preserved body of a dog, like a small Italian greyhound, swathed in osiers; also a mummied ibis, a doll of a hawk, and a ball of bitumen. The dog was an emblem of Anubis, genius of tombs. Whenever a house-dog died in the course of nature all the inmates of the house shaved their whole persons. The ibis was emblematical of the recording angel. The hawk was the symbol of Horus, who ushered the souls that were saved into the presence of Osiris; and within the ball of bitumen was a coiled snake, probably the horned snake sacred to Ammon Ra, the god especially honored at Thebes.

The solid cover of the sarcophagus, freed from the cement which fastened it, was raised, and the sarcophagus itself was then found to have been filled with bitumen poured in hot over the mummy. The clearing away of this was a long work, and early in the course of it the glitter of a golden chaplet excited the Arab workmen, who dream wildly of treasures to be found in the unopened tombs. The face of the mummy was cased by a gilt mask, and the temples were wreathed with a chaplet of copper thickly gilt, having eleven bay-leaves of thin gold attached to it by pliant stalks. The outer cloth covering of the rest of the body was painted in a diagonal pattern, answering to that on the top of the wooden funeral canopy at the first entrance. Under the painted shroud were folds steeped in fine bitumen and pungent gums, with small thin plates of gold, some of them beetle-shaped, and glassy pieces interspersed. From the left side of the dead was taken a large ritual papyrus. When the body itself was reached—that of a man of mature years, with strongly marked features—the skin of the upper part of his body was found to have been covered with thick gold leaf. In another case was the wife of this dignitary, also with the upper part of her skin gilt, and a papyrus by her side. Others were differently adorned, and one had a gilt mask. The dignitary in the sarcophagus was named Leban; he had had charge of the royal horses, and died nine years before our era, at the age of sixty. His wife's name was Tabai, daughter of a priest and lord, who is described as "one very great among mortals." They went down to the pit, with the records that are their letters of introduction to the antiquaries of the nineteenth century.

Carthage, too, has, after all, been incompletely blotted out. After three months' labor on the site of ancient Carthage, Mr. Nathan Davis found, two or three years ago, that the keeper of the French chapel there had been stimulated, by observation of his wanderings, to dig at the foot of a piece of wall near a wide pit that had been opened in vain by searchers among the apparently poor ruins of the temple of Astarte. He found in a few hours a charming mosaic, measuring about four feet by two and a half. It was complete, and the nature of the ground made it appear to him impossible that there could be more. But Mr. Davis, setting men to work, soon disclosed the bright mosaics of the corner of a temple floor adorned with a colossal female bust, and with two full-robed priestesses dancing before their goddess. More digging brought to light more of the rich pavement trodden by the worshipers in a great temple that had been restored when Carthage became the capital of Roman Africa. Much more of old Carthage has since been found. The Carthaginian houses were built, above the lower story, with what Pliny called formacean walls; of earth inclosed between boards; such walls being declared proof against rain, wind, and fire. There yet remain turrets of earth built by Hannibal as watch-towers on Spanish mountain-tops. But when these earthen walls of Carthage fell in ruins they formed heaps of rubbish that a few years would transform into mounds of apparently natural soil, with nothing left under them but unsuspected pavements, through which the Romans often dug in the rebuilding of the city. A thin layer of charcoal, or some other evidence of the action of fire, is always found on the remains of ancient Carthage. The use of clay bricks for building has been assigned as one main cause of the complete disappearance of Babylon. For Babylon the mighty city is fallen. Scarcely a detached figure or tablet has been dug from the vast heaps that are the graves of all its glory.

THE RIOTS AT NEW YORK—THE RIOTERS BURNING AND SACKING THE COLORED ORPHAN ASYLUM.—[SEE PAGE 494.]

THE RIOTS IN NEW YORK.

We devote a considerable portion of our space this week to illustrations of the disgraceful and infamous Riot which took place in this city last week.

On page 493 will be found a picture of

THE BURNING OF THE COLORED ORPHAN ASYLUM,

by which exploit the rioters, on Monday 13th, inaugurated their sway. This outrage is thus described in the Times:

The Orphan Asylum for Colored Children was visited by the mob about four o'clock. This Institution is situated on Fifth Avenue and the building, with the grounds and garden adjoining, extended from Forty-third to Forty-fourth Street. Hundreds, and perhaps thousands of the rioters, the majority of whom were women and children, entered the premises, and in the most orderly and well-bred manner they ransacked and plundered the building from cellar to garret. The building was formerly the most pleasant and healthy portion of the city. It was purely a charitable institution. In it there are on an average 450 or 600 homeless colored orphans. The building was a large four-story one, with two wings of three stories each.

When it became evident that the crowd designed to destroy it, a flag of truce appeared on the front steps and the principal of the establishment made an appeal to the excited people, but he was vain.

Here it was that Chief-Engineer Decker exhibited all one of his most amazing traits. After the entire building had been ransacked, and every article which was worth carrying away had been taken, this inclined to even the little generosity that the rioters were capable of, and he ordered the good ladies of this city—the premises were in charge of a lady—to leave. Mr. Decker did all he could to prevent the flames from being kindled, but when he was overpowered by superior numbers, with the matches he scattered the brands, and effectually extinguished the flames, and almost all hope was taken away. But in no three different parts of the house. Again he succeeded, with the aid of but a dozen of his men, in frustrating the incendiaries. The mob became highly exasperated at his conduct, and threatened to take his life if he persisted in the act. On the front steps of the building he stood up amidst an infuriated and half-drunken mob of fiends, and he begged of them to do nothing so disgraceful to humanity as to burn the charitable institution, which they in fact had nothing but good. He said it would be a lasting disgrace to them and the city of New York.

These remarks seemed to have no good effect upon them, for meantime the premises were again fired in different parts of the house. Mr. Decker, with his five brave men, again extinguished the flames. The mob then poured down upon the wengeance of all who were bent on the destruction of the property, and but for the fact that the firemen surrounded him, and boldly said that Mr. Decker could not be touched except over their bodies, he would have been dispatched on the spot. The institution was destined to be burned, and so he bore and a half dozen men on the part of the mob it was in flames in all parts. Three or four persons were hurriedly bruised by the falling walls, but the names we could not ascertain. There is now scarcely one brick left standing upon another of the Orphan Asylum.

Another reporter of the Times says:

During the burning of the Colored Orphan Asylum a regular battle occurred between Fatally McCarthy, with four stage-drivers of the Forty-second Street line and the members of Engine Company No. 26, rescued property from the burning orphan children who were surrounded by the mob, and in defiance of the threats of the rioters, carried them to the Thirty-fifth District Station-house. It hardly seems credible, yet it is the truth, that while the mob were in possession of such private property as they had time to gather up, the unfortunate colored children were cried out, "Murder, murder!" "Bring the sacks of the old nigger!" "Kill the nigger!" Had it not been for the courageous conduct of the parties mentioned, there is little doubt that many, and perhaps all of those helpless children, would have been murdered in the blood.

On page 484 we illustrate the

CHARGE OF THE POLICE UPON THE RIOTERS

who were engaged in sacking the Tribune office. We take pleasure in publishing the following graphic account of this affair from an officer who took part in it, and can personally testify to its correctness:

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—As a variety of conflicting statements have been published in the daily papers purporting to be descriptive of the dispersion of the rioters engaged in sacking the Tribune office, a brief statement of the manner of the gallant brilliant affair, from a participant, may possibly be not unacceptable.

At seven o'clock on Monday evening the members of the 26th Precinct force, numbering 35 men, 30 of whom were detailed in their Squad-room, southeast corner City Hall basement. With them, at the same time, were assembled, constituting with the 26th a special reserve at that important point—over the reserve of the 1st Precinct, Captain Warlow; the bulk of Captain Bryan's force (6th Precinct) having been previously ordered to their headquarters, 300 Mulberry Street; that gallant officer was also present as a volunteer. A report, whether duly authorized or not, that a riot was progressing in the 1st Precinct, started the Vigilance and his command, immediately after the 26th, under Captain Thorne: on down Broadway, to the Park, by Nassau, and up that street to Spruce Street, when we found that the disturbance, a slight one, had been suppressed by the police of the 1st Precinct, our march was countermanded, and, passing the Evening Post, a cheer greeted us from the building—the first intimation about the Tribune office. Arrived there, the men were hastily ordered. It was now dark, or nearly so, and through the desperadoes among us could not be seen, the street was lighted on the west side of Nassau, just south of the Times Building. The men were dropped, and took position on our left. A few hurried words of consultation between Captains Thorne and Warlow, and we were ready to pass and ready. We could now distinctly hear the crashing of wood and glass, the work of the mob whose numbers had commenced, but with the earnestness and thoroughness which characterized the conduct of the police from the start, there was no shouting or profane clamor. It was a strictly orderly conquest and subjugation of a lawless ravabe. So earnest were they in their work—as shouted, in fact, their fury, their every act, "Determined"—that the steady, now, then, Forward! Charge! from Captain Thorne, was not even heard save by a few around the Thorne corner. With a shout from a hundred throats, the 26th leading the way, we struck down the street, solid, heaving and scattering them in utter rout, ruin, and dismay. At the corner we ordered the office, and charged as far as the ground-floor, and the few foot-hardy rebels who were found were unceremoniously driven to the street, or into immobility, and hurriedly dragged off by trusty hands to prevent their being trod to death by the rush of the broad human wave, or being taken care of years of pain and disfigurement. The squares—as usual—were cleared quickly by a surging of the thousand strong crowd in five minutes, even cleared to a point below French's Hotel, or where the dead and wounded were being carried away, followed by terrified friends. We did not try to take prisoner till after the fight was over, and that difficult matter. The 26th, finding a man, who gave his name as Burt Francis, in the act of firing a gun by the counter in the office upon him, and he was duly committed next morning. Only two more arrests were made.

Victorious, but breathless, we had just succeeded in extinguishing the flames, which had by this time broke out, when a shout as from a great crowd was heard, and a force of men were seen charging across the Park toward us from the direction of Broadway. The word was given, "Stand fast!" and every man squared himself for what now seemed about to be a death-struggle with an overwhelming force against us. But it was only the reserve moment; but our response was immediately at an end. The bright helmets and epaulets of Warlow and our gallant fellows from Broadway were recognized, the grizzled locks and martial figure of the Metropolitan was here, brave Dan Carpenter, conspicuous at their head. One loud, ringing cheer went up, while trusty but un heard, of triumph and relief. Victory was with the right. Law and order had triumphed.

The importance of our coup can hardly be overestimated. The suddenness and vigor of the blow took the mob right out of the murdering abuse at the start, and effectually demoralized whatever of organization they had in the lower part of the city. The Tribune, Times, and World would inevitably have gone as a consequence even of their partial success in the upper part of the city, and the burning on the possible havoc and destruction of the unused but hoarded collected Dead Letters!

The officers in command were Captains Thorne, 26th; Dicky Hall, Prevention; and Warlow, 1st Precinct, accompanied by Captain Bryan, 6th Precinct, as an auxiliary volunteer. The commissioned officers and their gallant officers and men be held in grateful remembrance.

One of our special artists, who was detailed to sketch the progress of the riot, thus describes the sketches he furnished, which are reproduced on pages 484 and 485:

MASSACRE OF A NEGRO IN CLARKSON STREET.

One of the first victims to the insane fury of the rioters was a negro carman residing in Carmine Street. A gang of these fiends boys hauled this unfortunate man on Monday evening, and having beaten him until he was in a state of insensibility, dragged him to the corner of Clarkson, hung him from a branch of one of the trees that shade the sidewalk by the rope attached to his cart, and fired it not stop here, however. Procuring long sticks, they tied rags and straw to the ends of them, and then saturating them with turpentine, fired them, setting fire to his clothes, and burning him almost to a cinder. The remains of the wretched negro hung in this position all night and Tuesday morning, when they were removed by the police. The atrocious murder was perpetrated within a few feet of a constituted ground, where the white headstones of the cemetery are seen gleaming through the wooden palisades.

THE MURDER OF COLONEL O'BRIEN.

As I arrived at the corner of Thirty-fourth Street and Second Avenue, the rioters were dragging the body of a dead man from the middle of the street. It was difficult to obtain any information from the by-standers, who were terror-struck by the savage fury of the mob. It appeared, however, that the body was that of Colonel O'Brien of the Eleventh New York. Force was not a police-station, and within view of which inquiry could be made. "What did they kill him for?" I asked a man standing on the sidewalk opposite. "Belaid I suppose it was to square accounts," replied he. "There was a woman and child kilt there below a while ago by the brutal roughs who surrounded the body first pistols at it occasionally, and pelted it with brickbats and other missiles. The unfortunate fate of this unfortunate victim is said to have been remarkable, and those who witnessed the tyrd when the body lay some hours later state that breathing was even then perceptible.

SACKING OF A DRUG-STORE.

Sated with blood, the rioters now turned their attention to plunder. A drug-store close by where Colonel O'Brien lay was completely ridded by them, the doors and windows being broken in with clubs and stones. Women hovered upon the skirts of the crowd, and received the articles as they were thrown or handed from the store. One fellow rushed out with a closely-packed valise, which he pounded in the street. The clothes and other things contained in it were eagerly seized and contended for by boys and women standing around. These articles consisted of letters in it, and some documents with seals, which were probably of value to the owner; but these were savagely torn and trampled by the clamorous and disappointed plunderers. A woman sat upon the steps near by, and read out passages from the letters to the amusement the jeers of her rhield companions. Another parcel me varying in triumph a large parchment manuscript and exclaimed:

ATTACK UPON THE CLOTHING-STORE OF MESSRS. BROOKS BROTHERS.

From the first of the riot clothing appeared to be a great object of attraction with the plundering mob. On Monday evening a large number of marauders paid a visit to the extensive clothing-store of Brooks Brothers, corner of Broadway and Catharine and Cherry streets. Here they helped themselves to all they could carry away, and after which they might be seen dispersing in all directions, laden with their ill-gotten booty.

THE GERMAN VALLEY.

Away up in Yorkville the German tailors were sad sufferers, in consequence of the demand for confiscable apparel. I saw an able-bodied ruffian, with a pantaloon leg on his head by way of hat, and of his shirt crammed full of pieces of dry-goods of all colors, and a vest and shoulder-straps, and of gorgeous, many-colored ties fluttered from his arm as he ran. "Why did they ridicule that shop?" I asked of one of the by-standers, pointing to it. "Because the owner is a German," was the reply. Here an Irishman of the non-combative type chimed in, saying, "No, it was because all the Dutch boys wouldn't wear the clothes. But it's a shame to state them, any how, and no good ever come of the likes." "Begorra that's thrue for you, Frank Tully," remarked his companion; and thereupon they both resumed their plundering, and I left the scene, and opposed to the scenes of violence passing around me.

On returning down the Avenue, a quarter of an hour later, I recognized the wretched Frank Tully and his friend, in an alley-way, busily engaged in trying on some new trousers, which did not look as if they had been just bought and paid for.

A GORILLA AT LARGE.

During the entire withdrawal of the police and military from the streets, I passed through many highway robberies must have been perpetrated. Coming down Third Avenue, I passed a group of young ruffians who were amusing themselves with snapping their pistols. One threw his revolver high into the air, and caught it by the barrel as it came down, bragging at the same time that it was both loaded and cocked. A few steps further on I found myself face to face with a fearful-looking desperado, who came suddenly upon me round a corner.

"Hello me buck!" cried he; "I don't be in a hurry, now. Hand over your cane; and fork out all you've got."

Fortunately he was somewhat drunk, and he grasped in his right hand a bundle of "greenbacks," which seemed to embarrass him a little. As he still pressed upon me, however, I turned to the young pistoleers, saying,

"Boys, here's a fellow wants to draft me; are we going to stand that?"

This created a diversion in my favor; and when I saw that the attention of the young rowdies was attracted to the money in the desperado's hand I improved the opportunity and proceeded up a cross street, at an accelerated pace. Had I struck him with my stick, which was my first impulse, I should most assuredly have fallen a victim to the blind fury of the young pistoliers. Probably the right owner of the "greenbacks" fared much worse than I did, independent of the loss of his money.

THE DEAD SERGEANT.

On Thursday there was a great deal of fighting going on between the military and the rioters in the neighborhood of Twentieth Street and First Avenue. Passing through Twenty-second Street, I saw a dead sergeant lying on the sidewalk. From his uniform I judged that he belonged to the Fourteenth New York Cavalry. He was killed by a shot through the head, which had entered his temple, and then barbarously beaten and mangled by the mob. As he lay there, with a cloth thrown by some sympathizing person over his face, to hide his ugly wounds, ill-looking women came now and then to look at him. Some of them had their children in their arms, and pointing them out to their infant children with fiendish glee. The little boys amused themselves in the intervals by hauling at the dead sergeant's clothes, and by the time I left the ground with heavy "thud," Others performed savage dances around the body, whistling tunes of a lively kind, or even sang it. Dropping shots were coming from the windows and roofs of houses not far distant, as I and I did, now prolong my stay in that part of the city. It was any thing but safe ground. As I was crossing over a street in search of a shorter road sergeant by I heard the word "Fire!" and on turning round saw that a platoon of soldiers were firing down the street right in front of the rioters of where I stood. I believe they were aiming high, to reach the windows of some distant houses, which accounts for their escape.

On page 484 we illustrate one of the severest fights of the week, that between the mob and the troops on 16th inst., the FIGHT IN SECOND AVENUE.

This is faithfully described in the Times as follows:

At five o'clock last evening intelligence was sent to Police Headquarters that the mob, between Five and Second avenues, in the neighborhood of Twenty-ninth Street, had already burned their specimen in grog, and that they were robbing and plundering all the stores in that vicinity.

A military force was speedily sent to the spot; but when they arrived there they found the rioters were too much for them, and after contesting the field for half an hour they were obliged to retire. A sergeant who had command of a portion of the military force was shot, and afterward most brutally beaten to death, the body lay in the street for three hours. The military and police were powerless to suppress the riot, which for the last week almost every house between First and Second avenue, in the vicinity of Twenty-second and Twenty-fifth streets, was filled by assassins, and from all the windows and house-top shots, daggers, and brickbats were thrown with great rapidity. Fifteen members of the Fifth Company, Seventh Regiment, were severely killed by missiles from the mob.

The military force were compelled to withdraw until reinforced. At about nine o'clock Captain Putnam of the United States Army, aided by Lieutenant Hall and Sergeant Grennon, with a force of Regulars of about 70 men, repaired to the scene. They drove the mob from their hiding-places, took the body of the Sergeant away, and soon after the work of destruction was interfered by Thirty-first Street and Second Avenue.

After the fight was over, the Sergeants had gained the windows and housetops of nearly all the buildings in the vicinity. Each one they had pointed out to the neighborhood. Muskets and pistols were fired by the mob upon the military with such a shower of balls that many were injured, and two quiet and unoffending citizens are known to have been killed by the bullets of the mob. Fearing, in charge of the military, when all hope of stopping the progress of the rioters had ceased, they ordered all the men to sweep the streets, and the work of clearing the streets was quickly effected. The order was promptly obeyed, and all vistas of violence and disorder during the riots were shut dead. The stones and brickbats then began to disappear from the sidewalks.

The order was given to turn their fire upon the building. A shell was thrown, and the returning mob brought shots from guns and pistols discharged from all parts of the house. Ammunition, in all kinds of calibers, was found in many soldiers were seriously injured thereby. An order was then given to fire the house, and it was quickly in flames, and the mob fought against the military for half an hour with a fierceness unparalleled in the history of riots. At the end of that time the mob were overpowered and dispersed. Fourteen dead bodies were taken possession of, at least half as many more were killed while resisting the police.

Officers Putnam, Chase, and Grennan acted with the greatest coolness and decision throughout the whole affair, and to them, and the brave soldiers under them, the credit is due of suppressing one of the most ferocious and desperate mobs which have prevailed through our city for the last four days.

The rioters at twelve o'clock last night were in a quiet state. The wounded were conveyed to Police Headquarters, and the dead and wounded were taken to their homes by the other rioters.

The triumph of the authorities over the lawless mob in Second Avenue last night was most decisive and complete.

HUBBARD BRO'S
IMPORTERS of WATCHES
NEW YORK

Are offering the cheapest, most accurate, durable, and saleable Watches in the American market! The article especially deserving public attention at this time is their celebrated

Railway Timekeepers,
WITH HEAVY STERLING SILVER CASES,
ESPECIALLY ADAPTED FOR ARMY SALES.

This really meritorious imputation has been receiving the most favorable notices of the Press in all parts of the country. The New York Daily Times, of June 24, '63, says, "We have been shown by the House, Hubbard Bro., who are the importers, a watch called the ARTIZAN, what may most appropriately term the RAILWAY TIMEKEEPER, being a superbly finished STERLING SILVER WATCH, which is warranted to keep the most accurate time in all climates. The beauty of this timekeeper is fully equaled by their cheapness."

The RAILWAY TIMEKEEPER has HEAVY SOLID STERLING SILVER cases, beautiful white enamel dial, handsome gold hands, with superior regulated movement, warranted to run and keep accurate time! Price per case of half dozen, $84. By mail, $1 05 additional for postage; if registered, 20 cents extra. Should retail readily at from $18 to $20 each. Not sold in quantities of less than six. Also

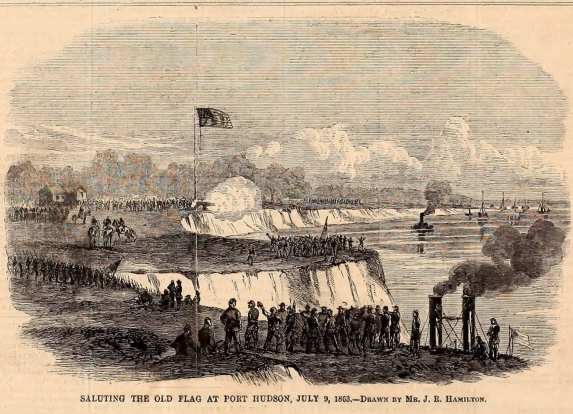
PORT HUDSON.

WE devote pages 497 and 500 this week to illustrations of the FALL OF PORT HUDSON, from sketches by our special artist, J. R. HAMILTON. The following account from the Times will explain the pictures:

At the earliest dawn of the—now ever memorable—9th of July, the whole camp was necessarily in the highest state of glee and commotion, and the "Star-Spangled Banner," "Yankee Doodle," and "DIXIE" came borne upon the morning air—never sounding sweeter.

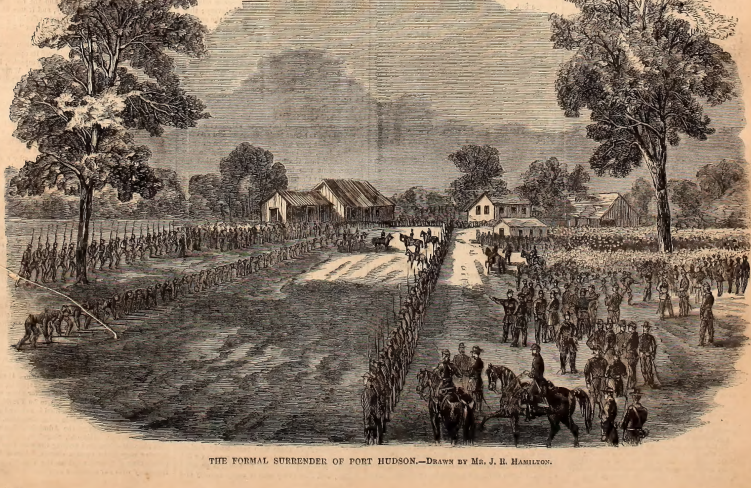
At 7 o'clock General Andrews, Chief of the Staff of General Banks, made his grand entrance into the rebel fortifications, with Colonel Birge leading his brave storming colonns, whose noble services have thus been, happily for their Divinity, dispensed with, but to whom the country is no less indebted—taking the will for the deed. These were followed by two grand regiments from each division, which, "marshalled and finely embodied," right royally made the grand entrance of the royal battery.

The rebels were drawn up in line, and as immediately line they made, their officers in front of them in one side of the road, their backs to the river. Gen. Gardner then advanced toward Gen. Andrews, and, in a few accompanying words, offered to surrender his sword with Port Hudson; that General Andrews told him, in appreciation of his bravery—however misdirected—he was at liberty to retain his sword.



Our men were then drawn up in two lines on the other side of the road, opposite to the rebels, and our officers placed themselves in front of their men. Gen. Gardner then said to Gen. Andrews: "General, I will now formally surrender my command to you, and for the last time I call upon you as my ground arms."

The order was given and the arms were grounded.



After that Gen. Andrews sent for the enemy's general officers, staff and field-officers. The line-officers were left with their companies and guards, composed of the Twenty-second Louisiana and Seventy-fifth New York, placed over them. These formalities over, the glorious old flag of the Union was unfolded to the breeze from one of the highest bluffs facing the river, by the mess of the Richmond—a battery thundered forth its salute, which rolled majestically up and down the broad surface of the Mississippi—and Port Hudson was ours!

It was with no little delight that I found myself rising at last over every portion of the long-fought-for ground, hailing the brave, and with many common mede not only in the ramparts but over the whole internal surface. Not a square rood has been some indisputable proof of the iron deluge that had fallen upon it, in earth plowed up, trees with the bark almost completely torn off by rifle-shot, and consetwine the bulk of a man's body—fairly snapped in two by some solid ball, as easily as a walking-cane.

As to what they called the town of Port Hudson—a miserable little conglomestion of two or three wooden buildings, and a nondescript church among them—the destruction is so complete that I can not see how they escaped being utterly swept away. I went into the old church, looking out for any enemy thither that might fall from shattered roof or tumbling walls, with curtains made by cannon, larger than the windows, and found the whole floor strewed with bones, broken bones and bullets, plaster, etc. If those were all the beams they had left, I don't think the quantity of shot fired exceeded the quality; and beams were what they had left to defend upon.

Their River fortifications were terribly effective, and might have repulsed any amount of attack with their fine imprigable obedience. For down in the bowels of the earth they had dug out deep rooms, approached by steps cut out of the earth, and here their magazines were placed quite out of the reach of the enormous bulgers of shell above—from any projectiles that could be sent against them. One or two of these under guns I found. On the fortifications to the land side every thing told of the terrible effect of our rifled artillery, which spoke in no uncertain tones. Prominent among these were Meyer's, Holcomb's, and Sawyer's batteries, which had been the bane of the existence of the rebels in the city. Lieutenant Terry, of the Richmond, and his fine crew, who sent destruction along with every shot from their large pieces. The effect was this, soon after we began bombarding in earnest, every gun upon the front batteries was silenced; and they have so remained for weeks since, say one they replaced being knocked over as soon as we got the range of it. In speaking of how much we owe the artillery, we can not speak too highly of the unsparing exertions and willing dispositions of General Arnold, under whom the whole of this arm of our service was placed.

Collateral praise must necessarily fall upon those faithful and devoted men who, although unseen by the enemy, have nevertheless the most mighty results depending upon the accuracy and promptness of their every effort—I mean the Topographical Engineers, under Major Houston. Foremost among these was Lieut. Gibbs, U. S. Engineers, Mr. Robins, and the lamented M. Luce, who was killed a short time ago while at the act of taking an observation. The enormous amount of personal hardships and dangers these gentlemen have to undergo, after going for and the safe and orderly exiting expeditions of their own in the enemy's country—the coolness and presence of mind which their services require of them in every emergency—are things of which but few people probably think, but which nevertheless, have the most momentous bearing upon the success or failure of the Scientific Scientific attack. They are the real scouts and pioneers who have first detected many a mine, and found out the same, and who first gave warning to the men who are slowly overnight—every new post in position.

As we rode along the earthworks daily, it was curious to mark the impressions ways in which the enemy had buried both in their themselves from what fire and the shell and enable ways of the sun. While at their work they must have heard, by many a many rubble pattering, the fall of their warms. The breast-works, instead of being straight at the top, present a continuous succession of little hills and valleys, from the perpetual plowing up of our artillery. At to the guns, these were mere sand-bags, kocked down away from their carriages, and looking as if some earthquake had thrown up the earth from below them. The amusement of mortality and casualties from all this terrible and continuous bombardment fell amazingly short of what I should have imagined. The rebels revert that it did not exceed 700.

THE OPENING OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

HAIL mighty river,
Free from thy sources to the sea forever,
From thy mountain springs to the Southern Sea,
Free heritage of the millions free.
The power that with polluted hand
Grasped at thy glorious flood,
Swept from the land by fire and brand,
Lies wasting in its blood.
They entered now in force; the white tents gleam
No more, of those who bound them, by thy stream;
Thy chains are broke, each pay thy bluff-bound shore
The traitor cannon frown no more.

Hail giant river,
A continent's bond that none may sever;
The height, blue mountains of the setting sun
Send down a purer stream;
The golden shells that turn through their granite run
Shine with a brighter gleam;
And the morning's fair expanse that waves
Above an ancient people's graves
Now shining by thy shores,
A greater fragrance pours
From its rich shades; and the bright star-flowers
Look from the fields of heaven with softer glow
At their twin sisters, through night's holy hours,
Enshrined with love in crystal heart below.

Up through the beds of coal,
The treasured strength of centuries waiting still
To do a people's will,
And roll hill's burden from man's weary heart,
And illumine with light the light of art,
Up through the beds where lies the slumbering soul
Of fire, the valor rare with swifter feet
To toss themselves in then,
And swell thy brimming bounty, pure and sweet,
Unto the sea free flow.

The upper lakes—
Basins, and its thousand sisters bright,
That lie among the forest hill tops flaked
Of cool and crystal light,
Feel the new life that hails them from their sires,
And the wild birds that swim
Along their tidal rim,
Rise like a people's shout, free, ever free.

The prairies green,
Whose changing surface billows bear the sheen
Of the ocean on their waving crests,
And in wild, free haste in their silent breasts,
Lie down to gather in new force
Their fest in thy silver flood;
As their brave hearts they have rworn thy wave
Should bear not the lust of blood;
And thy upper current leaves no stain,
And the dewy grass and the ripened grain
Are reaped in peace by the settler free,
For the prairies have kept their vow to thee

The forest trees look do n
Into thy depths; that it lie monarch crown
Holds over thy calm brow, to crown thee, river,
King of long lines of forest kings forever.
Their roots are by thy throne,
Their hands are in the sky,
And every human form shows them blown
Lifts up an anthem high
Of praise and thanks to be by nature free,
King of the forests old and free.

Hail mighty river,
Whose upper banks are white with bread,
Whose lower red with wine—
Bread for a hungry world; life-wine forever
For coming high, heroic spirits shed
By those who live among the holy dead.
Hail that thy triple portals wide are thrown;
Hail that thy length is all our own, our own;
Hail for the hungry millions over there in chains,
Of other lands than ours whose blessings come

With thy free current. Hail for millions more,
Whose winged hope
Above the dirges
Of the western, golden mountains soar
And fill the plains
With song and music.
And sit by their cottage door
With gladdened eyes
As either rise
Whose low Missouri's fountains roar.

Hail central river,
The circuit of a continent whose heart
Stirs with a human throb, whose noble part
Is to reach out its extending hands thereto,
And give the earth with blessings rich and free;
Blood-quenched river, Hail! All Hail to thee!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 8, 1863.

THE EFFECT OF THE LATE RIOTS.

AN evening journal, which has done its best to foster the mean prejudice against negro labor, devoted one day last week one column of its sheet to a detailed and accurate account of the surpassed heroism of the Fifty-Fourth Massachusetts (colored) regiment in the attack on Fort Wagner in the city of Charleston, and no other column to a report of a meeting or mangy Jerseymen in a blind village in New Jersey, where resolutions were passed denouncing vengeance upon any employer who dared to hire negro laborers.

The conjunction was eminently happy. From a part of the district war is being waged in reports of the white soldiers upon the performance of the negroes are uniformly favorable to the colored men. At Milliken's Bend they saved the day, rescued the few white troops who were engaged with them, and—a very rare thing in real warfare—actually crossed bayonets with the rebels and repulsed them.

At Helena, they bore the brunt of the fighting, and defeated a superior force of the enemy. At Port Hudson, they led the forlorn hope in General Banks's unsuccessful attack upon the place, and left half of their number on the field. At Charleston, the colored regiment from Massachusetts, led by the heroic Colonel SHAW, was placed in the front, and sacrificed itself to make a way for the white troops. Wherever they have been the negroes have had a chance they have given evidence of the most exalted gallantry. Even the correspondents of the white regiments are free to admit themselves to have been against the employment of negro troops, are forced to admit that they never saw more fighting done than was done by the colored regiments at Charleston, Milliken's Bend, and Port Hudson. They died for the laws and Stripes by whole companies and regiments.

It was while they were thus dying that a band of men in Northern cities undertook a sort of St. Bartholomew massacre of their laborers here. We will not repeat the sickening tale: how hundreds of wretched negroes, guilty of no offense but that they were born with white skins, were hunted from their homes, beaten, mutilated, and in several cases savagely murdered; how their houses were sacked, their wives and children driven for refuge to the station-houses; how throngs of unfortunate negroes were chased by white men in the suburbs of the city, and sick women and little children left to spend day after day, and night after night, without food or shelter, cowering in terror in the thickets lest the fiendish mob should discover their hiding-place; how poor old women, who had by a life of hard work accumulated a little trifle of furniture and money for their declining old age, were in an hour robbed of every thing by able-bodied men—but we forbear.

These deeds were done in and around the chief city of the North, with the tacit approval of leading politicians and their newspaper organs, by gangs of men who systematically did the work of pillage and murder by insisting on the furling of every American flag.

The grievance of these negroes was the fear that negroes would supersede white men as laborers—a pretext suggested by many Copperhead newspapers, seemingly in the interest of the Southern rebels. The fact is, every person can readily inform himself by inquiry, that the demand for labor throughout the North never was as active as now; that there is a deficiency among higher wages and can save more money than they ever did or could; that many railway enterprises can not, and will not, be pressed high rate of wages, obtain laborers; that immigrants, freshly landed from Ireland or Germany, are in many instances met at the Castle Garden by contractors, who want men to work at a rate of pay which, three years ago, would have been deemed extravagant. The single fact upon this state of things, when raw labor commanded as much money as mechanical skill was happy to enjoy three years ago, that the white men of this meridian undertook to massacre the negroes lest they should compete with them for employment, and denounced employers who hired them at any rate of wages at all. It was at the very hour when negroes were pouring out their blood like water for the Stars and Stripes on the slopes of Fort Wagner that naturalized citizens, who had handed down the Stars and Stripes wherever they saw them, tried to exterminate the negro race in New York.

Such contrasts are rare. There have been times in our history when bigoted prejudice has had sway. One of the medical principles of the massive people who settled New England was that no Irishmen should have part or lot there. When—then a colony—urged as its foremost grievance against England that the King had employed "Irish," or as they were generally called, "wild Irish," to perform military duty among them. Even in our time we have seen a political party organized on the exclusive basis of hostility to the Irish. But these stupid outbursts of prejudice were not forced into relief by simultaneous acts of devotion on the part of the outcasts of the race, either in our civil, social or our national history, have the Irish, as a race, won so clear a title to the gratitude of the people of the United States as the negroes have won within the past three months? Anti-Irish prejudices have died out, through their own inherent weakness; the anti-negro prejudice should have been strengthened a blow, in the minds of all good citizens, when the colored soldiers of Banks and Gilmore died at Port Hudson and Fort Wagner.

Have any of the leaders of the anti-negro riot reflected for an instant upon the effect which it will have? If not, they should, we can tell them.

Quite a number of large corporations and mercantile firms are determined—not from idle notions of negro-equality, but from considerations—to secure hereafter labor which shall not be liable to interruption from Irish prejudices. The longshore business is going to pass into the hands of negroes. Factories and factories, whose business was interrupted by the striking of workmen who turned rioters, are going to employ, make such changes as will effectually preclude such accidents hereafter. Employers who heretofore have preferred Irishmen as laborers are now going to take into consideration the riotous propensities of the former, and for the sake of their business or—to which many will attach less and possible merit—at all events to dilute their operative force with enough colored men to secure themselves against the chance of another Irish riot. Individuals who never dreamed of employing negroes are being led by considerations of humanity and manhood to extend a helping hand to the oppressed race. And the smouldering embers of the Know-Nothing party are going again to be fanned into flame.

All this would be very unjust and unfair; but people who burn orphan asylums and murder inoffensive negroes because of their color must expect a sharp and extreme punishment.

THE LOUNGER.

THE RESPONSIBILITY.

Now that we can calmly contemplate the late riots, the question of responsibility can not and ought not to be evaded. Were those, then, responsible for the crimes of that July week who have insisted that the Government could not be maintained even at the sacrifice of slavery; that all good citizens ought to support the authorities; that a Government which had a right to exist at all must have the right of calling its citizens to maintain it, and that every man must consent to some temporary deprivations of privilege, and even of right, to secure the common safety? Or are they responsible who have persistently declared that the war was a war to free "niggers," that they might come to the North and be the rivals of white laborers; that the Government cared nothing for the Union, but only for the "niggers;" that it was corrupt, corrupt, and designing; that the Constitution had been abolished by it; that the only remedy for all these evils was to defeat it; that war could never settle the quarrel; and that if the ——d Abolitionists had only let "niggers" alone there never would have been any trouble?

Which of these teachings is responsible for the burning of the Colored Orphan Asylum? For the hunting, beating, and savage murder of colored people? Do those who are responsible for atrocious and depraved who come to light in every lawless tumult? Is it those who have uniformly taught disbelief in the duty of obedience to authority, or is it those who have always claimed that the color of a man's skin was no excuse for outraging him, who are responsible for the cruel massacre in the blacks? Mr. Thurlow Weed says, and says truly, in his letter to Mr. Raymond: "Journalists who persistently inflame and exasperate the ignorant and lawless against the negro are morally responsible for their violence."

Who, then, are these journalists? Which class of them inflame and exasperate the lawless and ignorant against the colored race? Those who persistently declare that "niggers" are made for slaves; that they are naturally inferior to white men; that to say they have rights is to try to elevate them into the sphere of white men, for which they are not fitted; that it is an insult to white men to talk of freeing "niggers;" and that the National Administration wants to sacrifice white men to "niggers!" or those who persistently declare that the color of a man's skin is no reason for incurring him any disability, that he has precisely our rights; and that every man of every country and of every race is equally entitled to fair play? Will Mr. Weed answer which of these classes of journalists inflame and exasperate the lawless and ignorant against colored men and women?

Or would he say that the depositary articles would not be written except for those of the other papers? Perhaps so. But as there would have been no rebellion if Mr. Lincoln had not been elected President. Does Mr. Weed, therefore, reprehend his election? If the municipal legislature of the city of Albany were prostituted to the interest of rum-selling; if the rum-sellers declared that they despised all laws that did not protect rum, and the people of Albany should pass a license law, to which the rumsellers rose in armed opposition, flooding the city with blood, would Mr. Weed hold the temperance men responsible for the riot? Granting that they had expected a riot, and would have been wrought by drunkenness; granting that, impressed by the magnitude and threatening aspect of the public danger, certain men of standing and weight had devoted themselves to instructing and arousing the public, pointing out the nature and scope of the peril, and willingly enduring to be called troublesome if they could but save the city, would Mr. Weed denounce them as more responsible for the violence of the rum-sellers? Does he mean to say that the enemies of rum and the friends of order are to let the grog-shops be opened as they please, lest, if they are opposed, they will make trouble? If Mr. Weed has not forgotten that this was exactly the argument of the democratic papers in the last general election. If you persist in electing Mr. Lincoln, they said, the rebellion will succeed, his blood will flow, and you will be responsible for it. Did that argument deter Mr. Weed from voting for Mr. Lincoln? Or did he really believe he would be not despise himself? And are those who stood for Mr. Lincoln in any other way responsible for the war than a man who fights a burglar to defend his finds in his house is responsible for the disturbance?

Mr. Weed's bitter animosity against certain anti-slavery men has confused his mind. When he depicts the "philanthropic sentiment in favor of negroes as fresh fuel for his eloquence, he is guilty of a slander which no honest reader of his letter will heartily condemn. But if he really believes that Mr. Horatio Seymour and Mr. Fernando Wood are truer friends of the people than Mr. Phillips or Mr. Greeley, he is no longer a morally responsible person. For conceding what he calls the "fanaticism" of each book, the unprejudiced mind will unanimously assent to justice more pernicious to the commonwealth than persistent craft to establish injustice and perpetuate slavery? Mr. Weed's letter is worthy of his talents, in its generous gift and warm sympathy for the unfortunate. But it is utterly unworthy of his fame in its extenuation of the most wanton crime by the indiscretion of honest men.

THE GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK.

EVERY loyal citizen in the country is profoundly interested in the conduct of Governor Seymour of New York in a crisis so important as this. During the late riot, which was a bloody, reckless, and savage defiance of all law by the worst part of the population of this city, it was remarked that his tone was obsequious and servile; that he deprecated violence and condemning; and that he left a mob which was outraging property, destroying the public peace, and murdering people to its fiendish and unfortunate, that he had asked the Government to suspend the operation of the law. When this suggestion secretly did not avail, and the riot grew more extensive and sanguinary, and it was clear that he was dealing with desperate criminals, the Governor was still "afraid to assert his rights" to the cause." Indeed, if he had wished to encourage the mob, feel by saying it a pretext, and then by asserting it that, although he deprecated its operations irregular, he still regarded it with sympathy, his conduct would not have been different. What is the explanation of this apparent virtual complicity of the chief magistrate of New York with a fearful riot?

Mr. Seymour wishes to be the next President of the United States. He represents the vote of New York, which is his State. But as the bulk of his State vote lies in New York city, and as he knew that every other or Western State Governor who voted at all would vote for him, were he a candidate, he did not like to peril his chances by a rigorous opposition to the riot. Nor was this surprising. Mr. Seymour has never hesitated to pander to the passions and prejudices of the most ignorant class of the population. Every one was satisfy himself of this by reading his speeches. He has been shown, and upon certain occasions he politically fraternize with the mob, upon the same principle that the King of Naples prepolitized the Lazzaroni. But Mr. Seymour, the head, and politicians of their school, deeped for political success. Hence the Governor's attitude and language as he has no right whatever to call rioters his friends. Hence, also, he represents himself as the defender of constitutional law by tramp of the National Government, and implores them to disperse, telling them that they may assemble whenever they please, and insinuating that if the draft were not suspended their action would be justified. The Senate of New York was loudly and justly cheered by the men who were madly defying the laws.

Mr. Seymour's position toward the riot was precisely that he holds toward the war. That is, it must not be coerced. Coercion might exasperate, and then what chance would there be for those who counseled coercion? He wishes to be President. But he knows that if the rebellion is subdued and the Union maintained by this Administration, the friends and principles of the Administration will remain in power. His cue, therefore, is to paralyze the authorities and prolong the war, that the country may insist upon a change. Hence if a Democratic riot breaks out at home, it naturally simultaneously with our successes over the rebellion, it disheartens the loyal, and delights the rebels and their friends. The riot checks the suppression of the rebellion, and must therefore not be itself sternly suppressed, but entreated and toyed with. "Don't shoot the citizens," says the Chief Magistrate. "Don't use guns, use clubs, they are softer than bullets," says the Chief Magistrate's newspaper. This riot is a "popular uprising," a "movement of the people," say the Governor and his newspaper. This riot is "good," it is "most excellent," echo the rebel journals in Richmond.

Obviously Mr. Seymour's rôle has two difficulties: the first is, to direct the "popular uprising" that it shall have the dignity of a real revolution, and not become an orgy of pillage and massacre, having no relation whatever to the draft; the second is, when the State is formally arrayed against the Union, to persuade the citizens of New York that they ought to take part with their State against their country. The citizens of this State who compose the State militia are now the citizens of the United States. If an armed conflict of allegiance should arise, how would they fight? That is a question for the chief magistrate and for every citizen to ponder, and its solution will depend upon the quality of the loyal sentiment of the State. If New York holds to secession, it would, in such a conflict, side with Mr. Seymour and Mr. Wood. If it believe in the national Union it would not side with those gentlemen.

"THE GREAT CAPTAIN."

THE rebel papers, when swelling with success, have been very fond of applying this name to Lee, or Stonewall Jackson, or some other of their military commanders. And it has not been unfashionable, even among loyal men, to regret that the military ability seated in so much evil should be wasted.

But certainly General Lee is rather a small specimen of the great captain. He has fought two battles at Fredericksburg, where he was in the one superbly intrenched, and in the other he fought with an army whose leader had lost his self-command. In these two battles he was the victor. Twice, also, he has marched with a great flourish of European éclat, and, God-protected, captured across the Potomac—and twice, not to put too fine a point upon it, he has been kicked back again. While General Jackson lived, Lee, indeed, seemed to be a "great captain." Lee was the superior in rank, but it was Stonewall Jackson who came rushing down the Shenandoah. It was Stonewall Jackson who came hurrying in upon the Peninsula. It was Stonewall Jackson who fought Pope. And it was again Stonewall Jackson who flanked Hooker. Since Stonewall Jackson died, the history of the "great captain" Lee begins and ends at Gettysburg.

Jackson's exploits were those of an active, impetuous partisan leader. He moved his division rapidly. He appeared at unexpected points at unlooked-for times, and his appearance was always effective. But there is nothing in Jackson's career, no vast operations, no large command, no comprehensive movement, which can justify the epithet of "a great captain." These qualities must be sought, and will be found among the generals of the Union.

The operations before Vicksburg, with the final movement of a flying column from one base to another through the enemy's country, the investment and capture of the city, indicate a military grasp and penetration and agility in handling men of which there has not been a trace in the career of any rebel soldier. The Louisiana campaign of General Banks, ending in the siege and capture of Port Hudson, is a chapter of unchecked brilliancy, in strategy and useful art. The Tennessee campaigns of the "great captain" Lee have been ludicrous and futile. The turning the tide of battle at Murfreesboro, and the rushing preparation which won a victory without a struggle in the summer campaign of Rosecrans in Southern Tennessee, is unparalleled in the whole military history of the rebellion. Against these prodigious and vital movements the rashes of Jackson, rapid and telling as they were, are but little episodes, and the pompous performances of Lee and Beauregard are merely amusing. The illiberality of Mississippi and of Tennessee, and the victor of Lee and his horse, are thus far the "great captains" of this war.

A TRANSPARENT MASK.

IT is always useless and uncomfortable to wear a mask after you are discovered; and it is therefore a spectacle appealing to the liveliest sympathies of the humane, that of the persistent with which the Copperhead journals and orators affect concern for the safety of the Union and Government.

If it were not perfectly well known that they justified secession when it inaugurated rebellion, and when they thought the country would be obliged to submit—if it were not equally known that they hate the political party in power much more than they hate the rebellion—if they did not quite as frankly declare that the Government has violated the Constitution as flagrantly as the rebels—if they did not so plainly show that they prefer disunion rather than a restoration of the Union with emancipation—if they were not so constantly overwhelmed with admiration of the rebels' gallantry, and the dignity of the "Confederate" Government, and the valor of the "Confederate" army —if they ever had any words but bitter and scornful censure for our own Government, or ever sought to inspire the public mind with patriotic hope and energy and faith—if they betrayed the least love of the great doctrine of human liberty, which is the cornerstone of the American Government, or valued any clause of the Constitution but those which painfully and obscurely recognize the fact of slavery—if they did not so magnify our reverses and belittle our triumphs—it might be useful for their purpose still to wear the mask of loyalty.

But when they ruffle their plumes with so fine a show of moral indignation, and demand to know whether American citizens are to be told by their fellows that they are not loyal without resenting it, the only difficulty with the showy performance is that every honest man in the land knows it to be a part of the game. It is the way in which they serve the rebellion. They affect a feverish solicitude for the Constitution, in order that the Constitution may be more surely overthrown. They claim to be Union men, distinctively, that they may resist all specific measures for its salvation. They declaim against military necessity, in order that a wily and unscrupulous foe may have every advantage. They defame the Government, that it may not seem to be worth fighting for. They denounce it as a despotism, that there may be loss, blood, and war in the free States. They assume a high regard for personal liberty and rights, in order that the cardinal liberty and rights of the unfortunate may be annihilated. They call themselves friends of the United States Government, and every thing they say or do is hailed with joy by its enemies. They claim to be supporters of order and law, and employ riots and riots under their auspices. They will wear the mask still, however transparent, because none are always deceived. But if Jeff Davis should find triumphant entrance to Government to-morrow, they would kneel before him, throwing down the mask no longer needed, and humbly praying for the reward they have fairly earned from him and from every other enemy of their country.

FOREIGN WAR.

WHETHER the wolf of foreign intervention is really coming at last, after the incessant alarms of the last two years, is quite as doubtful as ever. It is not indeed, the usual custom of nations to wait until an adversary has fully proved his strength before attacking him. Moreover, the only pretense that could be urged for recognizing the revolted part of a friendly country as an independent power is removed by the success of the Government. Unless, therefore, we suppose that England and France are confident that we mean to seize the moment of domestic entanglement to declare war upon them, and that they therefore wish to begin war against us before we are fully released from our difficulties, we have no reason to suppose that we are in danger of a foreign war.

But France in condition to enter upon the conquest of this continent? Does her situation in Europe justify a great American war? Or is England likely to join her in an Anti-American alliance? Again, does England wish a great war? Is not her present resolution to spend no more money, and did not the Crimean war so increase the weight of her taxes as to render war with us a dangerous experiment? Do not England and France know perfectly well that, in case of universal war, Russia is our ally, and that a vast popular revolution would immediately develop itself throughout Europe?

If we will destroy ourselves, John Bull will enjoy the spectacle he has long wished. But even to gratify his insolent and sullen selfishness he will hardly dare to attack us just as we have made ourselves a military nation.

VARIETY.

(LINES BY A YOUNG LADY.)

When I regard that plumage gay,
By Nature's bounty all conferred,
I often feel disposed to say,
Would I were clothed as yonder bird!

But oh, that moulting! To appear
In dishabille until 'twas over,
To get a dress but once a year,
And wear one fashion forever!

When I consider all those things,
I check the wish that seems absurd,
And sigh no more for golden wings—
I'd not be clothed like yonder bird.

MOTTOES.—A vain man's motto is, "Win gold and wear it"—a prosperous man's, "Win gold and share it"—a miser's, "Win gold and spare it"—a profligate's, "Win gold and flare it"—a fool's, "Win gold and lend it"—a forger's, "Win gold and cut it"—a gambler's, "Win gold and loo it"—a thief's, "Win gold and use it."

"No, sir, doctor," says the other, "you quite mistake; it is your living I wanted."

THE CLIMAX.—A clergyman in Wisconsin, one Sunday, read in his hearers that he should divide his discourse into three parts—the first should be terrible, the second horrible, the third the terrible horrible. Assuming a dramatic tragic attitude, he exclaimed in a startling of warning tone:

"What's that I see there?" Still louder, "What's that I see there?" Here a little old woman in black cried out, with thrill treble tone:

"It's nothing but my little black dog; he won't bite nobody."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

NOTHING quite positive is known of the position of the two great armies of the Potomac. It is understood, however, that while we hold the upper pieces of the monopoly, Lee's and Longstreet's corps have escaped through Chester and Thoroughfare Gap into Eastern Virginia. Our forces are said to be in pursuit, and skirmishing goes on daily. A report is current that Lee is at or near Culpeper.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF CHARLESTON.

WE give an account elsewhere of the unsuccessful attack of General Gilmore on Fort Wagner on 18th. It would appear that the bombardment was steadily maintained from that time to the 25th. The rebels say that on 25th "The fire from the batteries of Fort Wagner was still progressing, and was answered by Fort Wagner and Fort Gregg." The National forces are said to have two batteries on Morris Island, and to have strengthened their position." On the 26th the firing was heard by a passing vessel. It was heavy and continuous.

ON THE LEFT FRONT FROM GRANT.

JOE Johnston evacuated Jackson on the night of the 16th, and marched out with his army, and retreating east. General Sherman, however, entered the city on the morning of the 17th, and found it deserted, but in ashes, water, and general disorganization. On 23d General Sherman was at Brandon, and General Sherman's cavalry was scouring the country across the Big Black. General McPherson's corps on the Vicksburg for the South on 23d. It was said for Richmond.

CAPTURE OF MORGAN.

MORGAN is captured his last—himself and the whole of his command. On the morning of 26th ult. Major Way, with 950 of the Michigan Cavalry, overtook Morgan at New Lisbon, Columbiana County, Ohio, and routed him, capturing 746 prisoners, Morgan himself, however, escaping with 360 men. Morgan was subsequently captured by General Shackelford near New Lisbon, and taken to Columbus, Ohio, where he was confined in Colonel Streight and his officers who are in close confinement in Secession in the charge of having armed negroes.

MOVEMENTS OF ROSECRANS.

IN the Richmond Enquirer of 26th ult. is a dispatch from Bristol, Tennessee, which reports that Gen. Field was General Rosecrans is organizing an expedition against the Virginia and East Tennessee Railroad at Bridgeport, Alabama.

Rosecrans himself has been in Nashville, reviewing troops and inspecting hospitals.

AN EXPEDITION TO NATCHEZ.

General Rosecrans's expedition to Natchez was of much importance, and attended with the most gratifying results. Starting in the Mississippi with a fleet of ten vessels, a considerable number of prisoners, and a number of cannon, and with ammunition, provisions, &c. for Kirby Smith.

FOSTER'S NORTH CAROLINA RAID.

GENERAL Foster's official report of the results of the expedition into North Carolina has been published as the War Department. In addition to the railroad bridge at Goldsboro', which is 1,400 feet long, and the trestle bridge which it will take weeks to replace, and the rolls, bolt and spike factory already mentioned, our forces destroyed an engine and a train of cars, twenty-five wagons loaded with clothing, ammunition, and other warlike stores; and at Tarboro, two steamboats and one iron-clad in process of construction, besides a saw-mill, a train of cars, and large quantities of substances and estimated that the value of the property destroyed was appraised, and some three hundred horses and mules and three hundred prisoners. And all this with a loss of but killed, wounded, and missing, of only about twenty-five men, though one officer and seventeen men were captured.

ANOTHER REBEL INVASION.

THERE is another invasion reported from Kentucky. A severe skirmish took place at Richmond on 28th, in which a small National force was compelled to fall back to the Kentucky River, and the report is current that the rebel force regards the advance-guard of Bragg's army, which is advancing on Lexington.

OPENING OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

THE 1st. Louis Democrat of Tuesday says:

The steamer Continental, Captain Patrick Yore—the first boat at this port for New Orleans since the passage of the Mississippi River—is advertised to leave for below immediately. The Continental received orders to load for New Orleans with Government freight yesterday afternoon. No one was allowed on to the steamers who were not in possession of passes. The event marks an important era, and is hoped will speedily be followed by the departure of other steamers, and a general resumption of business between this port and the Crescent City.

FIGHT AT ELK CREEK.

ON the 14th a severe fight occurred at Elk Creek, fifty miles south of Fort Gibson, between the National forces under General Blunt, numbering 3,000 men, with twelve pieces of artillery, and the rebels under General Cooper, numbering 6,000, mostly Indians, supported four of the rebels. General Blunt marched fifty miles in twenty-four hours, and attacked Cooper immediately. Two rebel guns were dismounted and captured, and the enemy briefly fled, pursued by our forces.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

OFFICIAL statements show that the total public debt of the United States on the 1st July was $1,097,690,644, less by over $76,000,000 than anticipated by the Secretary of the Treasury last December.

THE SIEGE OF VICKSBURG.—HUTS ON THE HILL-SIDE.

VICKSBURG.

WE publish in this number two remaining pictures from Vicksburg, from sketches by our special artist, Mr. Theodore R. Davis. One of them represents the man

WHO WAS BLOWED "FREE" MILE IN DE AIR.

Mr. Davis writes:

"HEAD-QUARTERS MAJOR-GENERAL M'PHERSON,
July 1, 1863.

"This negro, the only person who escaped with his life at the time the mine under Fort Hill exploded, was at work with a number of the rebel soldiery sinking a shaft for the purpose of discovering any gallery that might have been run by our miners beneath their works.

"The negro was blown a distance of nearly three hundred yards, and was, when picked up, in a most disturbed state of mind:

"'De Lord, massa'—quoth he—'I tink neber should light—yah, yah! went up 'bout free mile. As a white man when I start where wese going, and de next I know'd he was just nowhere but all ever.'

"While sketching Abraham the officers gathered around, and the numerous queries put to him were rather wittily responded to.

"Finishing the sketch, he scrutinized it for a moment, then broke into a 'Yah, yah! de Lord, dis chile shore—Massa give me a quarter!'

"One of General M'Pherson's staff, Colonel Coolbaugh, bestowed a silver half upon the delighted African, who made tracks for the negro quarters near in a style showing that he was but little the worse for his aerial voyage."

The other picture shows us the traits which our troops erected in the sides of the hills to shelter them from the fierce June sun—a very striking picture. Mr. Davis writes:

"THE CANE HUTS IN THE HILL-SIDE.

"Without tents, our men are reduced to all sorts of expedients for shelter, camped, too, within musket-shot of the enemy. In every hill-side near our works may be seen such scenes as are shown in the sketch that I send. Shelter and bed are made of the cane that grows so abundantly every where in this region. It furnishes excellent shelter and a comfortable bed, as I, who have slept many nights on one, can testify."

OPENING OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

WE reproduce on this page a sketch, by Mr. J. R. Hamilton, of this interesting event, which may strictly be termed historical. The New Orleans correspondent of the New York Times gives the following description of it:

"The whole town was thrown into a state of pleasing excitement on Thursday last, just after the Creole sailed, by the sudden appearance at the levee of the large steamboat Imperial, just in from St. Louis. She came down freighted with some 600 head of cattle, part of a large haul that was made at Natchez a short time ago. She had a pleasant, unmolested trip all the way down, and reported the river perfectly quiet between this and St. Louis."

THE OPENING OF THE MISSISSIPPI—ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMER "IMPERIAL" AT NEW ORLEANS FROM ST. LOUIS, JULY 16, 1863.—[FROM A SKETCH BY MR. J. R. HAMILTON.]

"The Imperial is an immense, showy vessel, one of the first-class river steamers, which completely dwarfs the Laurel Hill, Empire Parish, and others that we have been long accustomed to look upon as leviathans. But it was not her size nor fine equipments which impressed the eager multitudes who thronged to see her; it was the fact that she was the first freight boat which had ventured down the Mississippi since the fall of Vicksburg and Port Hudson; and there are few who gazed upon her proud form saw in her the embodiment of reawakened commerce with the Mississippi Valley. She staid in New Orleans not long enough to receive the greetings of hundreds, and then went on to Carrollton, near the city, where she unloaded her living freight only.

"The speedy arrival of this vessel here—so immediately following the capture of the rebel stronghold—ranks as significant a story of the downfall of the rebellion as would the destruction of a rebel army. Let Commerce once resume her accustomed channels, and all the eloquence of BELIAL himself will not persuade the people of the South to continue the horrid pastime of cutting their brothers' throats—for what?—merely that JEFF DAVIS and his handful of wily oligarchs shall retain power to control their bands of human cattle, and build up on this Continent a temple of Despotism upon the ruins of human liberty."

VERY HARD CASH.

CHAPTER XXV.

To return to the Bank: Skinner came back from the Dodd that miserable afternoon in a state of genuine agitation and regret. He was human, and therefore mixed; and their desolation had touched him.

The footman told him Mr. Hardie was not at home; gone to London, he believed. Skinner walked away directly. What did this mean? Had he left the country?

He smiled at his fears, and felt positive Mr. Hardie had visited the servants, and was quietly waiting for him in the Bank parlor.

It was now dusk: he went round to that little dark nook of the garden the parlor window looked on, and tapped: there was no reply; the room looked empty. He tried the sash: it yielded: Mr. Hardie had been too occupied with changing another's property to take common precautions in defense of his own; never in his life before had he neglected to fasten the iron shutters with his own hand, and to-day he had left the very window unfastened. This augured ill. "He is off: he has done me along with the rest," thought Skinner. He stepped into the room, found a lucifer box, shut the shutters, lighted a candle, and went peering about among the Bank clerk's papers, to see if he could find a clew to his intentions: and, as he pottered and peered, he quaked as well: a detector by dishonest means feels thief-like; and is what he feels. He made some little discoveries, that guided him in his own conduct; he felt more and more sure his employer would outwit him if he could; and resolved it should be diamond cut diamond.

The church clock struck six.

He started at the hour, crept out, and closed the window softly: then away by the garden gate.

A light was still burning in Alfred's room, and at this Skinner had another touch of compunction: "There is one won't sleep this night, along of our work," thought he.

At three next afternoon Mr. Hardie reappeared.

He had gone up to town to change the form of the deposit:—He took care to think of it as a deposit still—form of deposit being more complete, the withdrawal incomplete, and by no fault of his, for he had offered it back; but Fate and Accident had disposed.—He had converted the notes into gold direct, and the bills into gold through notes; this was like going into the river to hide his head. Next process: he would get gold into £500 notes; and came flying home with them.

His return was greeted by Skinner with a sigh of relief. Hardie heard it, interpreted it aright, and sent for him into the parlor: and there told him, with a little affectation of frankness, what he had done: then asked significantly if there was any news at Albion Villa.

Skinner, in reply, told Mr. Hardie of the distress he had witnessed up at Albion Villa: "And, Sir," said he, lowering his voice, "Mr. Alfred helped carry the body up stairs.—In a nice mess altogether, Sir, when you come to think!"

"Ah! all the better," was the cool reply, "he will be useful to let us know what we want; he will tell Dodd and Jane me. You don't think he will live, do you?"

"Live! no: and then who will know the money is lost?"

"Who should know? Did not he say he had just landed, and been shipwrecked? Shipwrecked mute do not bring fourteen thousand pounds ashore." The speaker's eyes sparkled; Skinner watched him demurely. "Skinner," said he, solemnly, "I believe my daughter Jane is right; and that Providence really interferes sometimes in the affairs of this world; you know how I have struggled, to save my family from disgrace and poverty: those struggles have failed in a great degree: but Heaven has seen them, and saved this money from the sea, and dropped it into my very hands to retrieve my fortunes with. "I must be grateful: spend a portion of it in charity; and rear a ugly misgiving had flitted through his mind.

And his crest-fallen countenance showed some ugly misgiving had flashed on him quite suddenly.

"What, Sir? what?" asked Skinner, eagerly. "The receipt?"

CHAPTER XXVI.

"The receipt? Oh, is that all? you have got that," said Skinner, very coolly.

"What makes you think so?" inquired the other, keenly. He instantly suspected Skinner of having it.

"Why, Sir, I saw it in his hand."

"Then is has got to Albion Villa; and we are ruined."

"No, no, Sir; you won't hear me: I am sure I saw it fall out of his hand when he was taken ill: and, I think, but I won't be sure, he fell on it. Any way, I have not seen it since in his hands when I delivered him at Albion Villa; so it must be here: I dare say you have thrown it into a drawer or somewhere, promiscuously."

"No, no, Skinner," said Mr. Hardie, with increasing alarm: "it is useless for us to deceive ourselves: I was not more mistaken in the room, and thought of nothing but getting to town and cashing the bills."

He rung the bell sharply, and on Betty coming in asked her what she had done with that paper that was on the floor.

"I took it up and put it on the table, Sir. This was it, I think." And she laid her finger upon a memorandum.

"No, no!" said Mr. Hardie: "the one I mean was much smaller than that."

"Why," said she with that astonishing memory for trifles people have, who never read, "was it a little crumpled up paper? lying by the basket?"

"Yes! yes! that sounds like it."

"Oh, I put that into the basket."

Mr. Hardie's eye fell directly on the basket, but it was empty. She caught his glance, and told him she had emptied it in the dust-hole as usual. Mr. Hardie drew a deep breath of relief. Betty, an old servant of his wife's, resented it with due dignity by tossing her head as she retired.

"There is no help for it," said Mr. Hardie, bitterly; "we must go and grub in the dustbin, now."

"Why, Sir, your name is not on it after all."

"What does that matter? A man is bound by the act of his partner, and I am that very form, and my initials are on it. Come, let us put a good face on the thing." And he led the way to the kitchen: and Betty, with a little laugh, and asked the scullery maid if she could show Mr. Skinner and him the dust-hole. She stared, but obeyed, and the pair followed her, making merry.

The dust-hole was empty.

The girl explained: "It is the dustman's day: he came at eleven o'clock in the morning and carr'd all the dust away: and grumbled at the paper and the bones he found. So I told him beggars mustn't be choosers: just like his impudence! when he gets it for nothing, and sells it for a mint outside the gates. Those unwonted visitors left her in dead silence almost before she had finished her sentence.

Mr. Hardie sat down in his parlor thoroughly discomposed; Skinner watched him fortively.

At last the former broke out: "This is the devil's doing: I'm not a person. No intelligence nor ability can resist such luck. I almost wish we had never parted with it: we shall never feel safe, never be safe."

Skinner made light of the matter—treated the receipt as burned into the sea. "Why, Sir," said he, "by this time it will have found its way to that monstrous heap of ashes on the London road; and who will ever think to look there? or notice it if they find it?" Hardie shook his head: "That monstrous heap is all sold every year to the contractors, Skinner, worth £14,000 to me, will be strewed on the soil for manure; then some farmer's man, or farmer's boy that goes to the contractor's will read it, see Captain Dodd's name, and bring it to Albion Villa in hopes of a sixpence; a sixpence. Heaven help the man who trusts to accidental act, and leaves damatory evidence, on paper, kicking about the world."

From that hour the cash Hardie carried in his bosom, without a right to it, began to blister.

He thought of telling the dustman he had lost a paper, and setting on the monstrous mountain of ashes on the London Road: but here caution stepped in; how could he describe the paper without awakening curiosity, and defeating his own end? He gave that up. It was better to let the sleeping dog lie.

Finally, he thought the security in a world where after all one has to buy every thing; so he employed an adroit agent, and quietly purchased that mountain, by the cart or shaking, ton. But he felt so ill used, he paid for it in his own notes; by this means the treaty reverted to the primitive form of barter:* shaking for rags.

This transaction he concealed from his confederate.

When he had completed it, he was not yet secure; for another day had passed, and Captain Dodd alive still. Men often recover from apoplexy, especially when they survive the first twenty-four hours. Should he live, he would not now come into any friendly arrangement with the man who had so nearly caused his death. So then good-by to the matrimonial combination Hardie had at first relied on to patch his debt to Alfred, and his broken fortunes.

Then as to keeping the money and defying Dodd, that would be very difficult and dangerous; mercantile bills are traceable things: and criminal prosecutions awkward ones. He found himself in a situation he could not see his way through by any mental effort; there were so many objections to every course, and so many to its opposite. "He walked among fires," as the Latins say. But the more he pondered on the course to be taken should Dodd live, the plainer did this dilemma stare him in the face; either he must refund, fly to the country with another man's money, and leave behind him the name of a thief. Parental love, and the remains of self-respect, revolted at this thought; and with these combined a sentiment less genuine, but by no means feeble—the love of reputation. So it was with a relenting and sick heart he went to the shipping-office, and peered at the posters, to see when the next ship sailed for the United States. Still the day.

Intent on his own schemes, and expecting every day to be struck in front, he did not observe that a man in a rusty velveteen coat followed him, and observed this act; and indeed all his visible acts.

Another perplexity was, when he should break. There were objections to doing it immediately; and objections to putting it off.

With all this he was in a ferment: by day he sat waiting and fearing, by night he lay sleepless and thinking; and, though his stoical countenance gave no sign, composure, the furrows deepened in it, and the iron nerves began to twitch at times, from strain of mind and want of sleep, and that rusty velveteen. Not a night that he did not awaken a dozen times from his brief doze with a start, and a dread of exposure by some mysterious, unforeseen, means.

It is remarkable how truths sometimes flash on men at night in hours of nervous excitement: it was in one of these nightly reveries that Dodd's pockets-book flashed back upon Mr. Hardie. He saw it before his eyes quite plain, and on the inside of the leather cover a slip of paper pasted, and written on in pencil or pale ink, he could not tell which.

What was that writing? It might be the numbers of the notes, the description of the bills. Why had he not looked? Was the dying man's pocket? "Fool! fool!" he groaned; "to do any thing by halves."

Another night he got a far severer shock. Lying in his bed dozing, and muttering, as usual, he was suddenly startled out of that uneasy slumber by three tremendous knocks at the street door.

He sprang out of bed, and in his confusion made sure Dodd was dead, justice were come for him: he began to huddle on his clothes with a vague notion of flight.

He had got on his trowsers and slippers, and was looking under his pillow for the fatal cash, when he heard himself called loudly and respectfully by name, and the usual cries came from the garden into which his bedroom looked. He opened it very softly, in trepidation and wonder, which was increased by what met his eyes; for there, right in front of his window, stood an unearthly figure; corresponding in every particular to the figure of a ghost in which we are reared, and which, when our nerves are healthy, we can ridicule as it deserves; but somehow or other, in the moment of our imagination so thoroughly as it is out of our judgment.

The figure was white as a sheet, and seemed supernaturally tall: it called out in a voice like a wounded lion's, "You villain! you Hardie! give me back my money: my fourteen thousand pounds, my children's money, or may your children die before your eyes: give me my darlings' money; or may the eternal curse of God light on you and yours, you scoundrel!"

And the figure kneeled on the grass, and repeated the terrible invocation almost in the same words; that Hardie shrank back, and, resolute as he was, cowered with superstitious awe.

But this impression was in no way to violate fears; the man would alarm the town. And in fact Mr. Hardie, in the midst of his agitation, was dimly conscious of hearing a window open softly, not very far from him. But it was a dark night. He put his head out in great agitation, and whispered hoarsely: "Hush! I'll hear it all: it you down directly."

Internally cursing his hard fate, he got on, went to early, and his cost; hunted for the key of the Bank parlor, and, having found it, went softly down the stairs, unlocked the door, and went to early and his cost.

At this moment his ear caught a murmur; a low buzzing of voices in the garden.

He instantly thought that Captain Dodd was exposing him to some of the townspeople; he was puzzled, angry, and alarm, like a cautious man, as he was, remained passive, but on the watch.

Presently the voices were quiet, and he heard footsteps come very slowly toward the window at which he stood, and then make for the little gate. He crept into the back kitchen, which faced the street, and got to a window there, and listened. His only idea was to catch their intentions, if possible, and regulate them accordingly. He dared not open the window; for above him on the pavement he saw a female figure half standing half kneeling; but soon that figure rushed wildly out of his sight to meet the footsteps, and then he ventured to open the window, and, listening, heard cries of despair and a young heart-broken voice say her father was dead.

"Ah! —that is all right," muttered Hardie.

Still even this profound egotist was not yet so hardened but that he felt one chill of horror at himself for the thought; a passing chill.

He listened and listened; and by-and-by he heard the slow feet recommence their journey, amidst sobs and sighs; and those sorrowful feet, and the sobs and sighs of his causing, got fainter and fainter, retreated, and left him in quiet possession of the fourteen thousand pounds he had brought down to give it up: two minutes ago it was not worth as many pence to him.

He drew a long breath of relief. "I'll raise; I am to keep it is the will of Heaven."

Poor Heaven!

He went to his bed again, and by a resolute effort composed himself, and determined to sleep. And in fact he was just dropping off, when suddenly he started wide awake again: for it recurred to him vividly that a window in his house had opened, while David was cursing him and denouncing his children's money.

Whose window?

Half a dozen people and more slept on that side of the house.

Whose window could it be?

He walked among fires.

CHAPTER XXVII.

A LITTLE crowd of persons stood in front of the old Bank, that many said it would come round, it must come round, in a month or two of it. Hardie's unfortunate clients recognized in the above a mere formula to let them down by degrees: they had even many times paid 19s. in the £ on a dividend of sixpence in the pound.

Before the day closed the scene at the Bank door was heart-rending: respectable persons, reduced to pauperism in their one day, kept arriving and telling their fellow-sufferers their little all was with Hardie, and nothing behind but the work-house or the alms-house: ruined mothers came and held up their ruined children to the Bank clerks to see; and the doors were hammered at, and the house as well as the Bank was beleaguered by a weeping, wailing, despairing crowd.

But, like an idle wave beating on a rock, all this human misery dashed itself in vain against the Bank: heavy walls and shutters, hard to them as his very heart.

The next day they mobbed Alfred and hissed him at the backdoor. Jane was too stunned and too frightened to stir out. Mr. Hardie sat calmly putting the finishing strokes to his fabricated balance-sheet.

Some innocent and excited victims went to the mayor for redress; to the aldermen, the magistrates, in vain.

Toward afternoon the Banker's cool contempt for his benefactors, whose lives he had darkened, received a heavier check: a brick-bat or two was flung at the Bank shutters: this ferocious blow made him start, and the place rattle: it was the signal for a volley; and though the first brick went the windows of the house, and in came the stones starring the mirrors, upsetting the chairs, scoring the papered walls, chipping the mantelpieces, shivering the bell-glasses and statuettes, and strewing the room with dirty pebbles, and small fragments and glittering nuts.

Hardie winced: this was the sort of appeal to touch him. But soon he recovered his sang froid: "Fools!" said he, "I'm much obliged to you; now I'm in the right and you are in the wrong." And he put himself under protection of the police: and fee'd them so royally that they were zealous on his behalf, and rough and dictatorial even with those sufferers who came to him to moan and lament and hold up their ruined children: "You must move on, you! Misery," said the Police, "must move on right; Misery can't be relieving by stopping the way; nothing by bemoaning itself.

But if the Banker, naturally egotistical, and now entirely wrapped in his own plans, and fears, and well-earned torments, was deaf to this anguish of his victims, there were others in his house who felt it keenly and deeply. Alfred and Jane were heart-broken: they sat hand in hand in a little room, down closer by compulsion, and now and then came at their door; and the tears of pity ran down their own cheeks hot with shame; and Alfred said to Jane, "I will not be a Shylock: a vow to pay every shilling his father owed these poor people—before he died. It was like him, and like his fatherly age: at whose feet and on the generous can command, in imagination, the means to do kindred deeds.

Soon he found, to his horror, that he had seen but a small per-centage of the distress his father had caused; the greater griefs, as usual, were studied by statisticians and legislators.

Mr. Esgar, a respectable merchant, had heavy engagements, to meet which his money lay at the Bank. Living at a distance he did not hear the news till near dinner-time: and he had promised to take his daughters to a ball that night. He did so; left them there; went home, packed up their clothes and valuables, and next day levanted with them to America, taking all the money he could scrape together in London: and so he passed his ruin on to others. Esgar was one of those who wear their honesty long; but loose: it was his first disloyal act in business: "Dishonesty made me dishonest," was his excuse. Valeat quantum.

John Shaw, a steady footman, had saved and saved, from twenty-one years old to thirty-eight, for "Footmen's Paradise," a public house. He was now engaged to a comely barmaid, who sympathized with him therein, and he had just concluded a bargain for the "Rose and Crown" in the suburbs. Unluckily—for him—the money had not been paid over. The blow-fell: he lost his all; not his money only, but his wasted life. He could not be 21 again: so he hanged himself within forty-eight hours, and was buried by the parish grumbling a little, pitying none.

James and Peter Gilpin, William Scott, and Joel Paine, were poor fishermen, and Anglo-Saxon heroes; that's heroes with an eye to the main chance; they risked their lives at sea to save a ship and get salvage; failing there they risked their lives all the same, like fine fellows as they were, to save the crew. They succeeded as they were, to save the crew. They succeeded but rained their old boat. A subscription was raised, and prospered so, that a boat-builder built them a new one on tick, price eighty-five pounds; and the publicans said "Drink, boys, drink; the subscription will cover all: it is up to £21 already." The subscription money was swallowed with the rest, and the Anglo-Saxon heroes hauled to prison.

Doctor Phillips, aged 74, warned by growing infirmities, had sold a tidy practice, with house, furniture, and good-will, for a fair price; and put it in the bank, awaiting some investment. The money was gone now, and the poor old doctor, with a wife and daughter and a crutch, was at once a pauper and an exile: for he had come under the usual condition, not to practice within so many miles of his successor. He went to the nearest, and begged permission to be his assistant at a small, small, salary. "I want a youngster man," was the reply. Then he went begging to his old patients, and begged a few half guineas to get him a horse and chaise and keep him over the first months in his new place. They gave him, in the most of them were sufferers too by Hardie, and all they gave him did but buy a donkey and cart; and with that he and his wife trotted sadly to a village ten miles distant from the place where all his life had been spent in comfort and good credit. The poor old gentleman often looked back from his cart at the church spires of Barkington.

> From seventeen till now almost fourscore,
> There lived he, but now lived there no more.
> At seventeen many their fortunes seek:
> But at fourscore it is too old a week.

Arrived at his village he had to sell his donkey, and trust to his crutch. And so Infirmity crept about begging leave to cure Disease—and with what success may be inferred from this: Miss Phillips, a lady-like girl of eighteen, was taken up by Farmer Giles before Squire Langton, for stealing turnips out of a field: the farmer was hard, and his losses in Hardie's bank had made him bitter hard: so the poor girl's excuse, that she could not let her father starve, had no effect on him: to the gaol she should go.*

Took to the national row, and went to the national dogs, Thomas Fisher, a saving tinman, and a bachelor: so I expect we pity by the rule.

To the same goal, by the same road, dragging their families, went the Rev. Henry Scudamore, a curate; Philip Hall, a linen-draper; Peter Pratt, a shoemaker; Simon Harris, a greengrocer; and a few more: but the above were all prudent, laborious men, who took a friendly glass, but seldom exceeded, until Hardie's bankruptcy drove them to the devil of drink for comfort.

Turned professional chief, Joseph Locke, working locksmith, who had just saved money enough to buy a shop, and good-will; and now lost it every penny.

Turned Atheist, and burned the family Bible before his wife and daughter and terrified them and gaping servant girl, Mr. Williams, a Sunday-school teacher, known hitherto only as a mild respectable man, a tenderhearted and kind parent and husband. He did not take to drinking; but he did to cursing; and forbade his own flesh and blood ever to enter a church or chapel. This man became an outcast, shunned by all.

Three elderly sisters, the Misses Lumley, well born and bred, lived together on their own funds which, small singly, united made a decent competence. Two of them had refused marriage in early life for fear the third should fall into less tender hands than theirs. For Miss Blanche Lumley was a cripple: disorder of the spine had robbed her, poor youth's very bloom, of the power not only to dance, as you girls do, but to walk or even stand upright; leaving her very pretty little hands, and a heart as nearly angelic as we are likely to see here on earth.

She lay all day long, on a little iron bedstead, at the window of their back parlor that looked on a sunny little lawn; working eagerly for the poor; reading to the poor, young and old to read, chiefly those of her own sex; hearing the sorrows of the poor, composing the quarrels of the poor, proving their genuine necessities out of a little money, and much ingenuity, and labor.

Some poor woman, in a moment of inspiration, called Miss Blanche "the guardian of the poor." The word was instantly caught up in the parish, and had now this many years gently displaced "parson," and settled on her brave below, and its echo gone before her up to Heaven.

The poor "sunshine of the poor" was happy: Life was sweet to her. To know whether it was so, it is useless to inquire of the back-bone; or the brain. Look at the face. She lies at the window in the kindest sunshine, and in a world of sturdy, able, agile carsers, grumblers, and yawners, her face, pale as ashes, wore the eternal sunshine of a happy, holy, smile.

But there came one to her bedside and told her the Bank was broken, and all the money gone she and her sisters had lent Mr. Hardie.

The saint clasped her hands and said, "Oh my poor people!" What will become of them?" And the tears ran down her pale and now sorrowful cheeks.

At this time she did not know the full extent of their losses.

But they had given Mr. Hardie a power of attorney to draw out their money, and the monsieur had had abused the discretion this gave him, and begged them—they were his personal friends too—to avail his secret board.

When "the sunshine of the poor" heard this, and knew that she was now the poorest of the poor, she clasped her hands and cried "Oh my poor sisters! my poor sisters!" and she could work no more for sighing.

The news that had found the sunshine of the poor extinct, in her little bed: ay, dead of grief with no grain of egotism in it; gone straight to Heaven without one angry word against Richard Hardie or any other.

Old Betty had a horror of the work-house. To save her old age from it she had deposited her wages in the Bank for the last twenty years: and also a little legacy from Mr. Hardie's father. She now went about the house of her master and debtor, declaring she would not—need not—for her, and, if he did, she would never go into the poor-house. "I'll go out on the common, and die there. Nobody will miss me."

The next instance led to consequences upon consequences: and it was a question for rolling it the reader somewhat more fully than Alfred heard it.

Mrs. Maxley, one night, found something rough at her feet in bed. "What on earth is this?" said she.

"Never you mind," said Maxley: "say it's my breeches; what then?"

"Why what on earth does the man put his breeches to bed for?"

"That is my business:" roared Maxley, and whispered dryly, "tain't for you to wear em, however."

This little spar led to his telling her he had drawn out all their money: but, when she asked him, he would not answer again, but angrily recommended her sleep.

The fact is the small-clothes were full of banknotes; and Maxley always followed them into bed now, for fear of robbers.

The Bank broke on a Tuesday: Maxley dog on duty: and in the course of various people came about him to ask whether he was a loser, he used to inquire very gravely, and dwelling on every syllable, "Do you—mean—by—having—grey—in this here eye?"

Friday was Bank day; the clubmen met at the "Greyhound" and talked over their losses. Maxley sat smoking complacently; and, when his turn came to speak, he said he had lost £1 and all mine a week afore. (Exclamations.) I had a hinkling: my boy Jack he wrote to me from London as how Hardie was rotten out there: now these here Bankers they be like an oak-tree: they do go at the limbs first, and then at the heart."

The club was wroth; "What? you went and made yourself safe and never gave any of us a hint?" Was that neighborly? was that—clubable?"

To a half-storm of similar reproaches Maxley made but one reply: "I'm a poor man: I'm sorry to take care o' you." He added, however, a little sulkily: "I was laid for slander once: scalded my front like anything: that's all."

"Oh," said one, "I don't believe him. He puts a good face on it; but his nine hundred is gone along with ours."

"Tain't gone far, then." With this he put his hand in his pocket, and after some delay pulled out a note, and opened and held it up:

"What is that? I ask the company."

"Looks like a ten-pun note, James."

"Well, that's the sample: this sample: I knows where to find eight score and nine to match this here."

The note was handed round: and on inspection each countenance in turn wore a malicious smile; till at last Maxley, surrounded by grinning faces, felt quite easy.

"What be's all grinning at like a litter o' chessy cats? Why, no ugly enough without showing of your rotten teeth."

"Haw! haw!"

"Better, 'tain't money at all, but only a wench's curl-paper:" and he got up and snatched it fiercely out of the last inspector's hand. "Ye can't open it, for it's sealed, I see."

"What an if I can't read words, I can figures; and I spelt the ten out on every one of them, afore I'd take it."

A loud and general laugh greeted this boast.

Then Maxley snatched up his hat in great wrath, and some anxiety, and went out, followed by a peal.

In five minutes he was at home; and tossed the note into his wife's lap. She was knitting by a farthing dip. "Done!" said he, controlling all appearance of anxiety, "what d'ye call this?"

She took up the note and held it close to the candle: "Why, Jem, it is a ten-pound note, out of Hardie's—as was."

"Then what were those fools laughing at?" And he told her all that had happened.

Mrs. Maxley dropped her knitting and stood up trembling: "Why you told me you had got our money all safe out?"

"Well, and so I have, ye foolish woman," and he drew the whole packet out of his pocket and flung them fiercely on the table. Mrs. Maxley ran her finger and eye over them, and uttered a scream of anger and despair:

"These! these be all Hardie's notes," she cried; "and what vally be Hardie's notes when Hardie's be broke?"

Maxley staggered as if he had been shot.

The woman's eyes flashed fury at him: "This is your work, ye born idiot: 'mind your own business' says you: says your despise your wedded wife, that has more brains in her finger than you have in all your great long useless carcass: you wear have your secrets: one day positive, another day mystery: you have ruined us, you have murdered me: get out of my sight! for if I find a knife I'll put it in you, I will." And in her ungovernable passion she actually ran to the dresser for a knife: at which Maxley caught up a chair and lifted it furiously above his head, and let it fall.

Luckily the man had more self-command than the woman; he dashed the chair furiously on the floor and ran out of the house.

He wandered about half stupid: and presently in his feet took him mechanically round to his garden. He pottered about among his plants, looking at them, inspecting them closely, and scarce seeing them. Presently he covered up one or two, and muttered, "I think there will be a frost to-night: I think there will be a frost."

Then his brain seemed to clear. He sat down and thought of his wedding-day: he began to talk to himself out loud, as some people do in trouble: "Ah! pretty face," said he, "and to think I had my arm lifted to strike her, after wearing her so long and finding her good stuff upon the whole! Well, thank my stars I didn't. We must make the best on't: money's gone; but here's the garden and our hands still: and I can't see that we are worse off than we have alone: wedded life cuts grief a two. Let's make it up: and begin again. Sixty, come Martinmas: and strong for eight: and I'm almost weary of turning models."

He went round to his front door.

There was a crowd there: and a buzzing crowd with all their faces turned toward his door.

He came at their backs and asked peevishly what was to do. Some of the women shrieked at his voice. The crowd turned about: and a score of faces peered at him: some filled with curiosity, some with joy.

"Lord help us!" said the poor man, "is there any more trouble a foot to-day? Stand aside, please: and let me by."

"No! no!" cried a woman, "don't let him."

"Not let me go into my own house, young woman?" said he, with great dignity: "be these your manners?"

"Oh, dear, I meant you no ill. Poor man!"

"Poor soul!" said another.

"Good afore!" said a strange man. "What's to do? Let the man go to his house."

A lane was made directly, and Maxley rushed down between two rows of peering faces, with his knees knocking together, and he himself in his own house. A scream from the women inside, as he entered, and a deep groan from the strong men between the lines, told the tragedy. Poor Susan Maxley was gone.
